ing in all the best ways that can be conceived of, and they are only barred from investing in speculations of a hazardous character. Any person who will look over the long list of different ways in which they can invest their money will come to the conclusion that in some cases it might be well to eliminate some of these methods. There are too many life insurance companies in Canada to-day and the cost of every additional million of insurance is becoming greater. New companies that have to buy their business are bound to come to grief financially, either to policy-holders or stockholders, or perhaps to both. But this is aside from the question under consideration. My object in striking out 'trust companies' is that the word covers a great many organizations, some of which may be questionable institutions. Trust companies can be formed for all kinds of mercantile and speculative purposes. If success follows, all right; but if unsuccessful the stockholders will lose seriously. The danger is that the directors of life insurance companies may become stock-holders in trust companies. Such a thing has occurred on the other side of the line, and we all know that to-day very serious apprehensions are entertained by many of those who hold large amounts of insurance in life insurance companies. I know myself several cases where men actually hesitated whether it was better to lose what they had already paid, or to continue paying with the hope that at the end of a number of years they or their families might be permitted to reap some return. The feeling has been, and is to-day, that the individual directors of life insurance companies should not be permitted to take stock in trust companies, and thus drain into their private funds the funds of life insurance companies. That has occurred in some cases, but whether the law of this country will tolerate that kind of thing or not I do not know. If it does we certainly should amend it. Take the following case as an illustration: Suppose a trust to be formed for mining, manufacturing or developing enterprises. The capital stock is, say half a million, issued as preference stock, bearing 6 per cent. The promoters take $100,000 and the life company of which they are directors, take $400,000 and in addition to this they issue watered stock for $500,000 worth, a percentage of which they place upon the market at a reduction below par and get money to spend in development; pay themselves well for services and possibly recoup themselves for every dollar they have put in. If the enterprise is successful all right, if not they are 'out from under' and the other stockholders will suffer. This, in my humble opinion, is a feature of the present condition of the law that might possibly be taken advantage of by unscrupulous directors of life companies and the moneys contributed for the purpose of meeting maturing policies might be lost. Now if our law will permit that kind of thing to be done the sooner it is altered the better. I am not here insinuating at all that any board of gentlemen presiding over the affairs of any life insurance company in Canada would be guilty of doing anything of that kind, but if the law is such that they might do it, then it is well that we should amend it so as to prevent organizations of that kind getting the use of money belonging to a life insurance company and virtually the property of the policy-holders.

The Equitable Life is to-day struggling with difficulties which are the result of extravagant and unscrupulous action on the part of the directors, and its receipts have been seriously crippled in consequence. In May last its receipts were $80,000,000 less than the same month in 1904, and the May terminations were very much larger than usual. This shows how reports being spread with regard to the improper handling of the resources and funds of a life company may have a serious effect. Since the exposures which have taken place in connection with the Equitable Life, the best men on the board of the company have resigned, and their places, I believe, have been taken by other men. For some months past the constant experience has been quarrelling on the part of the directors, who charge each other with speculating with the society's funds, until it has terminated in the resignation of all the prominent directors.

The securities in which life insurance companies are permitted by law to invest should be carefully defined and classified. At the present time there is no classification of these securities; they are all included under one head, whether they are first-class, second-class or third-class. Now I claim that the methods by which these companies may invest their funds should be classified, and a life insurance company should be required to hold a large percentage of first-class securities, perhaps a less percentage of second-class, and a very limited percentage of securities of the third-class. First-class securities might be defined to be Dominion debentures, provincial debentures, and possibly county debentures, as well as the stocks of our best banks which have a rest above a certain amount. I think it would be easy to find a very large number of first-class securities. Then we come to second-class and third-class securities which possibly might include mortgages on real estate in towns and villages. Mortgages on farm property I would consider first-class security, if they are not drawn for more than say 60 per cent of the actual cash value of the property.

If all these companies are allowed to conduct their business without any classification of this kind, a very large amount of the assets of a company may be held in securities of a very questionable kind. They may be found investing their money in mortgages on property in towns and villages, and I have even known a number of cases where life insurance companies have invested money in mortgages on frame houses. That cannot be looked upon as first-class, or even second-class security. It is not right to place a company which has a large amount of its means invested in that way on the same footing with a company which has invested in the best securities the market will afford.

I think it is time we had a recast of the different ways in which investments may be made, so that they may be suitably scheduled. The aim and object of the Act should be, safety first and rate of interest second. The Equitable Life Insurance Company of the United States has a capital stock of $100,000. It does a large business in Canada and has on deposit with the Insurance Department $642,000 of the stock of the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, valued in our books and the books of the inspector at $6,420,000. That is $10 for every $1 of actual face value. This stock is deposited in Canada as a guarantee to the policy-holders of this company that the obligations of the company will be met at maturity. I do not know whether the department gives them credit for the whole $6,420,000 or merely for the face value of $642,000.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is a very important point. Who makes the change in the valuation ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It is carried out in the column at $6,420,000, and added up as representing that amount. That is supposed to be the market value, and the company is credited in the books of the Insurance Department for that amount, as will be seen at page 189 of the report of the Superintendent of Insurance for 1903. Where a company appears before the policy-holders of Canada as having such an enormous deposit in the hands of the Canadian government, of course it gives them a very great prestige, and enables their agents, when soliciting insurance, to point to the report of the Superintendent of Insurance and say : 'We are only required to have a certain amount of money deposited with the Canadian government, but our people have actually deposited $6,420,000 as a guarantee for the payment of policy-holders in Canada.'

Now, if the Mercantile Trust Company of New York should enter into some very questionable enterprise and were to lose a large amount of money, there would certainly be a very serious depreciation in the value of that stock ; and, for this reason, I hold that it should be stipulated that stock of a more reliable, permanent, fixed value should be deposited rather than stock subject to fluctuation, such as the Mercantile Trust Company of New York. Then again the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, which also does a large business in Canada, has on deposit in the Finance Department $300,000 of the stock of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York. The par value is $300,000 ; the book value is set down at $439,148 ; but the market value, and the value which is extended in the Insurance Report and credited to the company, is $1,800,000 ; that is to say, six dollars for every dollar of face value. I do not know the history of these companies; the possibility may be that they have paid a large dividend in past years. That is the only thing which could entitle them to such a high market value for their stock. They must have paid immense dividends to entitle them to such a favourable valuation in the books of the department. Stock of the United States Mortgage and Trust Company of New York is also deposited by the Mutual Life to the value of $300,000. The book value of this stock is $464,649; the market value, the value at which it is credited in the Insurance Report, is $1,200,000, or four times the face value of the stock. It is the market value in every case for which credit is given in our Insurance Report; and these are the securities that are held as a guarantee for Canadian policy-holders.

There is another fact in connection with life insurance which deserves serious consideration. We know that some companies in Canada have a very limited capital stock, although they carry a very large amount of insurance. I do not wish to criticise any particular company, but I will take the case of the Canada Life. It is one of the largest and can afford to be criticised, because its standing is good. The stock of the Canada Life is $1,000,000, which I believe is fully paid up. The responsibilities of the company to policy-holders amount to $26,000,000. Something like that amount has been paid in from time to time, including the stock held by policy-holders. Their board, I think, includes nine persons elected by the stockholders representing the $1,000,000 capital, while there are only six elected by the policy-holders as representing the $26,000,000. It may be claimed by the stockholders that it is their institution and that they have a right to control it. That may be true to a certain extent, but I think there should be an alteration in the law. Let us say that there are 50 or 75 stockholders in the Canada Life who are eligible by reason of the stock they hold to be elected as directors of the company. Four or five of these stockholders may get control of a sufficient amount of stock to elect themselves to the board of directors from year to year; and they can hold their positions in spite of either policy-holders or the other stockholders. That is not a desirable condition of things. I would give the policy-holders the right to vote for the election of directors, whether stockholders or policy-holders. Suppose there are ten stockholders to be elected as directors, in a case where there are 50 stockholders eligible to be directors, why not allow the policy-holders to say which ten of the 50 shall occupy seats at the board? Why say that the stockholders shall simply cast their ballots for directors who are stockholders?

As it stands now, in the case of the Canada Life, the policy-holders are allowed to elect only six members of the board. I would say that the policy-holders should be allowed by their ballots to choose ten out of the fifty stockholders that they want as directors. They must elect ten stockholders, but let the policy-holders say which ten of the fifty they want. That would largely destroy the monopoly that is created by one or two stockholders getting possession of a very large amount of the stock. I know of cases where an effort has been made to control other companies in the same way. I hold that any policy-holder who has paid up the premiums on his policy for three years should have the right to vote for the directors who are to handle the funds of the company. At present, in the case I have referred to, the stockholders elect nine directors and the policy-holders six; but I say it is wrong that the stockholders who represent say a million or half a million dollars should elect nine of the directors and that the policy-holders, representing the great bulk of the means of the company should elect only six. That is a feature of the present condition of things that well deserves consideration. I am a director of a company myself. I am perfectly willing, if the policy-holders of that company should get the right to cast their votes as to which of the thirty or forty stockholders shall be directors, that they shall exercise that right, and if I am not put on the board, I am quite willing to accept whoever they choose, as long as they choose stockholders. They cannot go outside of the stockholders. That would end this state of monopoly created by allowing stockholders to buy up the stock and elect whoever they like as directors, thus perpetuating a condition of things which in the end may be very disastrous to the company. I do not claim for a moment that I have given this question all the serious consideration it deserves. My attention was drawn to the condition of things in the United States, and I am only desirous of protecting Canada against the results which possibly may follow our leaving the way open to-day as it is for the investment of life insurance funds. I am perfectly willing to drop the Bill if the government will say that they will take the whole question up, give it fair and careful consideration, and possibly bring in, next session, a Bill that will cover the ground. I have discussed the question with the Inspector of Insurance and I have also spoken to the Minister of Finance. He expressed his desire to have a discussion upon the whole question and thought it could not do anything but good, because it is an exceedingly important matter. There are no other institutions in this country in which the people are as deeply interested as they are in life insurance companies. In many homes it may almost be said that families are depriving themselves of the necessaries of life in order that payments may be made on life insurance policies, and it is therefore the duty of parliament and of the government to prevent as well as they can by legislation, the funds created to pay maturing policies, from being squandered. I consider that it is the duty of the government to take steps to guard very strictly the resources of these people, and to declare that when they pay money into life insurance companies everything that can be done will be done to ensure the safety of their policies. Life insurance companies may say: 'You are going to cripple us by depriving us of the right to invest money in many ways in which we can earn a larger return than we can if you restrict our privileges,' but the duty of parliament is above all things to make those institutions safe. That is the first consideration, and while we desire to do everything that is reasonable to enable them to get the best returns from their investments, we should endeavour to make them as absolutely certain as we possibly can by restricting them from entering upon speculative investments. Our object should be to secure to the policyholders the certain payment of their policies.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The hon. gentleman with his usual care has prepared a great variety of figures bearing upon the general question of life insurance. It is a matter that might make an excellent speech if that question was up, or it would make a good magazine article. He has not, however, addressed to the House any argument in favour of the Bill which he has presented. Indeed the hon. gentleman practically disposes of the question by admitting that there is no trouble, so far as he is aware, with the trust companies of Canada. That being so, it seems to me the hon. gentleman might have considered some time before he proposed a Bill to the House, the effect of which is to discredit and throw doubt upon the standing of the trust companies of Canada. He would put the parliament of Canada in this position, that if they pass this Bill they would have selected from the large number of institutions in which these life insurance companies may invest their funds, a particular kind of company of which several exist in Canada and which have a number of people more or less dependent on them. The hon. gentleman admits there are good trust companies in Canada; he has hardly been fair to the trust companies. I have no interest in the matter whatever, inasmuch as I am not interested in trust companies, but we ought to hesitate before passing such a measure as this. I understand from the hon. gentleman himself that he does not propose to proceed with his Bill, but it appears to me in the mere introduction of it, on a question affecting the general business of life insurance, he has gone somewhat further than he should have gone on this occasion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I wish to call attention to some remarks of the hon. gentleman which might leave a wrong impression on the minds of those who read his speech and throw a doubt on the securities which the government accept from the different companies. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any reason to apologize to the Senate for having brought this subject under its consideration. I know of no subject that is of greater importance to the community generally, and more particularly to those who invest in life insurance, than the question of the security which should be given by life companies to ensure the payment of policies on the death of those who have taken risks in the company. But a moment's reflection will show the hon. gentleman that the proposition he makes will not meet the object he has in view. To those who have given any attention to the trust companies of Canada it must be apparent that they are as safe investments as can be found either for life insurance companies or any one else. The hon. gentleman's object, if I understand it, is not so much to prevent—although his Bill provides for it—the investment by life insurance companies in the stock of trust companies, as to prevent directors of life insurance companies from constituting themselves trust companies, and loaning the funds of the life company to the trust company. In the United States, this has been done lately, and the investment by the life company in the trust company, where the same people are the controllers of the life company and stockholders in the trust company has had a bad effect. Where the investment is profitable they put so much money in their pocket, but if not the result has been that the life companies have suffered thereby. That I take to be the reason why the hon. gentleman has brought this matter before the House. He admits, as we all know, that no evil results have followed from the investment of the funds of life insurance companies in Canada. There was one point to which he called the attention of the House, which brought forth the remark from the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that it was a very important point. If correct, what he stated would show that there is laxity of duty on the part of the government in accepting bonds and securities, which are placed in the hands of the government for the protection of policy-holders. When my attention was called to it about half an hour ago, I was under the impression that the market value was not the value taken by the government.

My recollection was that no securities of that character were accepted unless at a discount. I know when I was on the Treasury board, during a period of some fifteen years, a discount of ten per cent—not upon the market value, but upon the par value—was made, and the regulation goes even further than that. The par value of a security is taken from which ten per cent must be deducted, so that in every one hundred dollars these securities are accepted at a value of ninety dollars. But there is a provision to make it still more safe; if there is anything transpiring which reduces the value of the securities below par, then the government, under the regulations, order an investigation as to the actual market value of the securities which they hold and if it be dropped to say seventy-five per cent, then the security must be supplemented by an additional deposit. In order that there may be no mistake on that point on the part of the portion of the community who are interested in the life insurance companies, I will read the regulations referring particularly to what my hon. friend has mentioned. These regulations were adopted on the 14th June, 1900. Under the previous government the deduction from the par value was ten per cent. I notice in this regulation the present government have reduced the ten to five per cent. I suppose they considered five per cent was sufficient protection, under the rules and regulations. The rules will be found on page 37 of the report of the Superintendent of Insurance of the Dominion of Canada for the year 1903. Rule No. 1, provides :—

1. That Canadian municipal securities, Montreal harbour bonds, Canadian Pacific land grant bonds, United States State securities and loan companies' debentures (where such securities are in all respects acceptable to the Treasury board) be hereafter accepted at 95 per cent of their market value at the time of deposit, such accepted value in no case however to exceed par.

So that the speculative character of a security is not taken into consideration at all. If it were, it would be a very dangerous policy to pursue, because the hon. gentleman has given us instances where the par value of the stock of some companies to which he called attention was about $600,000, while the market value of the same stock was over $6,000,000. It will be observed that the rule to which I have called attention refers to special securities. The second paragraph is as follows:

2. That all securities of the classes mentioned in the preceding clause (1), which have been heretofore deposited and are still in the hands of the Dominion government at Ottawa, or in the hands of the Bank of Montreal, London, England, on behalf of the government, be revalued upon the basis set out in said clause (1).

3. That for the purpose of such re-valuation the various insurance companies by which such securities have been deposited be required to furnish from time to time when called for by the superintendent, schedules thereof giving the full particulars of such securities, including their par and market values, such par and market values to be certified to by a competent valuator or appraiser.

The appraiser would be appointed, probably, by the superintendent of insurance, so that the fear which my hon. friend had, and which most people might have in reading the report that is presented to parliament, has no real foundation. Every care was taken under the old government—and I am sure the same thing applies to the present government, as these rules prove—to secure the policy-holders. I do not care to enter into the other questions to which the hon. gentleman has called attention, more particularly the right of the policy-holders to vote. My principal object was to prevent an incorrect impression being left upon the minds of those who may read the hon. gentleman's speech that there is not that security provided for the policy-holders which is really prescribed by the regulations.

I hope my hon. friend will not press this Bill at present. The Finance Minister, a few days ago, in dealing with a short Bill to increase the directorship of a bank, laid down the principle, and I think it is a very correct one, that it would not be in the interest of the banks generally to pass a special Act dealing with one bank. He intimated that he intended to introduce a Bill giving certain rights and privileges to all banks alike. Some doubt the advisability of that; others do not. For my part, I think it is a good provision; and, as I understand, the Insurance Department, under the instruction of the government, intend to consider this whole question during the recess and to provide for any cases which they may think necessary in the interest of the policy-holders, particularly in the direction of investments. That being the case, I am strongly of the opinion that it would be better to allow the matter to stand until next session, and let the government deal with the whole question. I observed that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was about to rise a short time ago, and possibly he will intimate something as to the course the government intends to take.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is quite impossible to exaggerate the importance of the question which my hon. friend has brought up; and it is the more important because of the proportions to which life insurances have increased throughout Canada within the past few years. Speaking from memory, I believe the whole volume of life insurance in Canada is between seven and eight hundred millions of dollars—three or four times the total amount of the national debt. The present government, and the preceding government as well, have laid down the principle that in view of the enormous importance to the people of Canada of having proper safeguards cast around the provisions for the support of families, and in many cases for support during old age, which are represented by life insurance policies, the government should institute a Department of Insurance, and see that examination is made from time to time into the solvency of the various companies. Both governments have done this to the best of their ability. My hon. friend, in introducing this measure, stated that he brought it forward, not with the idea of pressing it to a conclusion at this moment, but simply to call the attention of the government to the great importance of seeing that these safeguards were thoroughly well maintained. His object is an excellent one—the government fully recognize that; and I believe my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, under whose charge the affairs of the insurance companies have been placed, intends to look carefully into the whole matter during the recess, more especially because public attention has been directed by events which have occurred in a neighbouring country, to some dangers which are incident to the accumulation of very great funds in the hands of persons not having perhaps that direct interest in their management which would effectually protect the interest of the policy-holders. My impression, however, is that in the United States, as well as in Canada, the Superintendents of Insurance in the various states have large powers which they exercise pretty freely for the protection of policy-holders.

As to the particular point which my hon. friend has brought up, whether trust companies' stock should be exempted or not, I would call the attention of the House to the very wide range—a much wider range than I think was originally intended—given to possible investments under the Insurance Act. I find that under that Act insurance companies are permitted to invest in—

The debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities of any building society, loan or investment company, trust company, water works company, water power company, gas company, navigation company, street railway company (by whatever power the railway is operated), electric light or power company, heat and light company, rolling stock company, bridge construction company, harbour trust company or commission, telegraph, cable or telephone company, dock company, fire insurance company, or the debentures or bonds of any steam railway company, which has earned and paid regular dividends upon its ordinary preferred or guaranteed stocks for the two years next preceding the purchase of such bonds or debentures.

And there are other provisions under which investments may be made in—

The debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities of Canada, or of any province of Canada, or of any municipal or public school corporation in Canada.

I think the hon. gentleman has done a service to the community in calling attention to the very wide range which has been given to the class of investments which may be taken under the Insurance Act, and it may be well for the government during the recess to revise the Act and to look into the whole question. Nevertheless there is no power on earth that I know of which will take the place of care and prudence on the part of directors of these companies. For example, let us take one of the cases which my hon. friend has mentioned. If the directors of a company choose to invest in mortgages of an indifferent description, it is almost impossible for the government by any method of supervision to protect the policy-holders effectually. It is much easier for the government to form a just estimate of the value of stock of any description than of mortgage securities of a certain class. Those who have had to deal with real estate are very well aware of this fact.

Other questions have been alluded to involving private rights of a complicated and difficult character. I am not prepared to say what could or might be done in the case of stock companies, as they are called, where the parties have certain vested rights, which cannot be taken from them without compensation. I think in most cases, the policy-holders are recognized to a certain extent, but the policy-holders after all are a fluctuating and floating body, and, the proposition that the policy-holders should direct the investments either in one way or another in opposition to the stockholders, is one that would require a great deal of consideration before it could be adopted. Behind all this there is another question which I shall merely allude to without in any way outlining a policy on the part of the government. It is a matter which will have to be considered one of these days; that is to say, whether the time has not come when a government, without interfering with the work of the companies which are now in existence, should or should not provide those of its people who choose to ask for it, with life insurance guaranteed by the state. That is a question of great moment, a question on which I have, and I think my hon. friend opposite has also, bestowed some attention in time past, and it is a question which may very well engage the attention of this honourable body and other bodies occupying a cognate position in the legislature. Meantime I would say to my hon. friend that I will take care that the subject is brought under the notice of my colleagues. I think his object has been sufficiently attained in laying the matter before the House, and I would ask him not to press the second reading of the Bill. more especially because it is obvious that a subject of this magnitude could not be dealt with properly at this time, when I trust a very few days more will release my hon. friends from their arduous labours.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the Act say anything about progressive security? A company organizes to-day and does a small business but in ten years its business may amount to millions; does the security remain the same? That is a very important thing.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They are required to increase their deposits in proportion to their business.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is a matter which should be looked into.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If I remember right, I myself introduced the original Insurance Act. The object that the government had in view was to make certain that every company doing business in Canada as its business increased, should be obliged to keep in the hands of the government a sufficient sum to re-insure all Canadian policies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the law now.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes. As their business increases their re-insurance fund must increase too.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I would venture to suggest to the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill that a better purpose could be effected by changing the form of the Bill when he introduces it again. The form I would suggest is a very simple one. If a proviso were introduced with reference to the qualifications of the directors of insurance companies, the first qualification should be that they should be honest men, because after all the whole question of investments entirely depends upon the honesty and discretion which may be exercised by the directors in making them. It is idle to talk about providing that they shall not be interested in this or that company. The whole difficulty which has been discussed by the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, and every word that he said with reference to the management of the funds of life insurance companies would apply equally to investments in any single company in which a life insurance company may now invest its securities. It does not apply to trust companies only. All the trust companies in this country are above suspicion. But if such investments as have been made in the cases referred to in the United States had been investments in companies other than trust companies, they would have been no better and no worse in the end ; therefore it seems to me the operation of the Bill would be entirely futile, and would not accomplish any good purpose, except to cast a stain upon the credit and reputation of a few trust companies in this country, and it would be absolutely futile in dealing with the class of investments which are set out in the statute here, and which are entirely within the discretion of the directors of companies. If the directors of companies are chosen for business capacity and personal integrity, that is all that can be done, and unless you choose to provide in the statute-book that the directors shall possess those qualifications, I do not see how you can do any better than to leave the shareholders to vote for those whom they think are capable and honest. It seems to me the whole question as to the character of investments is one which must rest with the investors. It is conceded by my hon. friend that investments in good mortgages of a certain standard should be permitted. But what tests are to be made to ascertain whether these mortgages come within that class ? What guarantee have we against fraud? Have there not been many bad investments made in mortgages in this country by insurance companies, by loan companies, and private individuals—even the most astute investors of money? Valuations vary with respect to this class of securities, and they vary with reference to real estate, as we all know, some of us to our cost. They vary also with reference to stocks, bonds and securities of companies, and the only way of guarding against loss by reason of bad investments is not merely to exercise care in the making of an investment, but to exercise care in watching, guarding and checking the investments from time to time. Provision is made for all that in the Act. The case that has been cited with reference to the investments of trusts companies in the United States is one which is entirely within the reach of the department at present. The department is not bound to accept the securities of any trust company in the United States or of any company. It has the discretion of determining whether it will take them, and at what value. They are not bound to give them any particular value at all, nor are they bound to accept them. The superintendent of insurance, in the discharge of his duties with regard to investments of insurance companies, criticises the form and the character of each one, and the insurance companies know that it is their duty, as well as to their interest, to see that unsatisfactory investments are disposed of, and that sound investments are procured to replace them. It comes to be not a question of an Act of parliament, nor of the standing of any particular company or class of company, but a question of the administration of the department, and the insurance department is now clothed with all the authority which is necessary to check the investments, and protect the insurance companies, as well as the policyholders in regard to the character of those investments. It seems to me, therefore, that when the matter comes up again it should come in an entirely different form from what is now suggested.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand my hon. friend does not press the second reading of the Bill, as his object has been attained.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am quite willing, on the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. leader of the government in this House, to drop this Bill for the present session. I am glad that the question has been brought up. I believe that it is certainly an important one, and I only did what I considered to be my duty. If I have erred, it is not because I desired to do an injustice to any company in Canada at all. I was proud to be able to say that we had a good class of life insurance companies in this country, but when we see what is occurring in other countries—that possibly funds may be invested in a way that may hazard the resources of those life insurance companies and eventually prove disastrous to policy-holders—it is well that we should guard against anything of that kind if we can. I am exceedingly sorry my hearing is not sufficiently good to enable me to catch the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Toronto, and I cannot, therefore, attempt to reply to what he said. I am quite willing to withdraw the Bill and allow the matter to remain in the hands of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the hon. gentleman from Toronto made the suggestion that the directors should be honest men, he should also have provided that they should continue to be honest as they grew older.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Is it the hon. gentleman's experience that they do not?

The Bill was withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 132) An Act to amend the Government Railways Act.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto).

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I move that after the word 'submit,' in the first line, and before the word 'tariffs,' we insert the words 'all.' That will make the wording more clear as I am advised it is intended that all tariffs shall be submitted; and in the second line from the top after the word 'Canada' I move that we insert the words 'as and.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There can be no objection to that, but is it necessary?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Better make it clear.

The amendments were adopted.

The clause, as amended, was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The clause we are now considering is a most important one, and is the clause, in my opinion, upon which will hang the merits of the whole proposition contained in this Bill. It seems to be a very good thing that a government railway should obtain a right of running over the Canada Atlantic Railway to Parry Sound, but everything depends upon the terms on which that right is obtained. We have had experience in Canada of the Intercolonial Railway obtaining rights before now. I refer to the Drummond County Railway. We remember the history of that matter. It was not, of course brought about in this way. It was not possible to implement that contract in the way in which this contract can be implemented, for we had no railway commission to refer it to at that time. But what ought to be a higher and better tribunal to deal with such transactions in the interests of the people of Canada than any railway commission is the parliament of Canada. The government brought the matter before the parliament of Canada, and we remember what happened. A measure was passed in the other branch of parliament, and defeated in this House, and two years afterwards a new contract was made which was about a million dollars better for the people of Canada than the one which was originally passed by the House of Commons, but defeated here, which went to show that the public interest had not been properly safeguarded in regard to the first contract. It is a matter which, I think, scarcely admits of controversy, that even the amended contract has not resulted in the public interest. I am confident that, if details were submitted to parliament, the very large deficit last year on the Intercolonial could be traced to a large extent, to the improvidence on the part of the government and parliament of Canada in connection with the contract which the government made with the Grand Trunk Railway. I have a great deal of faith in the Railway Commission, and especially in the chairman of that commission. I regard him as an able man indeed, and I have no doubt he will do his duty in regard to any matter that will come before that board. But everything depends upon the way in which the matter is handled from the government point of view in presenting it to that board. The Railway Commission is not supposed to make a better bargain for the government than they and their experts will ask for. It will not be the duty of the commissioners to place on the right of way a smaller valuation than the government and their experts might be willing to give, and our experience in dealing with the Grand Trunk Railway Company with reference to the Drummond County Railway is that the Grand Trunk Railway and their experts entirely overmatched the Department of Railways and their experts, in their skill, knowledge and ability to make a bargain. I do not think there can be any doubt on that score. After all the controversy which took place over it, and the second thoughts of parliament with regard to the subject, and the improvements that were made in the contract from the time it was first presented and passed by the other branch of parliament, I think it is apparent to-day that we have, by long odds, the worst end of that bargain, and while it is, no doubt, in the public interest, very desirable that the government railways should reach out and extend to Georgian Bay, a proposition which was put in tangible form for the first time by the leader of the opposition in the other branch of parliament, and to some extent this is the adoption of Mr. Borden's policy with regard to that question, yet still I have my misgivings as to whether, in the implementing of that contract we will not have another white elephant tied round the neck of the Intercolonial Railway to increase the deficit in the operation of that road, which is now alarming the country. I do not know that we can have anything much better than the clause which we have now before us in regard to this subject, but everything will depend upon the government, and the manager and experts of the government railways, and if they act in a foolhardy, reckless or careless manner with the experts of the Grand Trunk Railway, you may depend upon it there will not be very much doubt as to which will get the better end of the bargain, and the Intercolonial Railway will be made to bleed another million or two for the advantage of the Grand Trunk Railway every year of its operation.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Have you not a very tidy deficit on the Prince Edward Island Railway?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The Prince Edward Island Railway has always had a deficit. But what I point out is that the Intercolonial Railway deficit has gone up to an enormous extent recently.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—So has the deficit on the Prince Edward Island Railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, it is not as large as it was in former years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the argument of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is very convincing, because while it is quite true that, during the last financial year for which we have a report, the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway was very considerable, there have been years since the Drummond County road was taken over when there was no deficit, and no one who is familiar with the business over that road—even the hon. gentleman, strong as has been his language of denunciation just now — would be willing to go back to the condition of things which existed before the Drummond County road was taken over. There is no comparison whatever between the Intercolonial Railway to-day and the Intercolonial Railway before the Drummond County road was taken over. The journey to the lower provinces is perfect bliss now compared with what it was when we travelled by the Grand Trunk Railway from Lévis. Just why there is such a deficit on the Intercolonial Railway, I am not in a position to state, because I have not made a study of the matter, but I think it will not be found that it is due to the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway. That has increased the passenger traffic enormously, and I think has also had the effect of increasing the freight traffic over the road, and a change which has that effect is not calculated to injure the road. I quite concur in the view—and I am always glad to be able to agree with the hon. gentleman from Marshfield—that the proviso at the end of this clause is one of the most valuable portions of the Bill. Perhaps a discussion in committee on this clause is not just the place to discuss the whole policy of the government with respect to the Intercoloial Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The principal objection made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is not the one to which the hon. gentleman from Halifax called particular attention. He called particular attention to the bargain which was entered into between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Grand Trunk Railway officials in the arrangements made for taking over the Drummond County Railway, and then he pointed out the results that followed from it. Now the fact that the bargain was very loosely made is proven by the fact that the government has had, during the past year, to refer the difficulties arising out of that bargain to arbitration, to decide whether the terms have been fulfilled by the Grand Trunk Railway. It will be remembered that the original bargain was rejected, and that it was accepted at a subsequent session of parliament, after a saving of nearly a million dollars had been effected. In the course of the discussion it was pointed out that the very difficulties which had arisen during the existence of the Drummond County Railway had transpired. It was then shown that the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway would be paramount, and that they in the transference of the western traffic which they were loosely bound to give to the Intercolonial, would never carry out the agreement. It has not been carried out, and the result has been just what I pointed out, that the government has been obliged, in order to maintain its rights, to refer this question to arbitration. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Secretary of State what the result of that investigation has been, or if the arbitrators have come to any decision or made any report. I can scarcely conceive from a common-sense standpoint the necessity of the provision that you shall not pay for that which you have not received. Yet this clause was strongly commended by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I should consider that it would be a matter of course that if you do not use the road you shall not pay for it.

The redeeming feature of the Bill is this: the bargain to be made with the Grand Trunk Railway is taken out of the hands of the government altogether and transferred to the Railway Commission. That being the case, with the eminent gentleman who is chairman of that commission, the country is much safer in their hands than they would be in the hands of the Minister of Railways and Canals. This is to my mind the safeguard in the whole Bill, and not the provision referred to by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. Will my hon. friend tell me whether any result has followed from the appointment of the arbitrators for the purpose of settling the difficulties which have arisen between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think any conclusions have been reached. I am not aware that any decision has been arrived at.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They have held a good many sittings; has no report been made ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is nearly a year since that commission was called into existence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will my hon. friend make inquiries of the Department of Railways and Canals and let us know at the next sitting ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto), from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

AN ERROR IN MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MOTION.

The SPEAKER read the following message from the House of Commons :

Resolved, that a message be sent to the Senate to inform their Honours that the Bill (M) sent down from the Senate intituled : 'An Act to amend an Act respecting certain patents of William A. Damen,' was passed by this House with certain amendments hereto annexed, that by some mistake the said Bill was returned to the Senate without these amendments, and to request that the Senate will give leave that these amendments be inserted in the said Bill by the proper officer of this House.

Ordered, that the clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

Resolved, that leave be given to the proper officer of the House of Commons to insert certain amendments made by that House to Bill (M) intituled : 'An Act to amend an Act respecting certain patents of William A. Damen,' omitted through mistake when that Bill was returned to the Senate inadvertently endorsed as having passed by the Commons without any amendment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems a rather extraordinary course to take. That Bill is in the custody of this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill is in our possession. We allow the proper officer of the House of Commons to come and make the correction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me an irregular mode of procedure. We are asked to add amendments to a Bill which the House of Commons has sent to us declaring that no amendments were made to it. This may effect the object in view, but it seems to me that it would have been a much more regular and less complicated way had the House of Commons asked to have that Bill returned to them and then send it back with the amendments. In my experience, I have never witnessed anything of the kind before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We simply permit an officer of the House of Commons to come here and make the necessary changes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The clerk of the House has furnished me with a precedent for this procedure, only the tables were turned. The clerk of the Senate made the corrections in the House of Commons. At page 353 of the Journals of the House of Commons, 1875, I find the following :—

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie, of Lambton, seconded by Mr. Fournier, resolved that leave be given to the proper officer of the Senate to make the amendment to the Bill intituled : 'An Act to incorporate the Royal Mutual Life Insurance Company,' as desired in their message of this date.

Resolved, that a message be sent to the Senate communicating the foregoing resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That a message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Masters in Chancery, to communicate the foregoing resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

SURVEYS OF WATERS ADJACENT TO ALASKA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to Direct the attention of the government to some matters of importance with regard to the Imperial Marine Survey on the coast of British Columbia which, as announced, is to be taken over and continued by the Dominion government.

The navigation in the northern waters of that province, and on the coast of Alaska is the most intricate, as well as the most frequented by vessels of the Dominion, engaged principally in the commerce brought into existence by the gold discovery and workings in the Yukon district, and in parts of Alaska, and also engaged in connection with salmon canning in the northern rivers of British Columbia.

And to ask the government is it the intention to invite the co-operation of the United States government to complete the surveys in the waters adjacent to its territory of Alaska, whilst the Dominion government completes that on the northern coast of British Columbia ?

Is it the intention to arrange with the British Admiralty for the retention of the war ship

'Egeria,' now in British Columbia waters, with a portion of her crew experienced in surveying, until the completion of the marine survey in the Pacific, or for a more limited time ?

He said: It is quite possible that the Marine Department have taken cognizance of these matters before now, but whether they have or not, a reminder will not do any harm, and the reason I allude to the navigation in Alaska is that it is used by British and Canadian vessels, while on the other hand United States vessels use British Columbia waters. There is a continuous stretch of inland water from Vancouver up to Skagway, and the chief coasting trade of the country now is that carried on towards the Yukon. I would ask the government if they will request the United States government to survey the waters adjacent to Alaska while the Canadian government survey those adjacent to British Columbia.

As regards the last question it will be obvious to the hon. Secretary of State that experienced men will be required for a service of that kind. The 'Egeria' has been surveying for the last four or five years on the Pacific coast. It will require experienced men to take soundings and so on, and if the government could arrange to retain some of these men and also to retain the 'Egeria' it would prove useful. The ship can be employed also as a nucleus for the training of the naval militia, as proposed by the Minister of Marine. She is an old-fashioned ship with yard and masts. Modern ships do not possess masts or yards nowadays. They are altogether machines, equipped with steam engines and other machinery, but this ship is old-fashioned and just the thing for training sailors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to the first question, I am advised by the Minister of Marine that the matter is under consideration. As to the second question, I may say that application was made to the Admiralty for the services of the 'Egeria,' but they were unable to comply with the Canadian government's request, as they required the ship for their own use.

CONFERENCES WITH THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That in cases in which the Commons disagree to any amendments made by the Senate, or insist upon any amendments to which the Senate has disagreed, the Senate is willing to receive the reasons of the Commons for their disagreeing or insisting (as the case may be) by message, without a conference, unless at any time the Commons should desire to communicate the same at a conference.

That any conference between the Houses may be a free conference.

He said :—I was directed by the committee who are engaged in revising the rules of the Senate to move in this matter. As it is now, when there is a difference of opinion between the House of Commons and this House with respect either to amendments made by the Senate to a Commons Bill, or to amendments made by the Commons to a Bill originating in the Senate, if it should happen that either House does not concur in the amendments made by the other, the further intercourse between the chambers takes place by means of what are called conferences, which are very venerable, but rather awkward and slow. In the first place, if this House wishes to confer with the House of Commons, a message is sent to the Commons desiring such a conference. The Commons then sends back a message agreeing to the meeting. Then the Senate appoints managers to take part in the conference; and a time and place having been fixed for the meeting, these manage go there with something written on a piece of paper, which they hand to the managers acting on behalf of the other chamber. Then there is a further conference, and the managers of the other House hand to the managers of this House another piece of paper. There is no discussion between the managers—it is practically a dumb show. After these two conferences, at which nobody can say anything, there is what is called a free conference.

In the mother country they discovered a long time ago that this was a very cumbrous way to do business, and I find in the Standing Orders of the House of Lords a resolution of that House dealing with the matter dated the 8th of May, 1851, more than half a century ago. The resolution which I am about to bring before the Senate is copied, with the necessary slight amendment in the name of the House, from the resolution of the House of Lords, with the addition of the provision that any conference between the Houses may be a free conference, because it might, and sometimes does happen that a conference is a desirable thing, and when that is the case it should be a free conference. In Australia I find that they have free conferences from the beginning.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Before this motion is adopted, I should like to ask for some information from the hon. gentleman. Was not this question brought before the committee appointed to revise the rules of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Is this resolution in accordance with the report of the committee?

Hon. Mr. POWER—This resolution is moved at the instance of the committee ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any member who happened to be present at the stupid meeting we had with the House of Commons on the subject of the Railway Bill will rejoice in the adoption of this proposition. It was so extremely stupid that I had to break the rule. I declined to remain silent, because it was an absolute farce for sensible men from the two branches of parliament to meet and conduct a written conference—a dumb show in which nobody was permitted to say a single word on the subject then engaging the attention of the two Houses. I did not think it was possible that in the twentieth century twenty-five or thirty men could meet together and make such an exhibition of themselves as we did. I proposed at that time to sweep the whole thing away, for I thought it was too absurd to be tolerated. I could not help expressing my opinion of the manner in which we were acting, and I thought we should as sensible men have broken through the arrangement then and there, without a resolution of parliament. I am glad that the hon. gentleman from Halifax has taken the matter up and moved this resolution, which will prevent our making an exhibition of ourselves on a future occasion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was going to remark that there can be hardly a difference of opinion as to the necessity of adopting this resolution. From what the hon. gentleman from Halifax has stated, it seems that we are following a practice that has been abolished in another country over fifty years ago. We are clinging to a practice which has been superseded by the method proposed in this resolution. This is not a matter that can be dealt with finally by any committee in this or the other House, and there will have to be joint action. I presume the hon. gentleman from Halifax has communicated with the members of the other House in order that a similar resolution may be moved there, because our passing this resolution will not change the mode of communication between the Houses by conference unless the Commons pass a similar motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is this in any way interfering with the present rules of the House?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is not any express rule of the House with respect to the matter, but there is an established practice. We were supposed to be governed by the old parliamentary practice which, however, has been discontinued in England since 1851, and the committee engaged in revising the rules took the matter into consideration, and instructed me to present this resolution. I have spoken to the chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders in the other House, and I do not think there will be any difficulty in getting that House to agree. I propose, if this resolution is adopted, to move another resolution.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend, in view of the fact that the rules of the House of Lords apply to our practice here, why a conference took place of the character mentioned by my hon. friend the Secretary of State? I find nothing in rule 92 prohibiting members of that conference from discussing the matter at large. The only restriction in that rule is that those who are not members of the conference shall not speak, the inference being that those who form the conference are at liberty to speak. If hon. gentlemen will look at rule 92 I think they must conclude that it will scarcely bear the interpretation which has been placed upon it, and, furthermore, if that rule has been in operation in the House of Lords for the last fifty years it seems to me that under our rules it certainly ought to be in operation here.

The motion was agreed to.

QUESTIONS OF JURISDICTION BETWEEN THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA AND PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours be instructed to take into consideration the course to be adopted in future in dealing with Bills in connection with undertakings as to which there may be a question of jurisdiction between the parliament of Canada and a provincial legislature, and to report their conclusions to the Senate.

He said: I do not think it is necessary to make any observations on this motion. I think every hon. gentleman interested in measures which come before the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours is of the opinion that it is desirable that something should be done. It was simply because the committee could not move in the matter without being instructed by the House that I placed this resolution on the order paper.

RULES AND PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. POWER, from the Special Committee appointed to consider and revise the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate, presented the third report of the committee, and moved that it be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was absent at the close of the last meeting of the committee, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether this is the final report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the final report as respect the rules, but not the final report with regard to the proceedings. We propose to have another meeting of the committee and to make a further recommendation with respect to the Manual of Procedure.

The motion was agreed to.

SCHOOL LANDS OF THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing:

1. The amount (acreage) of school lands sold in the Northwest Territories since the union.
2. The amount of principal (if any), and also the amount of interest paid over to the Territorial government.
3. The amount (acreage) of lands sold, and the average price per acre in each year for which such lands were sold.
4. The amount at present standing to the credit of the school fund.
5. The amount owing on sales to be carried to the credit of said fund.

He said: I might say to my hon. friend the Secretary of State that this information would facilitate very much the discussion of certain clauses of the Autonomy Bills. If the information could be furnished before these Bills are discussed, it would be of advantage to those who may wish to speak on the educational clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know what time will be required. The hon. gentleman has asked for details which may probably take more time than he imagines. Would he be satisfied to accept a statement of the total quantities?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Dominion Lands Act was passed in 1872, and it seems to me it should not be difficult to obtain from the Department of the Interior a statement of the sales which have been made from time to time since that year. They cannot be so numerous as to occupy much time in the preparation of the statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman does not want the individual sales ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, merely the totals, and the price obtained from year to year for the land, showing the increase which has taken place in the price.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My recollection is that these school lands have all been sold by auction, and that for years past there has been an upset price fixed of $7 per acre.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But that price has been exceeded considerably, and I think in exceptional cases the government has acted upon its discretion in disposing of lands by private sale.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (181) An Act to amend the Bank Act. He said : Hon. gentlemen will remember that a Bill was introduced at the instance of the vice president of the Bank of Montreal for the purpose of allowing that bank to appoint an honorary president, I think the object was to name Lord Strathcona. It was thought by the Minister of Finance that instead of amending the Bank of Montreal Act, it would be better to make a general law which would apply to all banks, and this little Bill is the result of that. It repeals the Act limiting the number of directors and allows them to appoint any number they please. When we go into committee on the Bill to-morrow, I will have the Bank Act before me and give further explanations if desired.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to say that I cannot see any very good reason for making this an amendment to the Bank Act. The Bank of Montreal applied for an amendment to their charter, permitting them to increase the number of their directorate and to constitute one of the directors an honorary president. Considering the magnitude of the operations of the Bank of Montreal, no hon. gentleman would have any doubt as to the propriety of giving them, if they asked for it, power to increase their directorate, or as to the proposition to make one of the directors an honorary president. The Bank of Montreal is particularly happy in the matter of its president being, in the person of Lord Strathcona, a resident of England. He is a gentleman of the highest financial and general standing, whose position as an honorary president would be an advantage to the bank in every way; but whether it is a wise or proper provision to allow any bank in the country to constitute one of its directors an honorary president, who might be a mere figure-head, is altogether another proposition. However, I am not going to press that point. I do think, however, that it may lead to some abuses. The Bill may open the door for some of the smaller banks in the country to elect as many directors as they may by by-law think fit to appoint. I know there is a good deal of pressure on the part of the shareholders in some of the smaller banks to get on the board of directors. Sometimes the pressure arises from a desire to get a share of the money which is divided among the directors as remuneration for their services. I believe the tendency to multiply directors in the smaller banks is not in the interest either of the banks or of the community, for the appointment of directors who do not direct is not an advantage.

While I have these observations to make with regard to the Bill, I am sorry, when the government is amending the Bank Act at all, that it has not gone further and made an amendment which is loudly called for, that is, to provide for the inspection of banks. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) three years ago introduced a Bill calling on the banks to carry a larger amount of specie or Dominion notes than they had been carrying—to carry an amount equal to 10 per cent of their liability to the public. At the time my hon. friend introduced his Bill, I believe the average amount of specie and Dominion notes carried by the banks of Canada generally was about ten per cent of their liability, but the aim was to see that that percentage was made uniform. While some of the banks were carrying as much as 16 or 18 per cent, there were others which were not carrying enough at that time to make change over their counters. The Bill was not proceeded with; but I am happy to see, on looking over the returns of the banks, that a very marked improvement has taken place in the amount of specie and Dominion notes carried since 1902, when my hon. friend introduced his Bill. At that time the specie and Dominion notes held was about 10·20 per cent of the liabilities to the public, while to-day it is 12.25 per cent; or in other words the banks make a better showing, by about 20 per cent, in the matter of specie and Dominion notes carried, as compared with three years ago. I am quite certain that this marked improvement was brought about to a great extent by the discussion which took place, in bank circles over the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from St. John. The Bankers' Association, I am told, took the matter up and have made a very decided improvement, so that that portion of the Bill may not need to be enacted at the present time: but I submit that the occurrences in connection with the Bank of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, as well as other things which are continually forcing themselves upon our attention, go to show that we ought not to delay a day in providing for the proper inspection of the banks of the country. I have been looking over the evidence taken in the trial of Mr. Johns, the cashier of the Bank of Yarmouth, on a charge of making false returns to the government with regard to the operations of the bank, and have read very carefully the evidence of Mr. Stavert, the curator appointed to liquidate the bank, and I find that he admits there is a narrow line between the state of things he found in that bank, and on which he lodged his information against Mr. Johns, and what would be in accordance with the usages of banks all over the country, with regard to current loans and overdue debts. The admission which Mr. Stavert made, that it is a narrow line between what would be proper and legitimate bank transactions, accurately reported to the government, and what would be sufficient to put the cashier—and perhaps the directors—in the dock to answer against criminal charges, is sufficient to show the need for immediate action. What happened in reference to that bank is simply this: Drafts on customers of the Reddings outside of Yarmouth, which became dishonoured, were made to appear on the books of the bank as current loans, and the November return to the government showed $615,000 as current loans, and $23,000 as overdue debts. Mr. Stavert produced a statement in court showing that the overdue debts were $380,000, and the current loans about $230,000. He was cross-examined as to the different methods by which these results were obtained, and was asked whether, if Johns when each bill came back had charged it up to the current account of the Reddings, he (Mr. Stavert) would have laid the information. He replied, 'Probably not, it is a narrow line.'

The judge laid particular stress upon that statement when passing sentence upon Mr. Johns, and in view of that admission on the part of the curator, and the other evidence produced to show the practice of the banks with regard to this matter, Mr. Johns, although found guilty by the jury, received a suspended sentence of two months, pending the decision of the full bench with regard to the matter. I refer to this case for the purpose of pointing out to the Secretary of State how desirable it is that we should have an inspection of our banks and that the bureau of inspection in connection with the Finance Department should lay down definite rules with regard to such matters as I have referred to, that is as to the distinction between overdue debts and current loans. There should be such rules laid down that it will be impossible for a first-class bank expert like Mr. Stavert to say on his oath that the line I have described is a narrow one and hard to draw. We should have an inspection of our banks and no time should be lost in beginning the work. I am sorry the government has not attended to it this year. We may be told that it is difficult to bring about this inspection—that there would be a great many difficulties in the way. One of these was stated three years ago, that it would have to be like the English method of taking the census—the inspectors would have to drop down on the bank and all its branches simultaneously, for otherwise they might shift their assets from one branch to another. But all these are things easily got over.

There are difficulties about inspections of all kinds. We can see that in the inspection of staples, as well as in dealing with the inspection of seeds. Grave difficulties arise; and it is only by great skill and persistent and faithful effort that they can be overcome. I have not the slightest doubt that if the Minister of Finance were to take this matter up and inaugurate a bureau of inspection in connection with the Department of Finance, such an inspection might be carried out with the aid of the Bankers' Association as would be of great benefit and value to the people of the country. As it is now, with the light that is thrown upon banking institutions and banking transactions by the evidence that was taken the other day in Nova Scotia, we may take up the returns as they appear in the 'Royal Gazette,' and although the whole thing may look fair on the face of it, we find that one bank pursues one rule with regard to overdue debts while another bank pursues another, and it is very difficult to see from the returns that are therein presented what the condition of the bank is. The financial affairs of the country are happily to-day in a very good position, but it is just in such times as these when our financial affairs are in good condition, when trade is buoyant and when confidence prevails, that the seed is sown from which trouble may arise in years to come. That being the case, I am sorry the government, while they are amending the Bank Act, have not made provision for the inspection of banks. Referring to the Bill introduced three years ago by my hon. friend from St. John, I find that the 6th clause of the Bill reads as follows:

> 6. There shall be established as a branch of the Department of Finance a Bureau of Bank Inspection, under a comptroller whose duty it shall be to verify the statements or returns required from chartered banks, by inspection of the head office of each bank and of the branches when deemed necessary. He shall be supplied with such assistance as may be requisite, and the expenses of the maintenance of such bureau shall be borne and paid by the chartered banks, and shall be assessed upon them by the Minister of Finance in proportion to the assets of each.

It seems to me that this is a well-considered clause, and that it is all that is necessary to inaugurate a system of inspection. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should call the attention of his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to it. He could look over this clause, and if it does not in its present form meet the case as it should be met, then ample provision could be made. But I think my hon. friend should at all events hold over the Bill until the Finance Minister has had time to fully and fairly consider this suggestion. I think that in view of what has happened in Nova Scotia, in view of what we know is liable to happen elsewhere, and of other things which are continually coming to our knowledge, we should not allow any time to intervene before doing something substantial towards providing for an inspection of our chartered banks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The views of the hon. senator from Prince Edward Island are not new. The proposition has been discussed for the last 25 or 30 years, and the conclusion arrived at by those who have given the subject the greatest thought and attention is that it would be a very dangerous matter for the government to assume the inspectorship of the banks. It would involve the conclusion that if a failure took place the government would be practically responsible. They would be assuming a responsibility which it would be absolutely impossible for them to carry out. In the United States, I think, they have a system of bank inspection, and certainly the failures of banks there are much more frequent than in Canada. I think our banking system is recognized, not only in the United States, but in Europe, as being really in advance of the rest of the world. Now with the multitude of agencies scattered all over this country an official would be required in each agency who would keep watch over all the accounts passing through the banks, all liabilities assumed, the moneys paid in, and a variety of other details which would be absolutely impossible to gather with any degree of advantage as far as results go. As I said before, the Finance Ministers from time to time have given the subject their thought and attention, because it has been pressed upon governments for the last thirty years, and the conclusion has been that it would not be a safe or prudent thing for the government to assume the inspection of the banks.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I was going to observe that whether it would be prudent for the government to undertake the duty or not, somebody ought to inspect the banks, and there should be a careful inspection. I do not propose to go over the phases of the question which the hon. gentleman has dealt with, but I should like to make one remark, that no man can tell to-day whether the return the bank makes of the amount of notes outstanding is or is not a correct return. That is a matter I went into in the investigation I made, and it rests altogether with the bank to say whether all its notes are out, or whether it has so many notes out which will never be returned. That is a most important thing in connection with the returns. The bank may assume that because for the last four or five years it has not seen fifty thousand dollars of its notes, they will never be presented; and the amount involved is not considered a liability. That is one of the things which ought to be regulated in some way. There ought to be some mode of finding out whether the returns and the statements which the bank makes are correct. The case in Nova Scotia is certainly a notable case in point, and the observations of the judge, who appears to be a very careful and prudent man, seem to convey the idea that he had in his mind a belief or fear that there was something wrong in connection with the returns and the statements made by banks. What the hon. Secretary of State says with regard to the bank inspection in the United States and the failures there is not an absolutely correct statement. In the first place, there are a great many more banks in the United States than in Canada. I would not attempt to give the number, although I did know at one time what it was; but as there is a larger number of banks, there would necessarily be a larger number of failures. The inspection of the banks of the United States has the effect, however, of preventing a great many more failures. After an inspection is made, if anything is wrong the inspector calls attention to the condition of the bank and steps must then be taken by the proper parties to right the evil. Sometimes the course he suggests is not followed, but on the whole, if it were not for the inspection of the banks in the United States, the condition of things would be much worse. I desire to make one observation with regard to the Bill. It strikes me the bank is not a philanthropic or patriotic institution. I do not mean to impugn its philanthropy or patriotism; but to have an honorary president of a bank seems to me to be one of the most absurd things which could be imagined. The honour might come from the sovereign or from the Senate of Canada or in some way like that, but to declare by law that there shall be honorary presidents of banks seems to me an absurdity. I cannot see that there is any duty assigned to them. In an institution which is solely a corporation for the purpose of making money or helping the public to do so, I think the last thing they should ask would be an honorary president, and I attribute it to a little bit of foolishness on their part.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—In so far as the honorary president is concerned, there is no harm and no good accomplished by such an appointment; but on the general question of the inspection of banks I wish to make a few remarks. I must say at once that I am not interested in bank stocks. I have never owned any, and I never expect to own any; I never hope to own any. I feel that I am a more useful man than an owner of bank stock. But every commercial man in Canada is interested in the banks of Canada; every saver of money who deposits his earnings is interested in them. In fact we are all interested in them; but I dissent entirely from the proposition that the Dominion government should adopt a system of inspection of the banks of Canada. Our Banking Act, as we have it, is an admirable Act. I do not think a more admirable Act could be devised, and in so far as the security to the depositors is concerned, I should like some hon. gentleman to point out what losses have been sustained by depositors in our banks. I would further like to ask any hon. gentleman here to point out losses which have been sustained in Canada by the holders of bills of Canadian banks. For a short time after the failures of some banks the bills have gone at a discount, but I think in almost every instance in Canada, except possibly one, where the bills have been held for a reasonable time they have all been redeemed at their face value.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The notes bear six per cent interest.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—If my statements are correct, and I think they are correct, the banks of Canada are pretty safe institutions in so far as the security to the bill-holders is concerned. I would not be in favour of wiping out the double liability, but I do think it is an undue and an unfair liability. What are the services which the banks of Canada perform? Money is the very cheapest commodity we have in Canada. Considering the responsibility the banks assume, there is no doubt they do a great deal for the public, and I think that their private institutions should no more be invaded than any other private institution should be invaded. Banking is simply a commercial enterprise. A joint stock company engages in a commercial enterprise and invites capitalists to become stock-holders and shareholders. Why should a bank be placed upon a different basis? I think it is entirely wrong. I do not think one word should be said in Canada to reflect on the banks of Canada, because if there is one class of institution in Canada above all others that Canadians should be proud of, it is our banks—they are the best in the world.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am very glad the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has had something to say with regard to the banks. His remarks are of interest, coming from a gentleman who occupies a position such as he fills in the commercial world, and who assures you that he is not a holder of bank-stock, and never was, and that he never expects to be one. I hardly think that he would be out of place as a director of a bank; and I do not think a bank would suffer by having such an hon. gentleman appointed as a director. Now with regard to the position of honorary president, I think my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island has been most unhappy in bringing before the public and before this House the facts about a bank in Nova Scotia, reflecting on that bank, and making it a part of a criticism of all the banks in Canada. If my hon. friend understood the facts connected with bank inspection, he would know it would be the greatest and most difficult of undertakings if the government of this or any other country were to undertake the supervision and the inspection of banks. Let me tell my hon. friend that at the head office and many of the larger branch offices of our principal banks it would be necessary for an inspector to live in the building to enable him to verify the details of every day's proceedings with regard to the bank's transactions. With regard to the circulation, surely my hon. friend knows that the government imposes a fine of $1,000 a day on every bank which exceeds the amount of circulation which it is allowed by law. The banks have to watch with great care; in fact it is the business of one man, where there are many branches in a bank, to make sure that the circulation is not exceeded. Our banks have time and again come before this honourable House and asked for power to increase their capital. Why? Not that the directors and the shareholders were not satisfied with the income they were receiving from the returns of the bank, because in this growing time that Canada has seen for the last eight or ten years, nearly every one of our banks has doubled its transactions and added very largely to its capital and rest account. But there is a general demand for increased circulation. If my hon. friend would suggest something in the way of allowing banks with a paid-up capital and a rest equal thereto, to increase their circulation, I think he will be taking a step in the right direction. Here you have a bank, as my hon. friend from Ottawa said, with a capital and a rest, say each amounting to a million dollars, yet that bank with a rest of a million dollars has no more right to exceed its circulation than the bank which has only $25,000 as a rest. The bank in Nova Scotia of which my hon. friend spoke was a very small concern, and lent all its money to one man. If that bank had been carrying on business like the other banks in Canada, such a thing could not have happened; but although it had a Dominion charter, it was for all practical purposes a private bank. Such a thing could not happen if they were located in Toronto or Montreal or Hamilton, where the banks meet every morning and exchange their notes, and the business of the community is under constant supervision. Any one who has had experience in banking matters knows that the best inspection a bank can have is afforded by its rival doing business in the same city. The hon.

Secretary of State asked what would be the result if the banks came under the supervision of the government. The government would require to have representation on the board, and in that way they would become responsible to the shareholders and the noteholders, and they would be practically engaging in a private business which is now being carried on by the chartered banks. I have said it before in another part of the world, and I am glad to be able to repeat it here, that the Canada banking system is the best banking system in the world. Every bank in the Dominion of Canada has to deposit with the government a certain sum of money which is set apart for the redemption of the currency issued by any bank which may fail. No such provision is to be found in the United States. In that country they can start business with two or three hundred thousand dollars; many banks in the United States start with $100,000. The banks are frequently started merely as an adjunct to some other business that the stockholders may be connected with, and what is the result? Failure after failure has taken place. I am sure the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island does not, on reflection, compare the banking system of the United States with the banking system of Canada. There is no comparison between them. One bank may fail because of the failure of another; such a thing cannot take place in this country. If a run is made on one bank, every other bank in the town knows that if that bank goes under they must come to its assistance, and consequently all the banks are bound to prevent any one of their number being embarrassed.

If it is the desire of the Bank of Montreal to do honour to Lord Strathcona, I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House would raise the slightest objection against honour being done to the greatest man that Canada has produced; and if the Bank of Montreal wishes an honorary president, why should we object to it? We all know the duties entrusted to him in the British empire, and we know how long he has been connected with the Bank of Montreal. His heart is in the Bank of Montreal. The board have asked him time and again to retain the position of president, but we know that as president of the bank he cannot come to Canada and see after its affairs as an active president residing on the spot. But we know the duties are as well performed by the Vice-President, Sir George Drummond, and if the Bank of Montreal wishes to make Lord Strathcona honorary president, I see no harm in doing so. I see no harm in any gentleman who has served a bank faithfully and well being allowed to remain on the board as honorary president, and I am glad of this opportunity of saying that so far as the Banking Act is concerned and our banks, I am sure they are in a more wholesome condition than any other banking institutions in the world.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It is to be regretted that a single word should come from any member of the Senate that would in any way reflect on the standing of our banking institutions. They are unquestionably the financial bulwarks of this Dominion. We have, on the whole, a very creditable lot of institutions. It is to be regretted that the Bank of Yarmouth has failed, but I entirely endorse the remarks of a recent speaker that it was largely due to the fact that they did not know how to lend their money; they loaned most of it to one individual. Banks will make mistakes. The history of humanity shows that errors will creep in and mistakes are made in all institutions; but I think the present Banking Act of Canada is in about as perfect condition as it is possible to attain. Those who took an active part in framing that Act deserve a great deal of credit for their great prudence and statesmanship in preparing the Act as it stands to-day. With regard to government inspection, I cannot see how the government could undertake the duty of inspecting all the banking institutions and their branches throughout this Dominion. They would need to keep a staff of officers numbering into the hundreds if they were to undertake a duty of that kind. If the government is to inspect at all it should thoroughly inspect every banking institution throughout Canada—go over all the details, count up all the cash down to the cents, and go through each institution from top to bottom. If they did not do that the inspection would not amount to anything. If they were to take the statement or word of any of the banking officials, the inspection would be imperfect. What would be the result of the government undertaking such an onerous duty? If a man were to purchase stock on the strength of a government statement issued after the inspection of a bank and a report signed by the Finance Minister or the inspector, that the institution was in a sound financial condition, I should think that man would have good ground for action if he should sustain loss through the failure of the bank. He would have a right to take action in the Exchequer Court against the government for having misled him by their statement. I do not think it would be well that the government should place the country in any such position. The Bank Act is in a good position as it stands to-day. No company of men can start a bank now unless they have a very substantial capital, nor can they begin operations unless they have a capital of at least one million dollars. It is a good provision, because the bank has to start on a fairly stable financial basis, and if properly looked after and conducted it is bound to be a financial success. The provision made for bill-holders is an admirable one. Every bank has to pay a percentage, proportionate to its circulation, to create a fund which will be devoted to the payment of bills of any bank which may suspend. Under our present system, I fancy that if any of our chartered institutions were to suspend, any person holding its bills could go to any other bank and demand payment—at least that fund is provided for the redemption of the bills and there is no necessity for any one accepting a discount.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They bear interest from the day the bank suspends.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—All these provisions are admirable, and I should regret if anything were said which would tend to question the stability of our banking institutions. I have travelled very largely through the United States during the last ten years, and heard expressions from men high up in financial circles; and all agree as to the character of our banking institutions. I was talking to the president of a bank where the deposits are over $32,000,000 and he told me that the Bank Act of Canada was one of the most perfect things he had ever seen, and he would be glad if the United States would adopt it. That is the general opinion. When we have a good thing we should let it alone, and cast no reflections upon it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must confess I do not share the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Gibson) and the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) as to the impropriety of discussing questions of this kind even though our remarks may affect our monetary institutions. Discussions of this kind always do good. Mens' minds do not all run in the same direction, and if one gentleman has an opinion that a certain change in the management of important institutions would benefit them and make the investors and depositors more secure than they are at present, certainly he should not be condemned for expressing his opinion. The remarks of my hon. friend from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) have been to a certain extent misunderstood; however I leave him to defend himself. There is much force, unanswerable force I think, in the remarks made by the hon. Secretary of State, with reference to inspection. This question was discussed very often when we were dealing with the banking institutions during the sixteen or seventeen years I was connected with the government, and the pros and cons of the subject were so forcibly put that the government did not see its way clear to adopt the system my hon. friend has suggested, though upon the face of it the general public would come to the conclusion that he was correct. I may say I differ altogether from the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) in reference to the double liability. I am very much afraid if it were not for the double liability clause, many of the shareholders, as well as bill-holders and depositors, would lose a good deal. No doubt there is provision made for the redemption of the bills, but I do not know of any law which protects the depositors in the same way. The double liability clause is an admirable one. There are many men who object to investing in bank stocks because of the double liability. Referring to the bank which has failed lately, I think the depositors would be in a precarious position if it were not for the double liability provision. In reference to the over-issue of notes, notwithstanding the securities and the provisions of the Bank Act, we know that the time is not long past when a number of our most important banks thought it necessary to make an over-issue. The government threatened to impose the penalties mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Welland, of $1,000 per day; and they were obliged to recall the issue at once. It matters not how strict you make the law—and I question very much if we can make the Bank Act of Canada more strict than it is to-day—you cannot place the depositors, the shareholders and the bill-holders in a more secure position than they are to-day. When I was in Australia in 1893, there was a widespread financial depression. About three hundred banks in the United States failed, and there was not a banking institution in the Australian colonies that was not in straitened circumstances, if not almost financially ruined. I delivered addresses in the chambers of commerce and board of trade, and when discussing that question was in the proud position of saying that during the whole of that depression not a solitary Canadian bank had failed. It was a surprise to many who heard me, and I was asked the reason. In reply I placed the Bank Act in their hands, and after investigating its clauses, they came to the conclusion that it was about as perfect as it could be made. Now this difficulty in the case of the Yarmouth Bank arose from the fact which has been mentioned, that they loaned their money to one irresponsible person and made a return showing that it was a discount instead of an actual bona fide loss. Would not the difficulties which have presented themselves in this case be remedied by changing the character of the returns, making them show exactly what the discounts and losses are? I will be answered in this way: 'That is already provided for in the Act.' So it is, but a clause might be added to the Banking Act explaining what meaning must be attached to each of these items in making the return. As pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, so uncertain were many bankers and inspectors of the actual meaning of that particular item in the return, and the line was so narrow that many of the managers thought they were justified, without committing perjury, in swearing to the correctness of the return. So impressed was the judge with the evidence given by Mr. Stavert, an expert in banking inspection, that he declined to pass sentence on the bank manager, but pronounced a suspended sentence, awaiting the final decision of the court of appeal as to the actual meaning of the terms used. That is a case which the government should consider very fully, and so amend the Act in that respect as to leave that question beyond a doubt. If that end is attained by the discussion in this House, so much the better. My hon. friend is not in his place just now, but I was going to ask him if he knew of any case where a return has been made by any bank in which they have taken credit for presumed losses. In other words, if they had issued, say, $100,000 of bills, and they presumed that $10,000 of them never would be returned, would the return show that they issued only $90,000? That is the inference which must be drawn from the remarks of the hon. gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Ellis). He must have had ground for making the statement, or he would not have embodied the clause which was read in the amendment to the Bank Act which he proposed three years ago. These questions being fully discussed, I have no doubt the Finance Minister and those whose special duty it is to look into this question will take note of it, and, as the Finance Minister has pledged himself in the Lower House to consider this whole question of banking during the recess, these are points which may well be brought under his notice, and we may then have amendments made for the protection of the bill-holders and depositors.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I did not for a moment desire to advocate the wiping out of the double liability. What I desired to indicate was that the banks were placed in a very different position from any other institutions in the country, because of the fact that, together with the provision for the repayment of bills, there is a provision for double liability; and that I pointed out as being a hardship. Apart from the question of the People's Bank, where there was not only a double liability, but an individual liability; and apart from the circumstances of the later case, where I believe the stockholders of the Bank of Yarmouth are all to be compelled to respond to the question of double liability, I should like to know a case in Canada where the double liability has had to be responded to.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that in the case of the People's Bank there was a double liability?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I said in the People's bank there was an individual liability; that every stockholder was responsible to the extent of his total realty.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Not at all. Only the directors were responsible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The difference between ordinary corporations and banks is that ordinary corporations do not take deposits, nor do they issue bills, and consequently their responsibility to the public is not as great as that of the banks.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Loan companies receive money on deposit. The double liability does not cease the day a man sells his stock. For ninety days after the transfer his responsibility to the bank and to the people in regard to the double liability continues. In other words, if the directors of a bank, hearing that a calamity might overtake the bank, wish to dispossess themselves of their stock and that calamity befalls within ninety days from the date of the transfer, their double liability remains in effect.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—A good deal of the discussion is aside from the Bill before the House. Just two points arise on this Bill, one the question of removing the limitation as to the number of directors and the other to enable the directors to elect an honorary president. With reference to the first matter, I should like to call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the form in which this legislation appears. It removes the limit in the number of directors, so that the bank shareholders can elect an unlimited number of directors. In all the legislation we have had, I think it has been the invariable practice to fix a limit. Ten may be a reasonable number in one case while in other cases it might be unreasonable. There is no reason why the shareholders, within a certain range, should not have the power to determine the number of directors who shall govern the bank which, in proportion to its size and extent of its operations, might be large or small. It seems to me, therefore, it would be unhealthy legislation to begin with; but beginning with a bank I do not see why it should not apply to any other commercial corporation which comes here for legislation. I think it is a mistake in relation to banks. A large number of directors means distribution of responsibility among a large number of people, and if that is carried on to an undue extent it removes one of the great safeguards which the banks and the public possess in having a limited number of people directly responsible for the operations of the bank and who will be more likely therefore to give careful attention to them. I make mention of this now, in order that when the Bill comes up in committee it may be considered whether there should not be some limitation, with discretion perhaps to the shareholders, of the number of directors.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Early in the session I brought in a Bill to allow the Bank of Montreal to elect twelve directors and one honorary president. It was withdrawn at the instance of the Minister of Finance, and this Bill was introduced instead. I agree with those who think that the measure introduced by myself was better than this one.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson) and to some extent my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) remarked that I had cast some reflection on the standing of our banks——

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—No, not I.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman from Welland regretted that reflections had been cast on the banking institutions of the country, and my hon. friend from Wellington followed in the same strain. I did not cast any reflection whatever upon the general standing of the Canadian banks. I have no desire to do anything of the kind. I did not go out of my way to pronounce an undue eulogy on them. After what the hon. gentleman from Wellington has said, they would not perhaps consider any eulogy from me of particular value. My hon. friend did pronounce a high eulogium on the banks, and the banks may set very high value upon it, and regard it as among their most valuable assets. I do not claim to know a great deal of the banking institutions of the country, but from what I do know of them, I believe they are in a very stable condition. That does not, however, imply that they have reached perfection, and that safeguards might not be thrown around them and improvements made from time to time, as deemed necessary. My hon. friend from Lincoln spoke of the great advantage it is to the banks to have security for their note circulation by the deposit made with the Receiver General; and while some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to think the government had better leave the banks alone, that does not minimize the importance of the fact that the action of the government and parliament in providing that security for the redemption of notes was a great benefit. Still it was an interference on the part of parliament with the action of the banks. The only objection to inspection I have heard that is worth anything, arises from the difficulty of carrying it out properly. If that is to constitute an objection in this case it would also form an objection to our inspection of staples of every kind. There are difficulties greater, I think, in other directions than could be met with in the inspection of banks. When we entered on the inspection of fruit packages, we did not expect the government of Canada would appoint inspectors to open every parcel and put a label on it; we did not say the government would be responsible for every barrel of apples shipped abroad; but by passing that law we imposed a wholesome check on those dealing in such commodities, and the effect has been to improve the character of the goods. I do not know that the Banking Association is the right authority to inspect the affairs of banks. I think it should come from the government, but wherever it comes from, if there had been a system of inspection, does any member of this House believe that the state of things found to exist in the Yarmouth Bank when it suspended, and which had existed for many years before, could have prevailed? The directors and cashier, knowing that there was an inspection, and that the inspector was liable to come down upon them at any time, would have prevented things getting into the bad state in which they were found to be last winter when this unfortunate suspension took place. I submit it is no argument against the inspection of banks to say that there are difficulties in the way. Any legislation of that kind will be met with difficulties and it is the duty of parliament, if there is a benefit and advantage to be gained, to meet those difficulties and provide such a remedy as in its wisdom may be deemed necessary.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I had no desire to cast a reflection on the hon. gentleman from Marshfield; what I desired to point out was the danger of criticising our banking system from any standpoint whatever. The subject requires a great deal of consideration and no word should go forth from parliament which would lead any one to suspect that there is anything whatever wrong with our banking system. The depositing public are very critical, and a run upon a bank is easy to start and difficult to stop. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island approves of government inspection, and brings up the case of the Bank of Yarmouth again. If that bank had been true to itself and its own inspectors had submitted to the board of directors a true statement of its affairs, the suspension would never have taken place. Every bank has one or more inspectors, the number varying according to the circulation and the number of branches, and these men go about from agency to agency. One of the conditions in the early days of the banking system was that one of the directors had to verify the bullion in the safes and vaults of the bank. Such a thing in the case of the Bank of Montreal would be impossible. All the members of this House could not in twelve months count the note circulation of the Bank of Montreal. It is necessary to depend on the officers of the bank who visit the sub-agencies and report. In addition to that, each agency sends in to the head office a statement of its affairs, the notes in circulation and the discounts. Everything is scrutinized by the inspector. The inspector drops in at any time; even the head office of the bank is subject to inspection at any hour of the day which the chief inspector may appoint. He brings before the board a statement, to which not only the president but the general manager and the accountant have to swear as being correct; and it is sent to the government. Month after month, on the 15th day of every month, the bank returns must be verified and sworn to. It will be seen, therefore, the banks are not without inspection. They are thoroughly inspected by themselves and by one another. Every clearing house is evidence of that.

Notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) says about the number of directors, the wisdom of the shareholders ought to decide the number of directors required for a bank. Five directors may be plenty in an ordinary bank, while a dozen may not be enough in a large institution like the Bank of Montreal. It must be remembered that these gentlemen are not always available, and a large directorate, consequently, becomes a necessity. No limitation should be placed upon the number of directors, because the shareholders place in the hands of the directors a certain amount of money, and that money is divided among the directors themselves, whether the number of directors be large or small. These are matters which a bank regulates for itself. All I have to say is that the less we legislate in the affairs of banks and coporations the better for them. As far as my judgment goes, the corporations are quite capable of making regulations for themselves.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The last observation of the hon. gentleman is against the Bill, because this legislation has not been asked for by the banks as a body. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Toronto with reference to the Bill before us. It seems to me to be questionable policy to allow a bank with $200,000 capital to have more than ten directors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have no banks with only that capital.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are banks which have not more than half a million. I am not saying anything about the policy of this measure, except to suggest that when we go into committee on the Bill, I think the line indicated by the hon. gentleman from Toronto might be adopted. There should be some proportion between the number of directors and the size of the institution. Hon. gentlemen say 'leave it to the shareholders,' but how is it that we have so perfect a banking system in Canada ? Is it because everything has been left to the shareholders ? Not at all. It is just because parliament, acting under the advice of the ablest and most conservative bankers in the country, have devised a law which compels those who carry on banking to do business in certain ways. The shareholders of a banking company are simply like the shareholders of other financial institutions, but it happens that they are more effectually controlled by statute than the shareholders of other institutions. I do not believe in leaving too much to the shareholders, and if the hon. gentleman from Toronto, when we go into committee on this Bill would suggest some amendment such as he indicated, I, for one, would be prepared to support it.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to refer to the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards). He drew a parallel between himself, a private individual, and a bank. There is the greatest difference in the world between the two. I am not bound to take my hon. friend's note, if I do not want to do so, but I am practically bound to take the note of a bank. I am not compelled by law to take it, but I am really forced to do it if I want to get along. I think the illustration of the hon. gentleman is a pure fallacy as regards the bank. If the bank institutions were voluntary institutions, the hon. gentleman himself being a voluntary institution—and a very good one—then the illustration might have some analogy, but the argument which he makes is not founded on fact.

The motion was agreed to ; and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to make one remark before this motion is carried. All that the Bank of Montreal asked for, as indicated by the hon. gentleman, was an increase in the number of directors to twelve, one of whom could be made an honorary president. Now the Bill before us repeals the limitation as to number. I would ask him if he can see any objection to consulting his colleague, the Minister of Finance, as to the propriety of acting upon the suggestion which has been made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) as to limiting the number. If the Bank of Montreal found that two additional directors would be sufficient for an institution of that magnitude, and the principal reason for applying for legislation was that they wanted to select one of those directors to be an honorary president, would it not be better to restrict the number to, say, fourteen or fifteen ? I think it would be much better to restrict it rather than have it unlimited. It has been stated by an hon. gentleman that this matter is in the hands of the shareholders when they elect their directors ; but we all know that in institutions of that kind the directors and the president generally control the selection of directors for the coming year by means of proxies.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—They are renewed every two years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They really control in that matter, and we know that many people try to get on the board merely for the sake of the fees paid to them. In the old country they are called guinea-pigs. Whether it is carried to the same extent in this country I do not know, but it prevails in England.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They are called whole hogs in this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the observations made by the hon. gentleman who has spoken. I presume he has already consulted with many of the bank managers. However, I am not really aware whether any reasons have been urged upon him to make the number of directors unlimited. In the Joint Stock Companies Act there is a limitation, which seems to me reasonable. But I quite realize that the objection presents itself at once that there will probably be a pressure on large stockholders to increase the number ; and whether the increasing of the number would increase the protection to the general public and the management of the bank I am quite unable to say.

The motion was agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière)—from the committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (115) An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that the rules be suspended so far as they relate to this Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I ask that the third reading be postponed until Monday next. There is some question about it, and the matter was discussed to-day. I should like to have it stand to-day.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I asked on a previous occasion to have the rule suspended and some hon. members objected on the ground that they were not sure about the standing of the Trust Company ; but it is important that this Bill should receive its third reading as soon as possible, because I understand the Grand Trunk Pacific have a large amount of money secured from the Rothschilds on which they are paying interest, and as soon as the Bill is read the third time that difficulty will be removed, and they will be able to make use of the money —about $15,000,000. This matter was fully discussed in the committee, and I think it was explained satisfactorily to every hon. gentleman present except the hon. gentleman from Toronto. These explanations were clearly given in the committee this morning, and I ask, as the rule has been suspended without objection, that the Bill be now read a third time. I might further say, as was stated by the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill, that it is a measure which cannot be changed. These things come before us, and we may criticise them ; but we cannot make any alterations. It is a contract made by the parties and it is for the purpose of carrying out the financial arrangements of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and it is desirable that they should be in a position to cable to England that the Bill has received its third reading to-day.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I have no desire to embarrass the Grand Trunk Pacific or anybody else, or to disoblige my hon. friend, but we have a Bill confirming certain agreements, and those agreements change in some particulars the agreement which was last entered into. It is conceded that that is one of the objects of the Bill. I should like to know from hon. gentleman present how many have read those agreements through and appreciate the changes that were made. If hon. gentlemen can say they have read them and considered them and are able to say they are all right, I will withdraw my observation. I did read the Bill and the agreements, and it appeared to me that there was a lapse in one clause. I called attention to it to-day. I was not prepared to discuss it, because I wanted to hear the explanation. No explanation was given except that so far as the agreements were concerned, they could not be changed. I am not proposing to do that, but what I want to consider is a clause which may be changed --clause 4. Clause 4 may or may not be changed ; I am not prepared to say. I have not had time to consider it. It is an involved question, demanding the consideration of the agreements which were confirmed last year and the agreement which is now presented for confirmation. If there is any haste about the matter, I may say that I do not want to inconvenience anybody, but if the third reading is allowed to stand until to-morrow I will endeavour to satisfy myself on the point, and if I am satisfied there is an end to the matter ; but I think I have reasonable ground for taking my present position. I do not wish to refer to anything that occurred in committee to-day. All I can say is that I was far from satisfied, and I do not know that counsel who appeared was quite well satisfied about the matter himself.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I will make no reference to what has been said in the committee, but my hon. friend is the only one who objected seriously to the Bill in its present form. This matter has been under consideration for a month by some of the ablest lawyers in Canada and members of the government, the members of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Rothschilds, represented by Mr. Aylesworth. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was represented by Mr. Chrysler and Mr. Shepley looked after the interests of the government ; and these people have been working out the terms of the agreement for months and months. The three parties have given their consent to the agreement, and after it has been ratified by the people who are to lend the money, the people who are to borrow the money and the government, who are to guarantee the transaction, surely it is not asking too much for a great undertaking of this kind to give the necessary consent. It is the first time in all my experience in this House or in the other chamber that an agreement in connection with a Bill was ever attacked. The agreements are very seldom read by members of the House, but I am sure this agreement received from the government and those interested in it the greatest possible consideration. I may say further that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company are waiting to let the contract with regard to this work, and the desire of the company is that they may be able to cable to England that the Bill has received its third reading in the Senate this afternoon. When the hon. senator who has charge of the Bill asked for the suspension of the rules, it was readily granted by this honourable House, and I trust the House will not be so ungenerous as to delay the passage of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I am going to ask the indulgence of the House for a moment or two before the Bill is read the third time. It may be quite true that Mr. Chrysler was quite satisfied with the Bill. He is acting for the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. It may be quite true that Mr. Aylesworth was satisfied with the Bill. He is acting for the Rothschilds, who are the purchasers of the bonds ; and it may be that Mr. Shepley has been up to this date satisfied, and would say so if the question were put to him ; but, so far as I know, he is the only person representing the public in connection with this negotiation. If he had given me the answer which Mr. Chrysler did to-day, and a little more positively than Mr. Chrysler, I might have been prepared to drop the matter. Clause 4 of the Bill reads as follows :

> 4. The power of the company to issue the bonds for the amounts severally provided for by the deeds of trust respectively mentioned in this Act shall not be deemed to be limited by the provisions of section 13 of chapter 122 of the statutes of 1903.

I do not want to go into a discussion of the matter, because I do not want to debate this question unless it is necessary to do so ; but I think it is a reasonable thing, when a question arises as to what the effect of that section is, that we should have twenty-four hours to consider it ; and I will undertake to say that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has not read the agreements in connection with this clause, and is not prepared to say what the effect of it is. If that be the case, why should he lecture me, and say it is unreasonable for me to ask to have it postponed ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has the hon. gentleman section 13 before him ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That is the section which provides for the limitation of bonds which are to be issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific. There are two classes of bonds being issued under this Act. There are the first mortgage bonds being issued to the amount of $30,000 a mile. There are second mortgage bonds, which are provided for to the extent of $20,000 a mile, and next to that there is the stock. Now, there is a limitation as to what the stock shall be. They are proposing by this section of the statute—I am not prepared to discuss it——

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman should be prepared.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I should be. I will take the reproof ; but I think I may say I am as well prepared to discuss it as he is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not profess to be able to argue the question.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Then we are proposing to hurry through this legislation without knowing what we are doing. I do not think that is quite proper, and I should not be rebuked because I am not prepared to discuss it. What I want to point out is that section 13 provides for the issue of bonds, and it limits the bonds. If that is not to be interfered with, then I have nothing more to say, but hon. gentlemen will observe clause 4 of this Bill will interfere with that section because the agreement provides for an increased amount of bond issue beyond the amounts named there. The agreement provides for an increased bond issue, which I am not objecting to, but then it says that the power of the company to issue bonds for the amounts severally provided for by the deeds of trust respectively mentioned in this Act shall not be deemed to be limited by the provisions of section 13 of chapter 122. Is anybody prepared to say what the effect of that is ? The limitation which is provided for in this section is no longer to be in force.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Pardon me. The limitation is no longer to be in force. The issue of bonds provided for in the agreement may be for a greater amount than is provided for in the Act. Then what is the effect of it ? Those are special bonds to issue under this agreement, and under this clause they are not to be limited by the conditions which are being put there. If that is so, does it not leave the matter in this way, that bonds may be issued without regard to the limitations provided for under section 13 ? If that is so, you are going to have an unlimited issue of bonds beyond what is provided for here, with reference to bonds outside of this agreement. I am not prepared to argue that that is the effect of the statute, but I say that there is enough in it to make us pause and see whether it should not be remedied. I was considering whether it could not be made sure by adding a line or two to clause 4, but I think it is necessary that that much should be done. I move in amendment that the third reading of this Bill be set down for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I perhaps did not read as much of the Bill as the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr), but he tells us he has read it three times and could not understand it. I should not like to admit that I had read a Bill three times and was not able to understand it. As I understood the explanation given by those who are acquainted with the subject, the only objection was that we were not in possession of the opinion of Mr. Shepley, the government lawyer, and that he was not before the committee. The government's lawyer is not interested in regard to this Bill. He has made the bargain on behalf of the government and he insisted on the limitation being abolished, for the reason that thirteen thousand dollars a mile is guaranteed by the agreement of the government with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but for any excess over that amount the guarantee is to be paid by the Grand Trunk Pacific themselves ; and that should not be altered. If the building of the line costs more money than the limitation put upon it by the government, then the Grand Trunk Pacific must provide that money, and hence the reason for no limitation, because the gentleman acting on behalf of the government said: If you limit them to $15,000 or $20,000 a mile, and you only guarantee thirteen thousand dollars of it, they will come back and say that the road cannot be built for that money, but give the government a limit to which you will guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific and any money required beyond that limit must be guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Pacific themselves. Does any one expect that the boudholders of this road or the people who are buying the bonds of the road, are going to give money for the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. if the amount of issue is not safeguarded in the manner provided. I may say to my hon. friend that the bonds for the portion of the line which does not receive a guarantee from the government at all—the line that they are building themselves from Port Arthur through to the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific, a distance of some 220 miles, were taken up three times over, and one-half of the amount was subscribed by the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—What has that to do with this matter?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It has everything to do with it. The hon. gentleman wants to draw a herring across the track by saying you are granting unlimited powers to the company—you are giving them unlimited bonding powers. The limitation is confined to the government, and no sane man will give a hundred cents on the dollar for a bond that is unlimited in the amount per mile. So far as that part of it is concerned the government or the Department of Finance is acting under the advice of Mr. Shepley. The people who are lending the money, the Rothschilds, retained Mr. Aylesworth to look after their interests, and the Grand Trunk Pacific retained Mr. Chrysler to act for them. My hon. friend knows very well, or at least he ought to know, because he has read the Bill three times, he tells us—and yet he says he doesn't know it—he ought to know that a limitation was put upon the government with reference to the paying out of money, but no limitation was put upon the Grand Trunk Pacific, as they have to construct the road no matter where it goes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I understand the position taken by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, I thought Mr. Chrysler, who addressed the committee on behalf of the Bill, was sufficiently clear upon that point. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly in reference to the clause to which he has called attention, his position was this; under the original agreement the government were to guarantee interest on bonds to the extent of $13,000 per mile upon the prairie section, but not to exceed that sum—and not more than $50,000 per mile on the mountain section. They have found, in making the calculation, that the cost will exceed $21,000 per mile on the prairie section, and will probably be a good deal more than $50,000 in the mountain section. The government have consented to this modification to the agreement, that they are not to be limited to the guarantee of $13,000 on the prairie section nor are they to be limited to the guarantee of three-fourths of the cost of the mountain section to the extent of $50,000. As I understood the hon. gentleman, that is unlimited; if it costs more than $13,000, the government takes its portion of responsibility. If the mountain section costs more than $50,000 they guarantee three-fourths of the cost of the construction throughout that section. That is the agreement which the government has made and for which the government is responsible.

I understood the hon. senator from Toronto to say that Mr. Chrysler spoke on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific and that he represented them; and that there was no one to represent the people in this matter. That is what I understood him to say; and it would imply a very grave want of confidence in the government of the day. The government have taken the responsibility of accepting this amended contract which has been approved by the Grand Trunk Pacific and by the government of the country, and by those who are to advance the money in England; and the people in England who are to advance the money say that unless these changes are made, they will refuse to advance the money. That I take to be the position at present. I should like to be able to say that I have the most unbounded confidence, as my hon. friend has, in the government of the day ; but I have not. The difficulty is that the government has consented to these changes. They have a sufficient force in the lower House to pass the measure and place it on the statute-book, and I question whether if you give my hon. friend a month to consider this question, he will be able to change a single sentence of the agreement. It has been given to us, and I believe that the supporters of the government in this House, notwithstanding any defect that the hon. gentleman from Toronto may point out in the wording of it, will pass it ; and for that reason I am not prepared to accept the suggestion, speaking for myself individually. I see no good that can possibly arise from it. We are committed as a country to this scheme, and there may be other changes which will have to be made before they complete this gigantic undertaking. I do not think at this stage it is advisable under the circumstances, and having in view the necessity for the company to get possession of money to go on with the work at the earliest possible moment, to prevent the passage of the Bill. I do not see that any good could arise from adopting the hon. gentleman's suggestion. If I thought it could, or that there was the slightest chance of changing a single word of the Bill I would vote for his proposition, but believing otherwise I shall not support it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend made a slip of the tongue when he referred to the $13,000 per mile on the prairie section. I know he did not mean it, but he indicated that that amount might be increased. It cannot ; it is a fixed amount. I listened to the discussion in the committee this morning between my hon. friend from Toronto and Mr. Chrysler who represented the company, and I must say there was one remark of Mr. Chrysler's, when we were making inquiries, to which I objected. He told us very peremptorily that he would not consent to any change in the Bill; but parliament can change anything. Parliament could throw out the Bill if it chose, and I commend the hon. gentleman from Toronto for having raised this question and stated his mind on it before it passes. I can hardly see the question in the same light as the hon. gentleman from Toronto. I was extremely well satisfied with Mr. Chrysler's explanation with regard to this matter. We are only limiting to a certain extent the power as provided in section 13. The words are very plain :

> The power of the company to issue the bonds for the amounts severally provided for by the deeds of trust respectively mentioned in this Act shall not be deemed to be limited by the provisions of section 13 of chapter 122 of the statutes of 1903.

As far as these deeds of trust are concerned, the power shall not be limited and the amounts that are set forth in these deeds of trust are the amounts of the bonds. That is the way I read it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is correct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's meaning is that it opens the door for a further issuing of bonds, beyond those contained in the deeds. I think the alteration is only to the extent of the amount of bonds covered by the deeds.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—There is a question about that. Let me call attention to the proposition. If the government, having their attention called to this, assume the responsibility of saying it is all right, I have no objection. That is to say, I relieve myself of responsibility by standing behind the government. Section 13 says that the company may issue bonds. It does say that those bonds shall be limited, to a certain amount ; but clause 4 amends that to a certain extent. That in one sense would be an alteration, even if that was the only thing about it. Then it goes on and provides in reference to the bonds for the mountain section, and so on. Now we have an agreement produced here under which certain bonds are to be issued on that road, and we have this clause. It is not an amendment to section 13, so as to conform to the agreement. It is to provide that, so far as these bonds are concerned, they may be issued to a larger amount than the amount named here. But look at the way in which it is done. It does not say that the bonds which are to be issued under this statute are to come under the agreement, but it leaves it open that both sets of bonds may be issued, and therefore, while we limit the capitalization of the company outside of the bonds, the door is being opened for the issuing of bonds intervening between the mortgage bonds and the stock.

'The power of the company to issue the bonds for the amounts severally provided for by the deeds of trusts respectively mentioned in this Act shall not be deemed to be limited by the provisions of section 13.' If this clause had provided that the issue of bonds under this Bill exhausted the power of section 13, and did so without a limitation, I would have been satisfied, but what I am not satisfied about is that the power of issuing bonds under section 13 of the original Act has been either repealed or controlled, but if the government are satisfied with that wording of it, and say that there will be no complication through new bonds going out hereafter, I have nothing more to say about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Has the hon. gentlemon from Toronto directed his attention to section 5, of article 4, schedule A.

Section 5. The provision made in the said agreement of the 18th day of February, 1904, in the words and figures following: 'Notwithstanding anything in the said contract contained, the government may and shall, preserving always the proportions in the said agreement provided as between the prairie and mountain sections of the western division, implement for the purposes and subject otherwise to the provisions of the said contract, its guarantee of the bonds of the said company to be issued for the cost of construction of the said western division, in such manner as may be agreed upon, so as to make the proceeds of the said bonds so to be guaranteed a sum equal to seventy-five per centum of the cost of construction of the western division ascertained as provided in the said contract, but not exceeding in respect of the prairie section thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) per mile, is brought into and made part of this mortgage, but no new or additional liability beyond such liability as the said provision may create or import, is intended to be, or is hereby imposed upon, or undertaken by the government.

There is no addition made to the government's liability. The hon. gentleman has told us, and correctly, that the company were allowed to issue bonds on the prairie section to the extent of $8,000 per mile, making with the $13,000 guaranteed by the government, $21,000. The counsel who appeared for the company alleged that it was ascertained that the road across the prairies would cost on an average about $21,500 a mile, so that if the limitation contained in the original agreement were preserved, there would be $500 a mile for which the means might not easily be found. Now, what does clause 4 of the Bill say:

4. The power of the company to issue the bonds for the amounts severally provided for by the deeds of trust respectively mentioned in this Act shall not be deemed to be limited by the provisions of section 13 of chapter 122 of the statutes of 1903.

Section 13 allowed an issue of only $8,000 a mile in addition to $13,000 a mile guaranteed by the government, and that limitation is taken away because it is found that it will be necessary for the company, under this agreement, to issue bonds for $500 a mile more. That does not affect in any way the powers of the company beyond that. The subsequent provision is based on the discovery that it would cost a little more on the mountain section. It was deemed necessary to insert this 4th clause, but the interests of everybody are protected. The parties were represented by eminent counsel. The result of conferences between the eminent counsel was submitted to the government and approved by them; it came before the House of Commons and this agreement was accepted without any question, and I think we had better assume that there is nothing very seriously wrong with the agreement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. gentleman from Halifax to say that the issue of bonds on the prairie section was limited to $8.000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I took the statement of the hon. gentleman from Toronto, who was reading from the original agreement, as being accurate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hold in my hand the Act, the 13th section of which permits the issue of debentures to the extent of $20,000 per mile, upon which the government guarantees the interest upon $13,000; and Mr. Chrysler pointed out that the $20,000 per mile would not cover the cost of construction. On the contrary, it would cost $21,000 per mile.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (176) An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, July 7, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MUTUAL RESERVE LIFE ASSOCIATION COMMITTEE ACCOUNTS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The motion being called :

By the Hon. Mr. CLORAN :

That the Senate give instructions to the proper officer of this honourable House to pay the balance of accounts due to the counsel at-law and expert witness for services rendered by them to the Special Committee appointed during the last session of the Senate, to investigate the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I may say that I have some of the papers I asked for in this matter, but the record which is now in my hands does not make me any wiser than I was before. It consists simply of the accounts, certified to by the chairman of the committee, a letter from Mr. Foster, an acknowledgment of the receipt of $500 on account, and a letter from the Deputy Minister of Justice. Those are all the papers I have been furnished with, and they do not give me the information I require in order to lay the matter before the House. I therefore ask that the motion be allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

The motion was allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

ERROR IN MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct attention to an error in the minutes of yesterday's proceedings. At page 645 it is stated that on motion of the Hon. Mr. Watson, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Young, it was ordered that the 70th rule of this House be dispensed with in so far as it relates to the said Bill—that is, the Bill respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Company—and that the said Bill be now read the third time. The motion made by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie was that the 70th rule be dispensed with in so far as it related to this Bill, and that motion was adopted unanimously. Then the hon. gentleman moved the third reading of the Bill, upon which there was rather a prolonged discussion. The minutes, therefore, are inaccurate; there were two motions instead of one.

GRAZING LEASES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed, moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the table of the Senate a return of :

The number of closed grazing leases granted since 1897 by the government in the North-west Territories, together with the following information relating thereto : The number of acres in each lease, the date when, and time for which granted ; the parties to whom granted, and by whom at present held ; the rental per acre, and the township and range in which situate.

He said: I move this in the absence of the hon. senator from Calgary, because I am under the impression that he desires this information, or as much of it as he can obtain, before the consideration of an important Bill which is to come before the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENT OF WM. A. DAMEN BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (M) an Act respecting a patent of William A. Damen. He said: The amendments are three in number. They are not important and they are in the right direction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman inform the House why the time is extended two years in this instance, while in other Bills sent from the Senate to the House of Commons the time has been reduced from one year to six months, and if the patentees do not commence to manufacture in this country within the next six months their rights under the law cease. In this instance the time has been extended from six months to two years, and the House would like to know why this has been done. My own impression is that we are dealing altogether too leniently in the interests of the trade of the country with these patentees. We have had this year some half dozen or more of these Bills where the inventors or those who have purchased the inventions or obtained patents in Canada have not taken a single step towards the manufacture of the article patented. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to tell us why the time has been extended in this case?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I do not know that I can give the exact explanation, because I was not present at the time the amendments were proposed and made. This Bill, which originated in this House, was simply an Act of last session which dealt with several patents. One patent was omitted and this Bill is simply to amend that Act so that this patent, which was omitted, shall form part of that Act and be dealt with as the others are. Why the time was extended I am not quite sure, but they seemed to think it would be reasonable to grant the extension. Every one seems to be fully protected. Any one who has begun to manufacture can go on manufacturing, so no harm can accrue to anybody.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Act which he proposes to amend extended the time of the patentees for two years? I have no recollection of that time. The hon. gentleman says that the extension of the time to two years will not interfere with the rights of any one. The restriction for which it provides is that if this article has not been made in the country up to the present time, no one may manufacture it except the patentee. Under the law as it stands, if any one has commenced the manufacture of an article after the patent has expired he may continue to manufacture it. That is the case where the extension granted is six months; this extends the time to two years instead of six months. Would it not be well to let the Bill stand until next week, and in the meantime the hon. gentleman can ascertain the facts and let us know.

The order was allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 173) An Act respecting the St. Maurice Valley Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

TRELAWNEY DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg), in the absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed, moved the adoption of the thirty-sixth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Trelawney.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one point in connection with this divorce Bill to which attention should be directed. The evidence has not been distributed, and while under ordinary circumstances I should not, perhaps, call attention to that fact, I find the committee in the other House—and I hope it is not a breach of privilege to make the statement—have only to-day thrown out a divorce Bill passed by this House on the ground that the evidence did not satisfy them. I think we had better be careful about concurring in a divorce Bill unless we are satisfied with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not oppose the motion, but I do not think it is wise to pass it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I should like to say in connection with this Bill, that the case was heard yesterday, a little late in the session, on account, I believe, of trouble in getting some evidence. The case was closed yesterday, and the committee were ready to report the evidence, and I understand the case was very clear. Now, the party applying for the divorce and some of the witnesses had to come all the way from Winnipeg, and some also from Montreal, at considerable expense. The lady, I understand, is not at all in circumstances to come back another session, and if there is any delay now it is not probable that the Bill will be passed this session. I think the committee were very clear about the case, and perhaps some members of that committee might explain it. I understand the evidence was to be distributed by three o'clock, but it has not been done. I think it would be a hardship if the lady were compelled to apply for a divorce next session.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I was going to remark that the whole system of divorce is crude and out of form, and not consistent with the spirit of the age. It is only suitable for people who can afford to come here with their witnesses, and a poor man is shut out altogether from the benefits of divorce. I am not in favour of divorces; I would like to have them confined in every instance to the doctrine laid down by our Saviour. In the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, a Supreme Court judge, with an extra salary, disposes of all cases of divorce. The evidence is never printed ; no one knows anything about it. But the evidence taken before the Divorce Committee of the Senate is scattered about this House and the other chamber, picked up by the charwomen about the place, and distributed among the children, and I am sure it is not the most healthful and pleasant reading that people could have. It is time that we should consider the necessity of reform in the system of granting divorces. Mr. Charlton, when appealing to the people at the last general election, stated that he intended to bring in a Bill to change the present system. I remember a case of a man from Ontario whose divorce Bill was passed in this House, and the woman in question had a relation among the members from the province of Ontario, in the other chamber. At that time the members from the province of Quebec were much more strict in their ideas with regard to divorce—at least publicly so—than they are at present, and in every case they voted against divorces. With the influence that this member possessed among certain of his friends he obtained a majority with the aid of the members from Quebec, and they defeated the Bill in the other chamber. Before the next session of parliament this member from Ontario died, and the applicant for divorce came back the second time, produced the same evidence in this House, and the Bill passed both Houses. Where would a poor man be in that case? Our whole system is calculated to prevent the poor man from receiving the same justice as the rich man. I think in this, as in many other respects, it would be well for the wise men in this House to adopt the system that has been so successful in the lower provinces. We have given certain lessons in reform to the other provinces, and I think this should be one of them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Could the hon. gentleman inform us how many divorces have been granted in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Very few indeed, I am happy to say. I cannot state the number, but I think there are very few indeed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I must correct my hon. friend with regard to Prince Edward Island. The Supreme Court of the province has nothing to do with divorces. The Governor in Council has power to hear divorce cases and to grant divorces. We have not had one case in fifty years.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am exceedingly sorry that my hon. friend from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr) had not noticed the evidence in this case was not printed and distributed before he moved in the matter. I can say for the information of the House that in my limited experience in connection with the business usually brought before the Divorce Committee, there has never been a case in which more positive evidence has been produced of the justice of granting a lady release than in this very case. This woman was subjected to persecution for twelve years by a man who never should have been privileged under the law to have a wife. She was subjected to intolerable experiences, and the committee after hearing the evidence decided to report the Bill. I am sorry the evidence is not before the House. With regard to the Hersey case, I regret that the House of Commons have felt it their duty to take up the matter before a committee without any reference to the Senate. I think if the committee had reported recommending that the Bill be sent back to the Senate with instructions to take further evidence on certain points, that would only have been the courtesy to which we are entitled. We could have done so, or we could have given the parties notice to appear again and satisfy us upon the points to which the Commons took exception, but we passed the Bill on the evidence produced. They have submitted the question to a committee of their own, and I do not know what further action may be taken; but whatever they do I think the committee of the Senate has not received that courteous treatment at the hands of the Commons which they should have received.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I can see no reason why this report should not be received on the present occasion. If to adopt the report was in any way to affirm the principle of the Bill, then I could understand my hon. friend wishing to read the evidence; but this is not the case. It is merely proposed to receive the report from the Divorce Committee and when the Bill comes up for third reading, if there be any reason why the evidence should be before us, we can have it then. The Committee on Divorce is not in any way to blame for the evidence not being here. We have not full control of the Printing Bureau or we would have had the evidence printed to-day. It was not the intention of the committee nor of the one who has charge of the report to slight this House in any way. I am sure my hon. friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) will waive his objection and will see that it is perfectly right to receive the report on the present occasion. On the third reading objection can be taken as he may think proper. As far as the evidence is concerned, I cordially agree with my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen). Some people think there are no cases where a divorce should be granted—but if there be a case on record wherein a separation between husband and wife is justified, it is the present case. More unjust treatment no wife could have received at the hands of the husband. The husband is not objecting to the divorce. He feels that he is a guilty party and ought to be separated from an apparently noble woman. The evidence is positive; the acts on account of which we grant divorce were thoroughly proven by more than one witness. This Bill will have to be passed by the House of Commons and it may perhaps receive the same treatment as was dealt out in the Hersey case if they shut their eyes to the evidence. Perhaps the Commons will say: It is too late in the session ; we have not an opportunity of examining this Bill carefully and we will throw it out. I appeal to the hon. members of this House if they ever did an act of justice to accept the report of the committee on the present occasion.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I regret exceedingly the absence of the acting chairman (Hon. Mr. Lougheed.) I know that he gave directions that the evidence should be printed and in the hands of the members before this hour of the day. There seems to be a necessity to push the matter along as rapidly as possible owing to the fact that the Bill has to pass the other House, and in view of early prorogation there is no time to be lost. Any one who knows that hon. gentleman knows that he is incapable in any respect of doing a thing which ought not to be done. He has a most profound respect for this body and every member of it. I cannot as a member of the committee, however, refrain from making an observation with reference to the remarks made by the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Ross)—the baby, shall we call him, of the Senate. He characterized our divorce proceedings as altogether crude and out of date. I beg to differ, with all possible respect, from the hon. gentleman in that regard. The proceedings before the Divorce Committee have been assimilated as nearly as may be to the course of procedure in cases in the High Court of Justice in Ontario, and I speak of Ontario because I am well acquainted with the proceedings in that province. The rules of evidence are as carefully guarded and as closely adhered to as in proceedings before the High Court in important cases in the province of Ontario. Every precaution is taken that no undue haste shall characterize the proceedings, and that no snap judgment shall be obtained as against any person, but that everything shall be done openly and above board, under the solemn sanctity of an oath. I will say for my colleagues, of whom there are eight, that they are most painstaking and careful men in regard to weighing the evidence, and I am convinced that the evidence is abundantly strong enough to sustain any report that is brought into this House. In this particular case—hon. gentleman will recollect my words when they receive the evidence—the unfortunate respondent, the unregenerate scion, I am sorry to say, of an old and highly respected Cornish family, known for generations in England—the Trelawney family—by his own letters, under his own hand and signature, addressed to his wife, admitted his guilt in reference to the charges on which these proceedings were based. In addition to his own letters, we have the evidence of respectable witnesses corroborating these statements; so that if there ever was a clear case this is one. I hope the Senate will take this view of it and that they will concur in this report and fix the third reading for Monday next. If the case is not ready on Monday, adjourn it until Tuesday, and if not ready on Tuesday it could be again adjourned, but in the meantime no time should be lost in view of the fact that the Bill has to pass the other chamber. Now, there is a popular impression abroad in Ontario that the proceedings in divorce cases in the Senate are intended for the rich men and not for the poor man. Would hon. gentleman be surprised when I tell them that during the seven years during which I have had the honour of serving upon the Divorce Committee, there has not been a single case in which any one who could be called a rich person has been before the committee either as petitioner or respondent. Nearly all of the parties to these cases have been in humble circumstances.

Whether the rich get divorces or not, they have not applied for them to this parliament. They may go somewhere else, and I am willing that they should do so. Perhaps they go across the line, but they do not come here. I hope that idea will not prevail one minute longer in the mind of any member, because it is not a proceeding for rich people, but for those who are poor and deserve relief. If they deserve relief they will get it, but not otherwise, because in principle I shudder at the idea of divorce. However, as long as we tolerate these proceedings I will recommend that divorce be granted when the evidence warrants it. I had not intended to say so much, but when I heard the hon. senator from Nova Scotia, for whose right judgment and wisdom I have profound respect, I thought it necessary to speak. I hope he will not think that in acting as I do I have abated one jot or title for my respect for him as a man whom I have known intimately in the other House as well as here for thirty or thirty-five years. I should like the Senate to feel that they should concur in this report, but they need not finally dispose of the Bill until the evidence is printed and in the hands of every senator. In that way they will have time to consider and act intelligently on it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does not the hon. gentleman think it would be far better to have a divorce court in this country where cases could be heard more carefully and expeditiously. For years I was a member of the Divorce Committee. I gave it up because I saw many members did not weigh the evidence brought before them and were apt to be carried away by their feelings. Some years ago I introduced a Bill in this House when Mr. (afterwards Sir John) Abbott was premier, to establish a divorce court in Canada—making the Exchequer Court a divorce court. That Bill was read a second time in this House, but Mr. Abbott found that the feeling of the Roman Catholic members against a Bill of that kind was so strong that he advised me to withdraw it. On his advice I did so, but I still think there ought to be a divorce court in this country. England, old fashioned as we know her to be, has done away with parliamentary divorce and established a court of divorce, and such a court ought to be established here.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—In reply to the hon. gentleman who has made a remark about myself, I do not know what his ideas are with regard to the rich and poor who apply for divorce. We had a case here the other day from Winnipeg. Suppose the applicant had been a labouring man, do you think he would have been able to attend and bring his witnesses here and get justice? I had the idea long ago that Ontario was the great reform part of this Dominion and many representatives from that province run away with that idea themselves. But if they would be the reformers they claim to be, there is room enough for them to institute a reform in this instance, and create a divorce court such as exists in the province of Nova Scotia. An hon. gentleman opposite asked me how many divorces have been granted in Nova Scotia. I am not sure, but I think I am within the mark when I say that within the last year there have not been more than two or three cases within the whole province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—How many since 1868?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I have not the information here. The beauty of it there is that none of the evidence taken in divorce cases is published. Either the divorce is granted or refused, and that is all the public will know. Here every Tom, Dick and Harry may read a lot of trashy literature which is not fit for any one to read.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am really surprised at the open advocacy of divorce by the patriarchs of the Canadian people. In the United States, where divorce has become quite a habit, in England, where divorce is very limited, and in France and other countries where divorce is raging, public opinion is turning against divorce courts, and if the people of Canada had their ears to the walls of the Senate and listened to the advocacy of divorce by my hon. colleagues they would stand aghast. It is an awful thing to break up a home ; it is practically a crime against society to do so. Such is the feeling of the most temperate minds in all countries. I have in my hand a report of a resolution passed in London, Eng., by the united clergy of the English Church, which reads as follows:

AGAINST DIVORCES.

London Diocesan Conference Has Taken Action.

London, May 18.—The London diocesan conference now in session here under the presidency of the bishop of London, the Right Rev. Arthur F. Ingram, passed a resolution to-day demanding an amendment of the English marriage law, as to preclude the re-marriage in church of divorced persons during the lifetime of the other party to the proceedings. An attempt to modify the resolution in favour of permitting the re-marriage in church of the innocent party was defeated by a large majority.

Now, there is an instance of the Christian and civilized feeling of England. In the United States, on the other hand, in the state of New Jersey a few weeks ago the Roman Catholic archbishop went before the House Judiciary Committee at Jefferson City and urged the passage of legislation introduced by Representative Grace, and this is what the archbishop said:

Unless we have the home the country fails. It is the cornerstone of our civilization. An enemy of the home is an enemy of the state. Every divorce is the destruction of a home. The more divorces the more injury to the state and our moral well-being. Any restriction making for the unity of the home is good. In asking you to support this Bill I do so asking for the betterment of the country. Every opportunity we give for divorce attacks morality and individuals. Every divorce is a slap in the face of a woman. Divorce is an attack on children. Most of the divorcees are childless. When they have children the situation is worse. Marriage relations are naturally debased. We talk of divorce as we do of trading horses. In Canada there were only fourteen divorces last year. There were only 289 in England last year.

Is not the Senate the enemy of the home when it facilitates the breaking up of the home ? I could quote sentiments equally serious pronounced by people in other countries who have at heart the welfare of society, but I have read expressions of opinion in England and the United States which we should entertain in this honourable House, and instead of making divorce easy we ought to make it difficult. I am not against the separation of man and wife when they cannot live with one another, but I am against granting them a renewal of the marriage tie. Why? Simply because you encourage them if they do not suit one another in the second marriage to try a third and a fourth, breaking up the home. Although I am not going to express an opinion on this Bill in the absence of the evidence, I may say that as men who should stand for safeguarding the home and society, it is not pleasant to hear hon. gentlemen advocating the breaking up of homes for the sake of mawkish sentiment. I believe those women and men who seek divorce do suffer, but it is a general principle that the individual must suffer for the general welfare. There is nothing going on in the world where some individual interest is not attacked, where some private interest does not suffer, and so in the moral and in the Christian life of this country individuals will have to suffer for the general benefit and welfare of mankind. If you open the courts to easy divorce, what will happen here? We will have in Canada what is now going on in other countries. In the United States last year they had 27,000 divorces and in France 25,000. I have before me the statement of a clergyman who held up Canada as an example for the rest of the civilized world, because in 1901 only 14 divorces were granted in the Dominion; in 1902 only 19, and Canada has been held up as the country where the home is protected. This year the Senate is passing probably 30 or 35 divorces—doubling the number.

Some Hon. GENTLEMAN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There are quite too many, and I hope this honourable House instead of seeking to make divorce easy will make it more difficult.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call attention to the fact that this is not the question before the House. The question before us is whether this Bill should be read a third time, and not whether it is advisable to establish a divorce court.

When that question comes before the Senate I have no doubt this House will treat it intelligently, but let us confine ourselves to the question before us.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—For the benefit of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Ross) I should like to read the number of divorces granted in Canada from 1868 to 1903.

By the court in Nova Scotia	119
" New Brunswick	78
" British Columbia	61
Total	258
Granted by parliament :—
Ontario	53
Quebec	18
Northwest Territories	4

Yet the hon. gentleman tells us that the divorce courts will be a benefit.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have no feeling in the matter, but this is an important question and what is the Senate doing? It is practically granting a divorce without having the evidence before it. I submit there is no excuse for doing so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I am the cause, I suppose, of this discussion, perhaps I might be allowed to say a word or two. It is understood, of course, that the members of the church to which I belong do not vote for the divorce Bills. At the same time, speaking for myself, I may say I have never been in the habit of interposing technical difficulties in the way of granting these divorces. If the Senate, as a court, thinks that under its practice a divorce should be granted I do not feel that I have anything to say. I vote against the motion, but do not believe that I should raise technical difficulties. I have called attention to this matter for the purpose to some extent of getting information. I do not think we should be expected to vote without understanding something of the evidence. Now, we have from three members of the committee charged with the duty of hearing the evidence direct and positive statements that the evidence in this case was of the most revolting character, and that there is no question whatever but that under the practice of the Senate the divorce should be granted. That being the situation, and inasmuch as there is an expectation that we may have prorogation by the end of next week, and inasmuch as perhaps the delay from to-day until Monday might hinder the other branch of parliament from dealing with this question, I do not undertake to interpose any technical objection in the way of the progress of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must say that in all my experience I have never known a Bill of this character to be passed without the evidence being before the House. The acting chairman of the Divorce Committee presented the report last night with the evidence. The clerk has sent the evidence to the printer, and it has not been printed and distributed yet. I remember not long ago objecting to the adoption of a report on the ground that we had not had time to read the evidence and judge for ourselves. We all know that there is only one offence which we consider sanctions the granting of a divorce, and we decide on the propriety of granting divorces after seeing the evidence. I have no doubt that what the hon. gentlemen who are members of the committee have said is quite correct, but I want to be convinced for myself, and I do not think we ought to adopt the report until we have had an opportunity to read the evidence. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has made the announcement in this House to-day and also yesterday that parliament is to be prorogued at the latter end of next week. I should like to know on what authority that statement is made. Has the hon. Secretary of State relegated his duty to the hon. gentleman to state when parliament is to prorogue?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was simply speaking of hearsay from members of the other House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—As the House is not in a position to consider the report after the discussion to-day, I think it would be as well to postpone the matter until Monday. I hope the hon. gentlemen will facilitate the passing of the Bill. My reason for making this a matter of urgency is that I was informed by a prominent member of the opposition that we are liable to have prorogation next Thursday.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The report can only be advanced one stage to-day. The House is not asked to read the Bill the third time to-day, and before the third reading comes up the evidence will be in the hands of every member. If it does not corroborate the positive statements made by three members of the Divorce Committee it is open to the House to throw out the Bill.

The report was adopted on a division.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 58) An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 159) An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is to carry on proceedings during the interval between the time the Territories are erected into provinces and the adoption of legislation by the local legislatures. There will be a number of Bills of the same character which must be passed this session.

The Bill was read the first time.

NORTHWEST IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 161) An Act to amend the Northwest Irrigation Act, 1898.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The lands of the Northwest, or those belonging to the Crown, will continue to be vested in the Crown as represented by the federal government.

This authorizes the necessary rules and regulations with regard to irrigation matters to be made under the authority of Orders in Council passed at Ottawa. The matter will still be under control at Ottawa.

The Bill was read the first time.

CENSUS AND STATISTICS BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 163) An Act to amend the Census and Statistics Act.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that the Bill be read the second time on Monday next. He said: This Bill provides for the taking of a quinquennial census for the new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, as in the case of Manitoba.

The motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF RULES OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—A note has been placed in my hands—and I presume in the hands of all hon. gentlemen in the House—stating that at the meeting of the Senate on Monday the report of the committee appointed to revise the rules of the Senate will be considered. There are several hon. gentlemen who are not present to-day who would like to be in the chamber when the question is discussed, and I suggest that the matter be taken up on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think at this stage of the session the request is unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is not unreasonable. Monday is an awkward day for members living in the west.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the hon. gentleman's opinion, but not the opinion of others. It is current rumour that we are to have prorogation next week, and it will not be wise or prudent to postpone the consideration beyond Monday. If the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss these rules and orders—and I think that probably he is one of the members who would like to discuss the report of the committee—he had better be present on Monday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not often that I agree with the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), but I think in this case his request is very reasonable. There are a great many changes suggested, to some of which hon. members may object, and there ought to be time to consider them, even if we do not adopt them this session. I am not going to characterize the proceedings of the committee in any particular way, but I am somewhat busy in looking after my own business and my duties as a member of the House, and I have not had time to go through these rules. I have been in the committee, but not there all the time, and I ask for further time to consider these matters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there will be time enough when the Order of the Day is called.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes, that is quite right.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the request made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria and the hon. leader of the opposition is a reasonable one. There are many of us who have not read the suggested changes in the rules. It is something that we are all very much interested in. I think every hon. gentlemen in this House desires to abide by our rules, and we should all like an opportunity of discussing them. I could not understand them by reading them over once. Some people might say that I would never understand them. However, I require more time than from to-day until Monday to consider the subject and, therefore, I think it is a reasonable request to make.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Victoria, the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. In fact, when this matter comes up for discussion I would be prepared to support a motion to let the whole matter stand till next session.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The committee to whom was assigned the duty of revising the rules spent a great deal of time in this matter, as the nature of the work naturally calls for a great deal of consideration, and the House to consider the result must be specially summoned. While there would be no desire on anybody's part to rush through a matter of so much importanec as the rules of the House, I would suggest, as the House has been summoned to consider the rules on Monday, that we commence on Monday and go over the rules, many of which are repetitions, slowly and deliberately. Many rules are at present in our book and I have no doubt hon. gentlemen have read them a great many times, and we can proceed in this way until we come to some contentious matter which might be allowed to stand until the next day. If we do not take action at once and either approve or disapprove of the work of the committee, it will have to stand until another year and we will practically have to go through the same work. We will be compelled to use the rules which are at present in force because it is not advisable to change the rules during a session, and it is very desirable that these rules may be adopted and come into force immediately on the prorogation of this House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am glad the hon. gentleman from Victoria referred to this matter, because I am one who is anxious for information. The House is summoned to consider this question on Monday evening next. I do not know whether we have any precedent for a House, summoned to consider a question of revision or making of rules, adjourning and meeting again without a fresh summons. I am not clear as to whether there will have to be a new summons in order to get us together to consider these rules. I think very little will be gained by entering upon the consideration on Monday. These rules are very voluminous. I attended nearly all the meetings—all but one, I think—and gave all the time I could spare and all the attention I could to the matter, but I should like a little longer time to consider these matters—that is, if the meeting on Monday must be a final one to go right through the rules, and if we cannot meet again without a fresh summons.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I cannot accept the proposal of the hon. gentleman from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young). I think that this report should be taken into consideration at the next session of parliament. The committee has been considering this question for nearly six months. They have just made a report, and if they expect this House to pass this report in six days, or ten days at most, I cannot agree to that. Common sense would show that we could not be prepared to pass in six days what has taken them six months to prepare.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that the experience of the past would lead any one to suppose that there was ever any disposition in this House to force a measure through against the wish of any considerable number of the members. It seemed to me there had to be certain formalities gone through in connection with this report—the senators had to be specially summoned. That has been done, and I object now to undoing it. If any hon. gentleman who looks at the matter seriously states on Monday that he is not prepared to agree to the adoption of a particular rule, then I assume the House will postpone the consideration of that rule to a later date. That will not involve the necessity of summoning the members, as they have been summoned already; because, having once been summoned, if the consideration of the rules is adjourned, I do not think that any further summons will be necessary. The hon. gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. de Boucherville) has referred to the fact that this committee has been sitting for nearly six months. It is perfectly true it is nearly six months since the committee was appointed. It was appointed on the 18th or 19th of January; but the committee have held only ten or eleven meetings, because the Senate has been so constantly adjourning from time to time during the six months that it was almost impossible to sandwich in a meeting of this committee between two adjournments. As the report states, the points upon which there was any difference in the committee are very few, and these points can be considered and discussed at length, but the greater part of the report is simply a re-enactment of the old rules.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask if there is any information which the hon. leader can give us in reference to the result of the arbitration between the government and the Grand Trunk in connection with the non-fulfilment of the terms of the bargain made with them in reference to the Drummond County road.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I communicated with Mr. Schreiber, who is supposed to know all about the matter, and he has sent me the following memo:

The board of arbitrators is composed of the following:
Mr. A. E. Killam, Chairman.
Judge Davidson, Grand Trunk arbitrator.
Mr. George F. Shepley, government arbitrator.
There have been a number of sittings of the board and much evidence has been taken, but the case is not closed, an adjournment for a few weeks having been made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the appointment of Judge Killam as chairman of the Arbitration Board interfere with his duties as chairman of the Railway Commission?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He still remains chairman of the Board of Arbitration?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me rather anomalous that the chairman of the Railway Commission should be appointed on the Arbitration Board because the matters being heard by the arbitrators might be referred to the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He was nominated as an arbitrator before he was appointed Chairman of the Railway Commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that, but the question is whether his appointment to the chairmanship would interfere with his duties as arbitrator.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should hope not.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—However, I have every confidence in that gentleman.

The Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, July 10, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CANADIAN NORTHERN AND GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAYS.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the government a question. I see in the newspapers a report to the effect that the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company have amalgamated their interests in some respects. I do not know how far this amalgamation goes, and would ask the government whether they know anything of it? Is it intended that the Grand Trunk Pacific is to utilize the line of the Canadian Northern across the prairie section?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never heard anything of this matter until I saw it in the newspapers, nor do I think it has ever come before the government.

AUTONOMY BILL.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend if the Autonomy Bill will be down to-day?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am expecting it momentarily.

TRELAWNEY DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the third reading of Bill (II) An Act for the relief of Agnes Hedevig Helga Salusbury Trelawney.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I should like to ask whether the evidence in connection with this case was distributed to every member of the House, or only to certain members ? If it has not been distributed to every member we should not proceed with the case.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It was distributed to all the members on Friday last.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the evidence was in the possession of one of the officers of the House at the time we were discussing the question on Friday. I had evidence to that effect.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—We should not proceed until every member of this House has received the evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say that I received my copy on Friday evening. It was in my box at the post office, and I suppose that is the case with other members as well.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time.

On the question : That the Bill do now pass,

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I object again.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What is the objection ?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The objection is that I have not received the evidence in this case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We can readily appreciate the fact that it would be impossible for this chamber to satisfy itself that every member had received a copy from the proper officer of the House. As a matter of fact, this evidence was distributed among the members, and I fancy most of the members, if not all, excepting my hon. friend, received the usual copy. These copies are usually inclosed in an envelope and very often put into one's box in the post office, without any attention being paid to the fact that the evidence is intended for the particular purpose of accompanying the Bill. If my hon. friend were to look among his papers in the post office box he might discover it there.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I cannot agree with the statement that it would be very difficult to ascertain whether a Bill has been distributed to all the members or not. When a member gets up in his place in the House and says that he has not received the Bill, his statement should not be called in question, unless some one is able to show that he is not speaking the truth.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend entirely misunderstands what I have said ; I did not reflect in the slightest on my hon. friend from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Bernier). What I intended to convey was that it would be utterly impossible to determine whether or not the evidence had been distributed unless each member were to state in his place in the House that he had received it. Of course, my hon. friend apparently has not received his copy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I asked the postmaster whether the evidence was distributed on Friday last, and he said it was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I received mine on Friday night, immediately after the adjournment of the House. It was brought from the post office to my room.

The SPEAKER—The third reading of the Bill has been passed and we are now on the question, that the Bill do now pass. If necessary the vote may be challenged.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—My objection is not precisely to the Bill itself, but to the method of proceeding. It is to my mind very objectionable. I have stated that I did not receive a copy of the evidence in this case, and then I asked whether the House should proceed with such a Bill until the evidence had been distributed to every member. It is said that many other members have received their copy of the evidence. In that case the question arises whether all the members are to be furnished with a copy of the evidence, and if not how many have been passed over.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is scarcely proper to proceed with the Bill if any hon. gentleman rises and states that he has not received a copy of the evidence. I think we might reasonably delay action if my hon. friend is prepared to give us an assurance that he will vote for the Bill if he finds the evidence amply satisfactory. He appears to be the only gentleman who has not received the evidence, as no other person has complained. If my hon. friend is prepared to give us his word that he will support the Bill if time is given him to obtain the evidence, I think his request should be granted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—We might find some supplementary evidence against the Bill.

The Bill then passed on a division.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I rise to a question of privilege. As I have said, it is not so much the Bill before us that concerns me as the rule of the House. It is a question of procedure. Should the House pass over the statement of an hon. gentleman in this chamber that he has not been furnished with a copy of the evidence which by the rules he is entitled to have ?

REVISION OF RULES, ORDERS AND FORMS OF THE SENATE.

The Order of the Day being called.

Consideration of the Third Report of the Special Committee appointed to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of proceeding of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the notice in regard to this matter was given on Friday last, there was some little discussion with respect to the procedure to be adopted in dealing with this report, and I wish to state what I look upon as being the correct method. Inasmuch as a large committee of this House has devoted a great deal of time and attention to these rules, and inasmuch as the committee were almost unanimous as to their decisions with regard to the rules, and amongst other matters were unanimous in adopting a resolution to the effect that the rules should come into operation immediately at the close of this session, I think it would not be desirable that there should be any unnecessary delay in dealing with the report. At the same time the rules of the House are an important matter, and if we come across any rule to which an hon. gentleman takes special exception, I think, speaking as one of the committee, I should be quite prepared to let the rule stand over till the next meeting of the House for further consideration but I submit, under all the circumstances of the case, there should not be any unnecessary waste of time. Unless there is some very urgent business that would take precedence of it, I propose to move that the report be now adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we adhere strictly to the rules, we are prevented from discussing the merits of this report on the motion which has been made. The hon. gentleman has said these rules were adopted almost unanimously, but there are some very important rules on which the committee were not unanimous. I do not think at the present time we can give them that consideration which a matter of this character really merits. A great many changes are suggested. Some of them are copied, as the hon. gentleman said the other day, from Australia, and some from other parts of the world. Some have been adopted from the English rules and practice. There are two or three to which I take serious objection, which I will point out when we come to them. Under the circumstances it would be much better, at this stage of the session, not to press the motion for the adoption of the report or even for its consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not know that I am in a position to say anything on this question, because I have not attended any of the meetings of the committee, although my name was placed there by the hon. chairman of the committee. I have been prevented by ill-health during the greater part of the session, from attending the meetings of that committee or of any other committee of the House. Under the circumstances, I do not know that I have much right to find fault with the chairman for pressing the report on our consideration now, but I think it would be very unwise and impolitic to attempt to press these rules through this session. In the first place we are understood to be in the last week of the session, in the sweltering heat of July, and I say it would be impossible to give these rules the consideration they deserve in the time at our disposal. The revision of the rules on the present occasion is the most extensive and important that has ever taken place in this House. A number of changes, additions and innovations have been made, and it would be impossible for the Senate, in less than two or three weeks, to go through these rules and revise them carefully as they ought to be revised, coming from the committee. With my experience of business in this House, it would be impossible to do that work as it ought to be done under two or three weeks. There is no urgency in this matter; we can get on very well with the present rules this session, and it is just the sort of work to be done next February, in the cold weather, instead of taking it up in hot weather like this, which debilitates even the younger men of the House. It would be a most unwise thing to attempt to put these rules through during the present session. For my own part I shall not take any part in the revision of the rules because I do not feel strong enough to do so, but probably next session I shall be better able to take part. In view of innovations and changes in the rules requiring careful and prolonged attention and discussion before they pass this House, I suggest that the report be postponed until next year.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The suggestion made by the hon leader of the opposition that the rules should be considered in Committee of the Whole is a wise and judicious one, and for my part I shall be very glad to adopt the course he proposes. I, therefore, with the permission of the House, would substitute that for the motion I have made. Hon. gentlemen must remember that these rules have been before the committee from almost the beginning of the present session. As I intimated a while ago, there was no difference in the committee as to the time the rules should go into operation, and if they do not go into operation from the end of this session it will be the end of next session before they can be put into force. I think that is an undesirable condition of things. There is, for instance, one rule which proposes to make it the duty of the Speaker to preserve order and decorum. This is a matter in which the committee were unanimous, and I think it is desirable that that rule should become law. The committee is a large one, consisting of twelve or thirteen of the oldest parliamentarians. They held several meetings, and the differences of opinion which arose in the committee were confined to three or four rules. As to these three or four rules, the House may possibly adopt the opinion of those who do not concur in the rules as they appear in the report; but I think, after the trouble the committee have taken and under all the circumstances of the case, it would be an unwise matter to postpone the consideration of the report and let all the work of this session go for nothing. I wish to direct the attention of the House to the manner in which a like subject was dealt with on the last occasion when the revision of the rules was before the House. In the journals of the Senate for 1894, I find this entry on the 29th March, at page 34:

> The Hon. Mr. Power, from the special committee appointed to consider and revise, or add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate, presented the following as their report. Ordered that it be received, and the same was then read by the clerk as follows:

And then follows the report. Immediately after the reception of the report is this entry:

> On motion of the Hon. Mr. Bowell, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Power, it was ordered that rules fourteen and eighteen of the Senate be suspended in so far as the same relate to the report of the special committee appointed to consider and revise and add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceedings of the Senate.
> The Hon. Mr. Power moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Pelletier, that the said report be now adopted. The question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and ordered accordingly.

The whole matter was disposed of on the same afternoon that the report was presented. While I admit more changes have been made in the present instance than were made in 1894, there were some changes made in 1894, and in the present instance the difference of opinion is confined to some three or four rules. I move, therefore, that the report of the committee be now referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose in asking this House to make new rules, the first thing to do is to follow the old rules, and I do not see that an hon. member has a right to make two motions simultaneously.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman asked leave to withdraw the first motion.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—The first motion was not put. Therefore the hon. gentleman cannot make a second motion until the first has been disposed of. He asked leave to withdraw his first motion, and we must take that motion first.

The SPEAKER—The question is, will the House permit him to withdraw his first motion?

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then go on with the original motion.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I understand the original motion of the hon. gentleman is before the Senate. I have been strongly opposed to going any further with the rules this session at all, and I think that there are many other members of the House of the same opinion. I am one of the younger members of this House—I came into the Senate four years ago. Several rather knotty questions of order came up during my first session, and to my surprise the older members of the Senate, gentlemen who had been here for a quarter of a century, were not agreed on the points of order, and I saw that the old rules were not very well comprehended. This has gone on from session to session, and finally a committee, of which the hon. gentleman from Halifax is chairman, was appointed. It has taken that committee nearly six months to bring in the revised rules, which were placed in my hands only about forty-eight hours ago—I think either on Thursday or Friday. I do not consider it my duty to wade through all those rules and points of order, and consequently I have not read them and am not prepared to vote on the matter. If it took this committee six whole months, meeting eleven or twelve times, as the hon. gentleman said himself the other day, to produce this report, how do they expect we can go through it and pass upon it within the time that remains. It is surmised on good authority that his Excellency Earl Grey will come down on Saturday next to prorogue the House. We have a good many important measures—the celebrated Autonomy Bill, the 'Monotony Bill,' or the 'Anatomy Bill,' as I am inclined to call it, is not yet before us; and surely there will have to be some discussion on that Bill. Other matters will come before this honourable body for consideration, and really I think we are not going to lose anything by postponing this report until next session. We have gone along nicely under the presidency of the present Speaker, and I believe we will get along fully as well during the present week with our present rules. By postponing the matter until parliament meets again, every hon. gentleman will have an opportunity, during the recess, of reading the rules. With the existing rules before us, we can compare one with the other, and hon. members will come next session prepared to give an intelligent vote on the question. I think that would be the proper course to pursue. I do not wish to dictate the line of action this honourable House should take in regard to the matter, but I am expressing my own opinion in full. I defer largely to the opinion of the hon. leader of the opposition in this regard. He wishes to have it discussed by a Committee of the Whole House. The hon. gentleman himself was a member of the Special Committee. Considering that these hon. gentlemen have met eleven or twelve times to deliberate on the rules, and have only now completed their report, I am opposed to this matter being disposed of now, but I do not wish to make a formal motion.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Granting that every credit is due to the members of this committee for their labour in revising the rules, I think it is the opinion of the majority of this House, that we have not time now to consider this report. The hon. gentlemen have done a great deal of work as the hon. chairman has told us. They have put in a great deal of work during these six months, and we require a few weeks to consider the matter. I therefore move in amendment that the consideration of this report be postponed until the next session.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I wish to say that I know that the committee in charge of this work have laboured very ardently in this matter, and more especially the chairman. The hon. gentleman from Halifax was very assiduously engaged upon it for the last three or four months. Out of respect for the labours of these hon. gentlemen, this House should go into Committee of the Whole and consider the report. The task may be too long to complete this session, as the time is short; but I will move, in amendment to the amendment, that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on the rules.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have been a member of the committee, but I must say that I agree with my hon. friend to my right and also with the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, and others who have addressed the House. I think the changes made in the rules are so serious and the revision so extensive that it would not be wise for this House to summarily dispose of these rules at this very late stage, in view of the press of work which is now upon us, which must be attended to during the very short time that will intervene before prorogation. It is correct, as stated by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that the bulk of the rules have received the unanimous approbation of the members of the committee, but it must be remembered that in a good many cases that unanimous approbation has been brought about by compromise in order to secure a consensus of opinion, and it is quite possible that when these rules come to be considered by the larger constituency of the House other hon. gentlemen in this chamber might not see them in the same way that the committee saw them, and other and greater changes may be necessary. I must say that I do not quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax as to the very small number of rules as to which there remains a difference of opinion amongst the committee. There are a larger number than my hon. friend indicated, and possibly he may be under a misapprehension on that ground. When a particular rule was discussed in committee and it was found that there were differing opinions upon it, my hon. friend who was in the chair took what he understood was the consensus of opinion of the committee, and undertook to amend the rule on the lines indicated by the discussion. I have no doubt my hon. friend very faithfully attempted to carry that out; but I noticed that some of these rules did not come up again for consideration in the committee, and that there is a difference of opinion among the members of the committee in some cases as to whether a rule has been amended in the way that was indicated by the discussion in the committee, or which would meet the approval of the members of the committee. I do not say that anything has been done in any other way than in good faith. I do not raise any question of that kind, but I think if the committee had not been interrupted by the various adjournments, as we necessarily were, and that if it had been possible to have another meeting or two to go over the rules once more from first to last, we could have improved them. I have not the slightest doubt that if further time were given to us they could have been improved in the judgment of almost every member of the committee. The hon. gentleman from Halifax knows that only a few days ago we completed the work of going over the rules, and I feel that after the light which was thrown upon the matter the second time we went over them, we could have considered them again with a good deal of advantage. In order to illustrate this point, I wish to mention that rule 45, as it is drafted, might create a position in which this House could not be adjourned at all. It provides that unless a specific motion of adjournment be made when the Orders of the Day are called for the purpose of bringing up a discussion, no motion to adjourn the Senate shall be made except by or on behalf of a minister. A case might arise such as once occurred in Quebec, as I am told, where a minister of the Crown made a motion to adjourn, and it was negatived and no further motion could be made unless other business intervened. We are very often with only one minister in this House, and it might happen—I do not think it is very likely to happen under present circumstances—but it might happen that a motion made by a minister of the Crown might be negatived, and he might refuse to make a second motion. He might leave the House, and under rule 45, as it stands now, there could be no motion made, because no motion to adjourn could be made except by a minister of the Crown or some one in his behalf. That is a point which did not occur in my mind when we were considering the rules, but it shows the necessity there is for careful consideration when we are dealing with new rules. When we are changing old rules we know what the extent of the change is, but we are asked to adopt absolutely new rules, and in many cases rules that have never been accepted in the British Houses of parliament. We are taking several of these rules from the newly-made rules of the Australian colonies, and we know very little about their operations. We should be very careful in the drafting of new rules, or when we are adopting rules that have not stood the test of time, like the rules of the Australian Commonwealth. My hon. friend pointed out that in 1894 very little time was spent in the House in dealing with this question; that the existing rules were suspended in order to allow the work of the committee to be passed very summarily and promptly. It may be that in that case there were no very serious departures from the old rules. I was not here at the time and cannot speak positively as to that; but I know in the present case we are adopting many new rules and we are very materially changing old ones. There are very serious changes made, and I think hon. gentlemen who have had any experience in drafting almost any class of document will agree that the greater the volume of the work the greater chance you have of finding that you have made mistakes, or left the door open to misunderstanding. I have not taken any prominent part in drafting the proposed rules, but I have no hesitation in saying that the work which has been done is very valuable. It cannot possibly be lost, and if the matter is laid over now, a new committee can be struck next session, or the old committee can be reappointed, with the hon. gentleman from Halifax, if he is in the House, as we hope he will be, in the chair. If the whole of the committee are present they might be reappointed, or in the event of any of them not being available, some changes could be made and the matter could be referred to the new committee. They could take up the matter as it is left now, and as the chairman has said and said very properly, we would in the beginning of the session have very little to do, the weather would be cool, and we could go into the matter without that physical discomfort which we suffer in attempting such work now. In view of the fact that the important work which has been done cannot be lost to this House, and that no great detriment to the public interest or to this House can arise from our working under the existing rules for the next session or a part of it, I will support the motion of my hon. friend from Montarville that the consideration of this question be laid over until next session.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—We are entering upon a week of very important work. The labour of this week is going to be strenuous. We will have before us a question which has occupied the other House for months and months, a question which has engrossed the attention of the whole Dominion, and a question which might have extreme consequences. In addition to that, we have the remainder of the estimates and we have also other important Bills to consider. As this week will probably terminate the present session of parliament, is it reasonable that we should set aside those momentous questions which the country is expecting us to look into seriously and severely, and spend our time discussing the rules of this House? I do not believe that that would be a proper course to pursue. Hon. gentlemen are aware, as well as I am, that the longest discussions which have taken place in this chamber have often been upon points of order and upon domestic affairs, while very often questions of grave importance have passed with very slight discussion. I have a strong feeling that we should not at the close of the session set aside those questions which we should discuss in order to take into consideration the report of this committee, which may be very good, which has no doubt been prepared very conscientiously, but which will certainly involve a long discussion in this House. Next session will likely be a very long one indeed if the government bring up the question of the revision of the tariff, and we will have plenty of leisure time. Why not postpone the consideration of this report till next year, when we can work at it deliberately, when nothing else will be pressing, particularly as we now have those momentous questions before us, and the country, after the many vacations we have taken, expects us to take matters more seriously? I, for one, will vote for the postponement of the consideration of this report.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—As a young member of this House, I know very little about our present rules, and I suppose if this report were laid on the table for a year I would not know very much more. But I should like to know whether this largely representative committee of this House were unanimous in their conclusions. If they were anything like unanimous, I should be inclined to support them. Of course, there would not be much loss by the postponement, but what would be lost if we adopted the report? It would not be like the laws of the Medes and Persians; the rules could be changed. If a rule is not found to work well, it can be changed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In reference to the action of the Senate in 1894, the different changes in the rules at that time were not of sufficient importance to create any great discussion, and hence no particular objection was raised. In the present case it is a complete revision of the rules, with the introduction of some rules from other colonies and from Great Britain, which we have never had to consider before. There is not, I may say to the hon. gentleman who has spoken, a unanimity of feeling as to the introduction of some of these rules; and for this reason, I am opposed to the closure or that which approximates to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no closure in these rules.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I expected the hon. gentleman to say that, but I added 'or that which approximates to it.' You restrict the speaking in this House to a certain number of minutes and that is approximating the choking off of speeches. There are other rules in which the government is given power which private members are deprived of. It is quite right that the government should have the right, when they are asked to lay documents on the table, to refuse to do so, on the ground that it would be detrimental to the public interest or because of negotiations then going on. I do not go so far as my hon. friend here in objecting to giving them that right; but I do not think that a member of the government should be permitted to read a certain portion of a document and then to refuse to lay it on the table on the ground that it would not be in the public interest to do so. If he wants to fortify the position he takes, he might refer to correspondence which was going on, to letters in existence bearing on the subject, but not sufficiently advanced to justify him in laying them on the table. I think that has been the general rule. There are other rules in connection with this point to which I take very strong objection. The right to move amendments has not been abused in this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we had a democratic body, and a large one, where advantage was taken to frustrate or obstruct the business, a rule of that kind might be required, but it is not necessary in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Why shackle the members?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend, who has been Speaker of the House, asks, why shackle the members in the expression of their opinions? The delay cannot do any particular harm, and the rules can be well studied during the recess. I may say, in reply to the hon. member from New Glasgow, that one of the objects in adopting the new rules is to get them as perfect as possible so as to avoid the necessity of making constant changes. They will all be printed in a book, and that will have to be revised before it is ready for use. One of the rules provides that if you make a change in a rule, no matter how unimportant it may be, you must summon the whole Senate to consider it. Let us try to make the rules as unobjectionable as possible, and—what is of more importance—to make them workable and understandable. If we do that we shall have accomplished the object we have in view. I desire to add a word to what the hon. member from Victoria, B.C. (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), has said in referring to the chairman of the committee (Hon. Mr. Power). He has been unremitting in his attention to duty, and the time which he has devoted to the consideration of these questions has scarcely ever been given by any member of this House, at least during the time I have been one of its members. But while I am quite willing to accord him that praise, and to admit that he deserves great credit, it does not follow, because he has devoted four months to the consideration of these rules, that his particular views will be concurred in by the other members of the Senate. Every senator has a right to consider and decide for himself as to whether the conclusions at which he has arrived are correct and to the advantage of the Senate. That is my principal reason for objecting to going on now. If we go on now we shall have to take the rules up seriatim, rule after rule, and discuss each one at such length as will be necessary to make clear to every member the effect it will have if adopted. As my hon. friend said, we expect in a short time to have very important measures before us which will take up the time of the House for the remainder of the session, but if the hon. Secretary of State will promise that he will not go on with the autonomy Bills, I shall withdraw my objection and we will go into committee on this report and spend two or three weeks in discussing it. My hon. friend laughs; I do not know whether that is in approval of the suggestion I make, or whether it is in derision. I take it for granted that it is approval of what I suggest, and we may therefore, if he accepts my suggestion, be relieved of the discussion likely to take place on that great question.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have listened with interest to the preliminary discussion over our rules, and I agree with a great deal that has been said. Particularly I agree with the words which fell from the lips of the leader of the opposition when he said that every one must read the rules and come to his own decision on the work of the committee. The discussion which has arisen shows, it seems to me, the wisdom of the course that has been suggested by my hon. friend from Victoria, that a further discussion should take place in a Committee of the Whole, where the opinions on both sides of the case, so to speak, could be given ; and whether the rules were adopted this session or next session, the discussion would be of advantage, and those who studied the question would be able to come to a sound and safe conclusion as to the desirability of adopting or opposing them. It might be well, when dealing with the rules, that we should follow the ordinary procedure on such occasions. As the case stands now, my hon. friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. de Boucherville) has moved an amendment to the amendment, which to my mind is not according to the practice, because it is practically moving the six months hoist. It is a motion to postpone this matter until next session, and it is not according to parliamentary practice to move an amendment of that character. Therefore the discussion should be on the motion of the hon. senator from Quebec. I fail to see that we would lose anything by going into Committee of the Whole, and proceeding as far as we reasonably can. It may be that we can get through the rules and we will thus find out where the objections are, what are the weaknesses of the work of the committee. Even if the report were postponed until another year, which I would rather not see done, there would be an advantage in this discussion. It would be an education to every member of the House who had not the advantage of being a member of the committee and hearing the reasons for arriving at the conclusions contained in the report. I suggest that we postpone this order until the other business of to-day is cleared off, and then take up the matter. Whatever our decision might be, we would not interfere with the business of the day, and we could devote the rest of the sitting to a further discussion of these rules, and go as far as we could in the time at our disposal. If that suggestion meets the views of the House, we could give considerable information to other members of the House who have no opportunity of knowing the reasons for the conclusions arrived at by the committee. I may say the great bulk of the report is a repetition of former rules, some of which have been slightly changed. There are not many new rules and these are the result of experience in other Houses. We have not taken any new departure which should alarm this honourable body, as will be seen when the rules are carefully analysed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume on a matter of this kind it is not proposed to call for a division. The adoption of the rules ought to take place only after they have met the cordial reception of members of the Senate. We should at least be advised substantially of the objections urged to them. It is quite clear from the remarks that have fallen from several hon. gentlemen that there will be a good deal of controversy before we adopt these rules. We can all see that the chairman of the committee has devoted a great deal of time to the subject and taken a great deal of care to bring the rules up to what he considered the proper standard. I do not know a member of the House, with the exception of perhaps of the hon. gentleman from Richmond, who could be classed as having a superior knowledge of the rules; and I am sure others pay great deference to the opinions he entertains on the subject of any changes he might desire to make. At the same time it must be admitted, at this stage of the session, with several important Bills coming down, it is not an opportune time to consider them. It would be improper in my judgment to allow the rules of the Senate to block any business of importance which we may desire to complete during the coming week, and therefore I would ask the hon. gentleman from Halifax to withdraw his motion and allow the matter to stand over for another year.

Hon. Mr. POWER—After what has taken place, and after the suggestion made by the hon. Secretary of State, I suppose it would be looked upon as pure stubbornness on my part if I declined to accept it. I may say that I defer to his wishes and to the views expressed by some members of the House. At the same time I may be allowed to say just a word or two. I do not think it is customary, after such a large committee has dealt with a subject of this kind, that its report should be discussed at great length in the House. The very object of referring such a question to a committee, is that the details shall be dealt with by the committee. There were certain very important points as to which there was entire unanimity in the committee, and I supposed that when this report came up for consideration in the House, it would be considered in what might be called a judicial way. As to the three or four rules regarding which there was a difference of opinion I thought there might be some discussion and possibly motions made to amend those rules. A totally different course has been taken, and I cannot help feeling that there is just a little of the 'Dr. Fell' idea prevailing in the minds of some members of the House. Something was said by one hon. gentleman with respect to my being exceedingly unreasonable in thinking that my particular views should be adopted. I do not think so. On several points, I might mention, my particular views were not adopted by the committee; but if I thought a certain course was the right and proper one, and some hon. gentleman suggested another course was better, if the hon. gentleman's reasons did not seem to me to be very convincing, I do not think I would be acting properly in changing the views which I believe to be well founded; and if the majority of the committee happened to agree with me, I think I was perfectly justified in trying to carry out my own views. As a matter of fact, I repeat, there was a marked difference of opinion as to three or four of the rules only; and every one of those rules has been amended by the committee in the direction of meeting the views of the hon. gentleman who objected.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If we had taken the report into consideration as a whole, the views of these hon. gentlemen might have been met altogether, and considering that for some sessions there has been a feeling that in certain respects our rules urgently needed alteration, I contend that would have been a reasonable view to take. It may be I am mistaken. At any rate my view does not appear to be the view which prevails in the House just now, and consequently I must express my willingness to acept the suggestion made by the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am glad the hon. gentleman from Halifax has deemed it advisable to accede to the request which has been made. I agree in what he has said, that when a large committee has taken the trouble to make a study of the rules, it is hardly to be expected that there will be a great deal of discussion by the members of this honourable House generally when the matter is taken into consideration. On the other hand, it is but fair that every member of the House be afforded the necessary time to look over the rules and have a clear idea as to their purport; and I agree with the members who have taken the position that it is rather late in the session to expect hon. members to whom these rules are altogether new and who have had only two or three days to study them, to form an opinion on them. I thought we should have gone into committee on the rules, devoting one sitting to them and I think it would have facilitated greatly the work of next session. The matter is now fresh in the minds of the members of the committee. There could be some short discussion on the rules as to which there is a difference of opinion. The views of different members would be put on record and during the recess some of us would very likely be prepared to suggest the best rule to be adopted on the subject. Therefore I think that this honourable House should agree to have the matter postponed until next session, but in the meantime should spend an hour or two in committee in order to better study those rules on which there are differences of opinion. Otherwise even the members of the committee will forget a great deal. Speaking for myself, I shall not be as well prepared next session as I am now, because the matter is fresh in my mind to-day. If we had a short discussion it would be on record in the proceedings of this House for reference next session.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I do not think any of us will study these rules very closely during the recess. Our minds will be taken up with something more directly important to ourselves. We all agree that the weather is very hot and that we are getting a little dull. I speak for myself; I am getting a little stupid from the heat in this city. Next session we may come here with the wind blowing from the Northwest and our minds brightened up by the frost; and we will have very much clearer ideas as to what should be done than we can possibly have at present. Next session, after passing the address and appointing the committee, we should arrange to remain here until those rules would be passed; and in this way the subject would be disposed of early in the session.

The amendment was agreed to unanimously.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Just now some remarks were made by some hon. gentlemen that they had not received notice that this subject was coming up. For my own part, I asked some of my friends if they had received the regular summons for this meeting. Some told me that they had, others that they had not. Just now my hon. friend near me showed me a paper on his desk, addressed to me. There ought to be a little more care when the House orders members to be summoned, to require that the summons be placed in the hands of the member for whom it is intended.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (176) An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act. He said: Although this seems to be a Bill of considerable length, on analysing it I find it adopts no new principle, except in one particular. At present when officials connected with the Inland Revenue Department are appointed they are obliged to furnish personal security. This provides that in all such cases a guarantee company's bond may be substituted for the bond of an individual. Apart from that the changes are simply verbal; the clauses amended is reproduced, which is of course very much the better way. Beyond the adoption of the guarantee system in lieu of personal security there is practically no material change.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why was not the guarantee system adopted before? In some of the departments they have had the guarantee system for some time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know why.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is difficult to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, although I have no doubt it is made in good faith, that there are no important changes in this Bill. It covers some ten pages. If it is only confined to verbal corrections or alterations of the Act, they must be of an important character, otherwise we would not have such a large Bill to consider. It is a great misfortune that the government does not, in the introduction of Bills of this kind, re-enact the old law instead of changing, as in this instance, no less than thirty-four sections. If any member desires to study this Bill affecting the Inland Revenue Department, he must take up two or three enactments in order to arrive at what the law really is. My hon. friend from Richmond very properly suggests that that is the reason for the codification of the laws and the appointment of a very expensive commission, which sat for a year or two in order to revise and consolidate the statutes. Bills are introduced time and again amending the statutes, and if they are only of a verbal character, as the hon. Secretary of State says this Bill is, it makes it much more difficult to understand them. Now, to understand these amendments, the whole law should be before the senator, and he has either to compare them while at his seat or devote a day to studying them when the House is not in session. I should like to put it fairly to my brother senators, how many of us have taken that Bill and studied the proposed amendments by comparing them with the law on the statute-book? Yet we are expected to go into committee and put this Bill through in ten or twelve minutes. The hon. Secretary of State, I have no doubt, is prepared to give an explanation of each of the amendments and why they are proposed; but I make this suggestion very seriously to him, that when so many amendments have to be made it would be better to consolidate the law itself. I take it for granted that the consolidation of the statutes will be laid before parliament, if not this session, at least next session. Will all these amendments that we propose to make now be inserted in the consolidated Act affecting the Department of Inland Revenue? If they are not included in the consolidation, then you have the statute, so far as it affects the inland revenue, as difficult to understand as it was before consolidation. I hope the hon. minister will not think I have made these remarks in a captious spirit. Might I ask if he thinks there is a probability of these Acts we are passing this session, amending other Acts, being considered by the commission consolidating the law? The hon. gentleman nods his head. Then my objection is not so strong. I fully concur in the amendment which he proposes to make in reference to security. Any one who has had any experience in administering these laws containing penalties will know that, where personal securities are given, it is always a difficult—shall I say indelicate—to press a personal friend who has become security. If the bond of a security company is required, then there is no compunction at all in compelling them to pay if anything goes wrong. That is the only objection I have, and I hope my hon. friend, when we reach the different clauses, which are somewhat numerous, will have the chairman read them, and then explain why the changes are made, unless the House is prepared to swallow it holus bolus, without any knowledge of its contents.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I desire to say that I concur to some extent in what has fallen from my hon. friend. I for one must sympathize with that section of the public which is called upon from year to year to familiarize itself with the very elaborate amendments which are made to departmental statutes from time to time. It seems to me one of the evils of the parliamentary system to-day is the constant changes which are made in departmental machinery from session to session. I have particularly in view three or four departments that come here, one might safely say every session, for very radical changes to be made in their administration. I cannot overlook the fact that the Inland Revenue Department is probably the greatest sinner of them all. I might mention also the Fisheries Department, and the Agriculture Department. If one would take up our statute-book and look at the large body of statute law passed from session to session incident to those three or four departments, one cannot fail to really admire the patience of that section of the public which has to do business with those departments from time to time. I apprehend that there should be, and will be, no complaint on the part of the legal fraternity with reference to these radical changes which are being so constantly made in the law, but speaking, not on behalf of the profession, but rather on behalf of the public, I think it is time a halt should be called in this matter of varying legislation so frequently. It seems to me if those departments find that their departmental machinery is defective in the way of statutory enactment that there should be a codification of the law with reference to those various departments. The authorities of those respective departments should decide upon what they really want, and they should come down here some session and have their Act entirely consolidated. The public would then know for some years to come what they might expect in conforming to the various statutory obligations cast upon them in doing business with those departments. But really, if one would analyse our statute-book with reference to departmental legislation the conclusion would be irresistible that those changes are an abuse of the parliamentary system.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has not moved that the consideration of this question be postponed. It seems to me the public necessity calls for as careful consideration of the Inland Revenue law as the rules of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As hon. gentleman know, the Inland Revenue Act covers 106 pages. It would have been folly to have reprinted all that matter, particularly as the codification is now going on. What has been done in this particular case has been to re-enact each section. If there were only one word changed it is simply re-enacted with that particular word included.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT, 1903, AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Second reading Bill (PP) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as respect the amount of securities to be issued by Railway Companies:—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that this Order of the Day be allowed to stand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if the government has any policy to announce in respect to this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A Bill was introduced in the House of Commons with respect to the same matter, and it is to be dropped. There would be no use in our passing this Bill because it would not pass the Commons this session.

The Order of the Day was allowed to stand.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (159) An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

He said: This is to make provision for cases that arise in the process of the change from territories to provinces, reserving all powers to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no intention of opposing this measure because I regard it as entirely necessary but why was not a more comprehensive Act introduced so as to meet all classes of cases which might arise during the interval referred to? It seems to me there is no more probability of such a question arising under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act than under any other Dominion Act. It seems to me it would have been much better for the government to have introduced a comprehensive Bill dealing with all classes of litigation arising under Dominion Acts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were a number of Bills. Probably some of them may not have come up yet. I know the Justice Department had under consideration the preparation of such Bills as would be really necessary. There may be other Bills to be sent up to us.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (161) An Act to amend the Northwest Irrigation Act, 1898.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

CENSUS AND STATISTICS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (163) An Act to amend the Census and Statistics Act.

He said: This Bill amends the Act passed during the present session. Bill No. 5 which provided for the taking of the census in the provisional districts of Alberta, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan; and this Bill provides for the taking of the census in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. It is necessitated by the fact that the Territories have been constituted into provinces.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not clear to my mind whether the census will be taken twice in every decade in future, or whether there will be only one. It provides that in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta there shall be a census taken in June next year, and every tenth year thereafter. Will the ordinary decennial census for the whole country apply to the west as well?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it will all come in the regular order in 1911. There will be a quinquennial census taken twice in order to get into the dates at which the general census will be taken.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This Bill provides that there shall be a census next year and one at the end of every ten years thereafter for those three provinces. Will the usual decennial census in 1911 apply to the whole country, in other words will the census be taken twice in every ten years ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The intention is that the census should be taken twice in every decade. This would permit of that being done. That is to say, the general census which is taken every ten years would be equally applicable to those provinces; and the intermediate census, taken every ten years after the date fixed by this Bill would be specially applicable to those provinces. That would give us the quinquennial census required under the Autonomy Bill. But I would like to say to my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill that I hope when it goes to committee he will make some provision for limiting the time during which the census is to be taken. If we are to accept the last census taken by the Department of Agriculture as a precedent, it will not only absorb a considerable time but a proportionate amount of the revenue of the Dominion to determine what the population is. It seems to me what is needed more than anything else is a time limit upon the taking of the census.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—In reply to the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) I might say that the Act respecting the census and statistics passed this year, provides that the census of Canada shall be taken under the direction of the minister on a date in the month of June in the year 1911 to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and every tenth year thereafter. That is the ordinary decennial census. The clause which we are about to amend by the Bill before the House reads as follows :

2. A census of the population and agriculture of the province of Manitobe and of the provisional districts of Alberta, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan in the Northwest Territories, shall be taken by the office, under the direction of the minister, according to special forms and instructions to be approved by the minister, on a date in the month of June, in the year one thousand nine hundred and six, to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and every tenth year thereafter.

This means that there is a decennial census for the entire Dominion every ten years, and in addition to that there is a quinquennial census for these two provinces.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I now understand it perfectly. Is there any good reason why British Columbia should not be included along with the other provinces ? I should expect my hon. friend to be looking after British Columbia. The province is growing rapidly and I think it would be simple justice to that province that it should also have its census taken every five years ; but I would like to inquire from him why he is not looking after the interests of that province.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—My hon. colleague from Victoria has constituted himself the particular guardian of the interests of the province, and I am sorry he is not present; but I quite agree with my hon. friend so far as to say that if the object of the quinquennial census in the new provinces and in the province of Manitoba is in order that increases to the provincial subsidies may be thereby obtained, the province of British Columbia should stand on the same footing. Possibly by another year or two when our population begins to increase with the rapidity that it has increased in the new Territories, British Columbia will make the request that my hon. friend has said the province should make.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to know the hon. gentleman recognizes the assiduity with which the hon. member from Victoria attends to the interests of British Columbia and as he says he has constituted himself the guardian of the interests of that province, might I ask if he has relegated his duty as minister without portfolio to my hon. friend on my left, leaving the interest of that very important province to his colleague who is not a member of the government. One generally supposes, and it is the general impression, however correct it may be, that a minister whether he has a portfolio or not. is the guardian of that section of the Dominion which he is supposed to represent. But my hon. friend evidently has come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman who sits to my left is really the guardian of the interests of British Columbia. Let me hope he will join with him in the endeavour that he manifests on every occasion to bring the interests of the province before the Dominion. It will be my pleasure to tell my hon. friend that he occupies that very important position, and he will begin to read in the debates the remarks made by the minister who is supposed to represent British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I am not very sure, but I think my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was a member of the government—at all events he was a member of the political party which made the terms of union with the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was in parliament but not a member of the government.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—A member of the party which agreed to the terms under which British Columbia came into confederation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Very liberal terms too.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It seems to me if the party of which my hon. friend was a member was consulting the interests of the province at that time, he would have arranged for the taking of the quinquennial census, with a view to increase the subsidy to the province, every five years, as this government has done in respect of the new provinces now being formed. However, I simply said that I thought the suggestion of my hon. friend from Marshfield was a very good one indeed, and I am quite sure that my hon. friend from Victoria, who is not present, would also think so. While I will not say that I surrender to my hon. friend from Victoria all questions affecting the province, still we may be found in accord on that question at another session of the House. While I do not surrender my duties to my hon. friend from Victoria, I am quite willing to surrender my salary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not advocate the principle laid down by my hon. friend, neither do I understand he did. He merely asked why it was not done. When British Columbia came into confederation I did not consider, as an independent member of parliament, that it was necessary, and I do not think it is necessary now.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I was about to remark that if the present government had followed the same course as the Conservative government to which allusion has been made, the government which was in power when Manitoba was brought into the union—if they had followed the course which the first Conservative government followed at the time Prince Edward Island came into confederation, they would have taken the population and statistics required in the new provinces by estimation and thus saved the hundreds of thousands of dollars required for the additional census.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—May I ask how long the five years census arrangement is to continue? It seems to me it is necessary to have it now. I understand the subsidies to the two new provinces are on a very liberal scale, and I also understand from the imperfect knowledge which I possess—I have not studied the Bills very closely—that there is a maximum, and after it reaches that maximum I suppose the same rule will prevail in those provinces with regard to the census as prevails in other provinces of the Dominion. Am I right or wrong?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—You are right.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The Bill was then read a third time under suspension of the rules.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (69) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (70) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Saskatchewan.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (139) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—(Hon. Mr. Templeman.)

Bill (147) An Act to amend the Seamen's Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (186) An Act to provide for the regulation of Wireless Telegraphy in Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Templeman.)

Bill (193) An Act to amend the Revised Statutes respecting the salaries of certain public functionaries and other annual charges on the Consolidated Revenue.—(Hon. Mr. Templeman.)

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to ask the leader of the government if there is any intention on the part of the departments to comply with the order and wishes of this House? Eighteen months ago I made a motion asking for a return giving the names of the crew on the steamship 'Neptune,' which was sent to Hudson bay. I asked for it several times last year, but could not get it. I have asked several times for it this year and cannot get it. I suppose I shall be obliged to keep the House in session a few months more until that return is laid upon the table. That may happen; we do not know what the future may have in store for us.

On the 11th April, three months ago, I moved for a return in regard to the sale which took place to the hon. Senator Choquette on the part of the Department of Public Works. That return could have been prepared in two or three hours, but we have not received it yet. I suppose the hon. gentleman wants to keep us here all summer. If he wants to get rid of us, he should bring down that return to-morrow or, at latest, the day after.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I got one of the returns. The hon. gentleman asked me about it, and I passed on the request to the proper quarter. I do not know why the return has not been prepared. If the hon. gentleman will send me a memorandum of what he requires, I will give it attention. I think one of them was prepared and I brought it to the House. I do not know whether I laid it on the table or not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. Secretary of State will recognize the just nature of the complaints made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). I regret to say it has become the practice the last few years with some departments to treat any orders made by the Senate with contempt. I am not prepared to accuse the hon. Secretary of State of neglect of duty, but he has often informed the Senate, when complaints have been made, that no answers have been made to returns moved for, that he has sent the request to the proper department, and they have paid no attention to it. Whether the Senate can take any steps to show their disapproval in some practical way which the government will feel, I am not prepared to say, but the hon. member from Stadacona has thrown out a hint that it would be well for this Senate to put in practice, and that is if the information asked for is not furnished that parliament be kept in session until we do get it. Until you assert the rights of the Senate in that manner, depend upon it certain members of the government and certain departments will treat the Senate in the same way for all time to come. The hon. member from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) asked for some important information in reference to the sale of school lands, which he required to enable him to discuss, with some degree of intelligence, that portion of the Autonomy Bill which deals with the educational question. It is quite evident he is not going to get it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman has it, then it is his duty to lay it on the table. On a number of occasions when I have called the attention of the Senate to this very question, the hon. Secretary of State has raised the lid of his desk and taken out returns inquired for and laid them on the table. How long he had them in his desk I do not know. The probabilities are they may have been there a week, or a fortnight, or perhaps a month, and they are not laid on the table until the attention of the members of the government in this House is called to the question a number of times. I do not say that it is done intentionally. The matter may have been forgotten, but I do not think it should have been forgotten. I do not think he is treating the Senate with that degree of courtesy to which they are entitled.

Let me add that we have presented to-day by the Speaker a number of the most important Bills which have been considered this session. Bills which have occupied the attention of the other House for four or five months. They are laid before the Senate and we are gravely told, if not by members of the government, by members of the Senate who support them, that the House is to adjourn at the end of this week. Is it to be supposed that there is any one here, no matter how gigantic his intellect, who can master in three or four days, the Bills submitted to-day for our consideration? My past experience would lead me to another conclusion. We must swallow them as they are, without a knowledge of their contents, or keep the Senate in session for a number of days. I am not complaining of the Secretary of State for this; I do not say he is responsible, but the government is responsible, and they should not ask a deliberative body like the Senate to swallow Bills holus bolus without some little consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I venture to say that the promptness with which the government Bills have been brought up to this chamber will not only compare favourably with the experience during the years the hon. gentleman's friends were in power, but is far in advance of the experience of former years. I can myself produce the evidence of it if it were necessary now, to show that baskets full of Bills would come down here twenty-four hours before the House was to be prorogued. I have myself, when the guns were being fired, insisted in declining to allow a Bill to go through simply because it was absurdly late. No such charge can be made here. There must be a certain number left to the end of the session. The two Autonomy Bills were kept back—by whom? The friends of my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, by Mr. Sifton.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is all very well to say Mr. Sifton. The Toronto influence kept them back, the newspapers hammering away day after day, and grossly insulting pictures being published in the Toronto 'News' exciting public opinion. That was the cause of the delay. The Bills were introduced four months ago and we were ready to have gone on with them. With reference to the return, I quite admit that all governments have been guilty of remissness in presenting returns to the House. I deny that it is my practice to put them in my desk, although it might happen in one or two cases. I put them on the table. Sometimes when a member moving an address is not in the House it would be unfair to lay it on the table because it would go on the files and he would never hear of it. I like a member to be present and I like to call his attention to the returns. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of this subject. A month ago I took the trouble to look up the returns that were absolutely refused me in former years by the government of the day and were never brought down. Session after session passed by and it was absolutely futile to ask for these returns.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The remarks which have fallen from the hon. leader of the House with reference to the Toronto representation, to use the expression he has used, having stood in the way of the passage of the Autonomy Bill, are entirely uncalled for. When my hon. friend refers to passions and prejudices excited by the Toronto press he sounds a note which is certainly not favourable towards a temperate discussion of the Bills coming before this House. My hon. friend has already sounded the keynote, and if he chooses to indicate this as being the tone in which the Bill is to be discussed, he certainly will be met in equally vigorous tone by those who are opposed to the Bill. It was to be hoped that the leader of the government in this chamber at least upon the presentation of those Bills, would have made no reference to the passions which have been aroused in Quebec as well as in Ontario upon a question which it is to be regretted very much has aroused the religious and racial prejudices of both provinces. But if my hon. friend wishes to further arouse those animosities, as he already has indicated a desire to do——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, oh. I did nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must say it certainly will be resented by those who think differently from him with reference to this legislation. Permit me to say at this juncture that it is extremely unfortunate if the Toronto representatives in the House of Commons cannot express themselves as they have done, in a parliamentary way, upon differences of opinion which they may entertain and upon the differences of opinion which Ontario members may entertain as to this Bill, without being accused of passion and prejudice. I would just say that it is extremely undesirable that in approaching the discussion of two of the most important measures in this House, the Senate above all other deliberative bodies should regard the discussion to be entered upon in the way indicated by my hon. friend. The remarks which have fallen from him were entirely uncalled for. Those who differ from the view which he takes with reference to this Bill may very properly express their opinions in a free assembly, such for instance as the parliament of Canada, without incurring the displeasure already expressed. I simply make this remark indicative of the feeling with which I desire to enter upon the consideration of these Bills; and I hope my hon. friend when he comes to address the chamber on the second reading of the Bill will approach it in a much more appropriate and moderate spirit than he has done to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the hon. gentleman's lecture is well placed. I do not as a rule adopt an aggressive attitude in this House. I was taunted with the delay in bringing down this Bill, and I stated that the delay was occasioned by the opposition in the other chamber and the opposition in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman had no right to say that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had a perfect right to say it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was not warranted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said that the cartoons published from time to time——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What has that to do with it? Are we responsible for the press of Toronto or Montreal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was challenged for some explanation why the Bills were detained in the other House. I said calmly that they were introduced four months ago. I was speaking the truth and not endeavouring to create any excitement. On the contrary I approach questions of this kind with as much calmness as my brother senators do. I would be exceedingly sorry if any feeling should be shown and I do not think the irritation shown by my hon. friend was at all appropriate. It was rather got up, I think. There was nothing on my part to induce him to speak in the manner in which he has spoken, and it was not quite fair.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no question before the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, there is the motion to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Apart from the point which has been very properly made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, I wish to dissent entirely from the statements made by the hon. Secretary of State with regard to the causes which have led to the delay in the Autonomy Bills reaching the Senate. My hon. friend says it was the fault of the friends of my hon. friend from Calgary in the other branch of parliament, keeping up a long discussion on the subject. My hon. friend must be aware that the supporters of the government in the House did as much talking as the opposition; in fact it was observable during the progress of that debate that the government had not the slightest desire to terminate the debate and on the contrary seemed to encourage their friends to talk; and I do not think that either side can find any fault with the other as to the amount of talking or the length of the speeches. But there is one point my hon. friend entirely lost sight of and with the memory he has for the past political history of Canada, I do not think he should lose sight of contemporary history or go astray in it. Has he forgotten that one of the important causes for delay in that Bill was due to internal dissensions in the government? They quarrelled among themselves. One resigned, and others were on the point of resigning. The leader of the government brought down the measure without the approbation or even the consent of his colleagues, and a state of chaos prevailed in the government. That is why the business of the House has been delayed, and this Bill is so late in reaching us. The government practically suspended work in the House during the London and North Oxford elections; a large portion of their contingent went up there to take part, and work was almost suspended in parliament pending these elections. A strong government would not have done this, and would not have had a disruption in their ranks over a measure of this kind. A government carefully considering their measures would have had the Bill prepared and settled upon among themselves before parliament met. Instead of that they were fighting among themselves when they should have been at work. My hon. friend appears to have forgotten all this. One whose memory is so good about the political history of forty or fifty years ago should not have forgotten the incidents of the present session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am in full accord with the sentiments uttered by my colleague. I was in hopes that this question would have been discussed calmly. I see no reason why I should not differ from the hon. gentleman and he from me upon any important question, without being accused of bigotry. We are not educated in the same schools and not brought up the same way. We think differently upon different questions. Let us think differently, act differently and express our opinions without being accused of bigotry. The hon. gentleman should not forget that the principal agitators in the city of Toronto were his own friends. Take the Toronto 'Globe'; it was the leader of the agitation against this Bill, and continued until it was silenced by some means or another, which I am not prepared to state. Let me refer to the great meeting of 10,000 or 12,000 people in Massey Hall. Who were the principal men present? The leading Liberals of the city. My hon. friend knows them. I could give you the names of all of them, and there were only one or two Conservatives in the whole meeting. The Conservative leaders in the House of Commons were condemned by these agitators, led on by the 'Globe,' because they did not appear there to join in the hue and cry against the Autonomy Bill. Yet at the present day an attempt is made to place the whole responsibility for delay upon a class of people who really took no initiative in the matter in that city in particular. Those Liberals I have no doubt were conscientious in what they did. They expressed themselves calmly. That led to opposition from Quebec members, and language was used that should not be used. It was commented on by the Ontario press, and statements were made which might better have been left unuttered. They should have pursued the course which I intend to pursue in any remarks I may make. In matters affecting different races and different creeds I have never taken a position on which a slur could be thrown. I believe that is the principle pursued particularly by the members in the Commons from the city of Toronto. While their remarks have been forcible and to the point, expressing their views, I have read pretty carefully what they have said, and I have no recollection of any of the members from the city of Toronto having used language which would justify the remarks made by the hon. Secretary of State. However, I am quite prepared, if it is to be a fight upon that question, to take my share of it, but I would much prefer dealing with it in a calm and statesmanlike manner. If we are forced into a discussion similar to that which has been indicated by the Secretary of State, I promise him he shall have enough of it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I am sorry this difficulty has been raised, and that the words which the Secretary of State used have been misinterpreted, misapprehended and misapplied, where all his language is inspired by kindliness of disposition and heart. We all know perfectly well that there was no intention on his part to irritate or annoy any particular member of the Senate. Nothing was further from his mind than to do anything of the kind. I am quite sure I can say that for him and say it with a good deal of confidence. The observations which have been made, however, by the hon. gentlemen on the other side appear to me to be rather aside from the complaint they are making. It was that these Bills were not before us yet; and that at the very close of the session, without an opportunity of considering them, we were called upon to pass judgment upon them. Hon. gentlemen have had copies of these Bills for three months. They have had copies of the debates conducted in the other House and they have had an opportunity of weighing the arguments which have been so ably presented on both sides. They would have been able to notice that a great deal of the argument in point of length was directed from one side of the House, and a great deal of the strong argument was directed from the other side of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Particularly that by Mr. Bourassa.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Of course the hon. gentleman has had the full benefit of it. I am glad to find the hon. gentlemen appreciate exactly all that is in it, and that they are not taken by surprise by any of those arguments. They will be able to deal with as much of them as they think proper, and be able to pass over in silence what they do not agree with. There is no novelty about the Autonomy Bill to any of us here. They have been before us and every member has had an opportunity of considering them and all the arguments for and against them, and therefore there is no reason for complaining of them coming in a few hours before prorogation.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, July 11, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

THIRD REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Contingent Accounts of the Senate, presented the third report of the committee, and moved its adoption.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire in the first place to express my approval of the action of the committee, in making young Mr. Choquette assistant postmaster. He has been most assiduous in attending to his duties and is one of the most faithful officers we have had. I think the committee should have gone farther and granted him at least $50 or $100 increase in salary. He has been discharging the duties of the position for a number of years with great acceptance, and I do not know of any one who is more deserving of an increase. If that could be accomplished now, I would like to see it done.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I desire most cordially to endorse the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Since Mr. Choquette has been employed in the post office of the Senate, I have had many opportunities of observing the diligence and intelligence which he has manifested. He is a young man of education, and is very well up in every matter relating to post office business. I think it would be a very graceful thing to give him a reasonable increase of salary.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I perfectly agree with my hon. friends to my right. I might say, without desiring to commit any breach of confidence, that I presented this view in the committee, but there seemed to be no inclination to make any increase of salaries this year. I submit that this case is an exceptional one. I know the young man very well; he was my page when I was Speaker, and I have never had a single occasion to find fault with him, nor have I even noticed any neglect of duty on his part. It is unfortunate that an instance of signal merit like this should be overlooked when we are spending money so lavishly in other respects. There is a recommendation to appoint a second carpenter at a larger salary. I think that is simply extravagance, and I am sorry to see that there is no desire to grant even the paltry sum of $50 in a case of merit like that of young Choquette.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—As chairman of the committee, I am pleased to know that the report has received such unanimous endorsation as regards the appointment of Mr. Choquette as assistant postmaster. I may say that it was understood at a previous meeting of the committee that no further increases of salary would be considered this year, and we acted upon that understanding this morning. Several other applications were made, but for the reason mentioned they were not entertained. As regards increasing Mr. Choquette's salary I may say that he has now received a standing in the post office as assistant postmaster. Every member of the House appears to appreciate the action which the committee has taken and next session whoever has charge of the committee will bear in mind the kind words which have been said, and Mr. Choquette will no doubt receive the consideration he deserves. I shall not move now that an increase be granted because in view of the understanding that no increases were to be granted, I think it would be a matter of breaking faith with the committee. For all the increase would amount to it can easily be made up next year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It must be remembered that there have been a good many increases during the present session. If the principle to which my hon. friend refers had been laid down in the first place I think it would have been fairer. If I am in order in doing so, I shall most willingly move that the report be amended by adding to the words relating to the appointment of an assistant postmaster, 'with an addition to his salary of $100.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were other applications for increases which I think were quite as justifiable, but I have acted on the understanding that there would be no further increases this session. Several applications have been made by deserving officers, but I gave the answer that none would be entertained this year.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If the hon. Secretary of State would attend the meetings of the committee and urge there his views on matters of economy rather than make these general statements in the House, I think the effect would be better.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—No doubt the rule which has been referred to is a justifiable one, but we must remember that several increases have been made during the present session. In view of that fact I think, seeing that the House is practically unanimous in its appreciation of Mr. Choquette's services, no undesirable precedent would be established if he were granted say $50 or $100 increase. It would be simply following the principle laid down in other cases during the present session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I concur most cordially in all that has been said in behalf of Mr. Choquette, and am very glad that the committee, by recommending him for the position of assistant postmaster, have practically secured his future if he lives. With respect to the question of an increase of salary I should have been very glad to see such an increase given to Mr. Choquette, but as there was an understanding that no further increases were to be granted, it would not be fair to other applicants who might be considered as entitled, to single out this one officer. I think the whole case is met by the statement of the chairman of the committee, that when we meet, please God, at the beginning of next year, Mr. Choquette can be placed in just as good a position as if we were now to give him $50 or $100 more.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In view of the statement made by the chairman of the committee that this young gentleman's claims will be recognized next year, I shall not press my view; but I am strongly reminded of an anecdote I read some years ago of Horace Greeley. A great many application were made to him for gratuitous notices in his paper, and it was said that he had a little cage at the door of his office in which he kept a live cock. His favourite expression when any thanks were tendered for free advertising was: 'Give your thanks to the cock; he will soon starve; we charge for what we do here.' The sympathies of hon. gentlemen have been freely expressed in favour of Mr. Choquette, but unfortunately they consist altogether of thanks, without any substantial reward being given him for his services.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Is it not absurd and unjust that an officer like the keeper of the wardrobe should have $750 a year, and the door keeper of this House, who is only on duty while the session lasts, should receive $800, while the assistant postmaster, who is entrusted with the most important duties and has a great responsibility resting upon him, should get only $700 ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is surprising that the zeal of hon. gentlemen has only wakened up at this late date. Mr. Choquette has been doing the work of assistant postmaster for the last four years at his present pay, and I have had no complaint from him. I have never even been asked to suggest an increase on his behalf. I have no doubt that he is a very efficient officer, but without any request on his part the committee have recommended him for the position of assistant postmaster, thus placing him in a better position than if he were granted $800 per annum without the status which he will now enjoy. I am informed—I think it was the law clerk who told me—that if anything were to happen and there were to be a vacancy in the postmastership, the assistant would take the place of the postmaster at the salary which the latter is receiving. In this way it will be seen that what the committee has done is in itself a considerable recognition of Mr. Choquette's merits, and no doubt in case of a vacancy the standing which he now possesses would lead to his obtaining the position of postmaster.

The motion was adopted.

TAX ON COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to:

Inquire whether it is the intention of the government to take any action in reference to the imposition of a tax upon commercial travellers by provincial governments, and if so, what ?

He said : Is my hon. friend the Secretary of State able to give me any answer to this question with reference to the action of the government relating to the tax levied upon commercial travellers in the different provinces ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The matter has been partially discussed and was referred to the Minister of Justice, the understanding being that some action would be taken in reference to the case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the matter might drop, with the understanding that if any decision is come to before prorogation, the hon. gentleman will kindly inform the Senate of it.

The inquiry was dropped.

MUTUAL RESERVE COMMITTEE ACCOUNTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN moved:

That the Senate give instructions to the proper officer of this honourable House to pay the balance of accounts due to the counsel-at-law and expert witness for services rendered by them to the special committee appointed during the last session of the Senate, to investigate the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York.

He said : In rising to make this motion I find myself in a somewhat embarrassing position. The motion which stands in my name deals with a matter affecting more or less, probably more, indirectly, the dignity of the Senate, its integrity, and its honour. I am obliged—and I regret it very much under the circumstances—to recall to this House that its mandate has been ignored, that the order unanimously passed by this House during the last session has been set aside ; by whom I know not. The valuable work done by its committee under the direct supervision of the counsel has also been ignored, consequently I feel it embarrassing under the circumstances to have to make this motion before this honourable House. Hon. gentlemen will remember that during the course of last session an hon. member of the Senate made certain charges, very grave charges—I may say criminal charges—against a certain insurance company called the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York. These charges were made on the strength of his reputation as a public man and as a member of this honourable House ; and they were levelled at this company, not in the interests of any one person, but in the interests of the masses of the Canadian people who were insured in it. That hon. gentleman staked his reputation, and his position as a senator on the result, and declared that if he did not prove his charges to be true he would withdraw from this honourable House and retire into private life. On the strength of that declaration this honourable House, as we all know, granted him a committee by a small majority. After the committee had met and organized, the chairman of that committee, who was your humble servant, was obliged to come before this House and state that the investigation into the affairs of that insurance company would take so much time, and require so much expert knowledge that the members forming the committee would be unable to perform the task that this honourable House had imposed.

Under these circumstances I was commanded by the committee to come before this honourable House and ask for expert testimony and counsel, because it was utterly impossible for the members of the committee to go into all the details of this investigation. On my motion this honourable House acceded to the wishes of that committee, and granted the right to employ counsel and obtain expert testimony and clerical service. With that mandate I returned to the committee and laid the facts before them, and was authorized to procure counsel, an expert witness and clerical services. I engaged the three under the mandate of this House and by the authority of that committee. These people were engaged at a fixed rate for their services, and the investigation began. It lasted over two months, the committee sitting day and night most of the time. The committee was enlarged from the original 5 to 19. The busiest senators in this chamber gave their time, attention and ability to that investigation for two long weary months in the hot season of the year. I do not need to go into the results which were obtained by that committee, but the fact is there that during that long period of time our witness (we had but one), our counsel (we had only one), and our clerical servant (we had only one), were occupied constantly. We were probably the most economical committee that ever investigated public affairs under parliamentary authority and by parliamentary rule. Objection was taken to the granting of a committee on the ground that it would cost so much money. Some hon. gentlemen opposite stated that it would cost $15,000 to $20,000. I was informed that if the Senate had sanctioned the cutting down of expenses the cost would not have exceeded $4,000. As a matter of fact, it did not cost more than $6,000 or $7,000, and that was largely for clerical services. I do not need to recall to the memory of this House what were the results of that investigation. We fully proved the charges made by the hon. member for Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) that the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York was a combination of men who bled the policy-holders for their own personal aggrandizement and enrichment, and that they lived in luxury. That was proved up to the hilt before that committee. It was proved that the president of that company had spent over $40,000 to buy from the New York Inspector of Insurance a report favourable to the company. It was proved that the directors had been fraudulently paid out of the funds of the company the same as in the case of the Equitable Life Insurance Company of New York. It was proved that these officials were stealing the funds of the company, and that the policies when they matured were not paid in full; that the claimants received only 25 per cent to 50 per cent of the amount to which they were entitled. The hon. member for Rothesay was perfectly right in putting the people on their guard against such a company. Where is the hon. senator in this House who rose after the investigation and dared to say to the hon. member for Rothesay, 'You have failed in your charges—retire from this honourable House according to your pledge.' This investigation was carried on under very great disadvantages to the hon. member from Rothesay, and the policy-holders of this company in Canada. We had the best legal talent in this House arrayed against the investigation, and they tried every means to stop any question that would throw light on the vile doings, the robbery and thieving of that company. Day by day and hour by hour we were blocked in our attempts to get at the facts That is known to everybody. Apart from the hon. gentlemen who were standing up for the company trying to shield it and prevent its evil doings being known, we had behind them the greatest legal talent that Canada has produced. We had Mr. Aylesworth—the coming Minister of Justice, they say—with one of the best firms in Toronto, backing that company, and they had firms of lawyers in Ottawa, Montreal and New York, all the talent that wealth can always get. And whom did we have behind us? One man and one man alone, a lawyer by the name of Coster, true a Conservative, but a lawyer in whom my hon. friend from Rothesay had confidence, a man on whom he could depend to ferret out the facts and put them before the country. It would have been an easy matter for the hon. member from Rothesay and myself to have gone on with the investigation if other counsel had been employed, but he said to me: 'I have confidence in one man in this country, he is my attorney, and I feel that if the investigation is put into his hands my honour will be maintained and my veracity will be upheld.' Mr. Coster was alone against that array of talent from Toronto, from Ottawa, from Montreal and New York, and to-day this honourable Senate is asked to pay him at the rate of $5 or $10 a day for his services. All that he has got so far is $500, so far as the records show, while the lawyers supporting the company had, some of them, $200 a day, and there are lawyers outside of the bar of this House to-day who receive more. We relied on the services of one man to maintain the truth and honour of a colleague, and now we are asked to pay him——

An hon. SENATOR—What is the amount of his claim?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is simply $50 a day, while lawyers on the other side, dozens of them are getting from one hundred dollars to two hundred dollars a day. There is no instance where an attorney has been paid so little. His account is a small one. The other day he wrote to the hon. member from Rothesay, who is responsible for the investigation and who, as I say, staked his position in this House on the result. Mr. Coster writes to him as follows:

St. John, N.B., July 4th, 1905.

Lieut. Col. the Hon. James Domville,
The Senate, Ottawa.

Dear Col. Domville,—Re investigation affairs of the Mutual Reserve before select committee of the Senate.

Seeing that you are bringing the matter of my fees before the Senate, I would like to refresh your memory as to the facts. The Select Committee was appointed by the Senate and authorized to appoint counsel. Was retained and the matter of my retainer, counsel fees was left by the committee to the chairman the Hon. Mr. Cloran. He agreed with me as to what I should receive and after the conclusion of the investigation certified my bill as being correct. Although I have charged for fifty-four days only, in this investigation I was away from my office for over two months, and made three trips to Ottawa where the expenses of but two are charged in the bill.

When in Ottawa and not before the Select Committee the whole of my time was spent in going over evidence of which there was an immense volume, and selecting such as I thought absolutely necessary to put before the committee. This is partly evidence by the fact that Miss O'Hanly was paid one hundred and eighty seven dollars for typewriting three thousand seven hundred and fifty folios of my brief dictated to her at the Russell House by myself and the actuaries employed. Had this not been done the labours of the committee would have been interminable. Some days at the hotel we worked fifteen hours, yet nothing is allowed for work outside the committee room. My bill was left to the Department of Justice to be taxed. It was taxed by the department without their having any knowledge of the facts, without notice to me and I was given no chance of being heard. I actually lost through being away from my office over twice as much as I have been paid and would not have accepted the retainer except under the agreement made with me by the Hon. Mr. Cloran the chairman with the express authority of the whole committee.

I am informed that the fees paid to the several counsel retained by the Mutual Reserve were very much larger than those charged by me.

All I ask is fair-play and the carrying out of a definite agreement.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) C. J. COSTER.

I have been witness of the fact that Mr. Coster worked sometimes fifteen hours a day. The work was not done in the committee room, but in the hotel rooms throughout the hot months of last summer—selecting documents which should be produced before the committee, going over reports for the last ten or fifteen years where this company had done business——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. I am very loath to disturb the hon. gentleman. On the 10th of August, 1904, a resolution was moved in this House by the Hon. Mr. Scott, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Templeman, as follows:

That all the accounts for expenses incurred in connection with the select committee appointed to investigate the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York in Canada, other than travelling and hotel expenses, which have been handed in to the clerk for payment by the said committee, be referred to the Department of Justice for taxation.

The question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and ordered accordingly.

Afterwards I understand those costs were taxed and the money was paid. My hon. friend does not move that this resolution be rescinded or reconsidered, and as the matter has already been dealt with by the House, I submit that my hon. friend is clearly out of order in the motion he is moving and in the remarks he is making.

The SPEAKER—Has the hon. gentleman anything to say in answer to the point of order ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not remember at the moment how the matter was dealt with by the Senate. I do not believe it was a motion—I forget now. The hon. gentleman has the record before him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have read from the Journals of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was called upon the other day to lay on the table the accounts and report of the Jusfice Department, which I did.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What is the point of order ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The point of order is that the matter has already been dealt with.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There is nothing before the House to show that it has been dealt with.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The only matter before the House is my motion, and my motion deals with the matter altogether independent of the point of order raised by the hon. senator from Calgary. The action of last session does not interfere with any action this session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is due to the House that I should state what action was taken upon the order of the Senate. The costs were taxed and payment has been made in accordance with that taxation, so that there is really nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There is the motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But it does not propose to reverse the action of the House. I have the report of the Acting Deputy Minister, dated 17th August, 1904, addressed to the clerk of the Senate, which reads as follows :

In reply to your letter of the 12th instant, referring for taxation a number of accounts for witness fees, and also the account of Mr. Coster, who acted as counsel in connection with the select committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, I have the honour to state that the witnesses appear to have been paid at the rate of $5 per day and their travelling expenses. This appears to me quite sufficient. I will allow Mr. Coster $100 retainer and $30 for each day actually engaged before the committee, together with his travelling and hotel expenses, in all $1,023.60.

Bradshaw was paid in full.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I rise to a point or order. This is a debatable question in the House. My hon. friend is trying to convince this honourable House of certain facts and an argument is brought in against him while there is a question of order before the House. I do not think that is right. If my hon. friend has any case to present he should be allowed to present it, and then it will be in order for the hon. gentleman to lay before the House such justification as he may have why the counsel was not paid for his work, as the committee thought he should be paid. I think the question of order is whether my hon. friend should go on or not.

The SPEAKER—The only question before the House is the question of order raised by the hon. member from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed).

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the question of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Calgary is well taken. I do not mean to say that this House has not the power to deal again with the matter which was dealt with last year, but the motion of the hon. gentleman is not in the right shape, and that point was made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary. This House passed a resolution by a decided majority which practically disposed of the question. Now if the hon. gentleman wishes to bring it——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is the hon. gentleman making another point of order, or explaining the point of order of the hon. gentleman from Calgary?

The SPEAKER—He is speaking to the point of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am simply endorsing what was said by the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed), that if the hon. gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) wishes that the action taken by the House last year be reversed, he should give notice of motion to rescind that resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Here is a matter which was completely settled by a resolution as pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and the only possible motion now is that that resolution be rescinded so that the House may deal with the matter again.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—If I may be allowed to express my humble opinion I should say that the point of order is not well taken. I understand that the motion which was referred to by the hon. gentleman from Calgary was in effect to tax the bill of costs which was presented by the counsel named. That has been done. There is no motion now to rescind the order of the House, nor to rescind the taxing of the bill of costs by the Minister of Justice, but the present motion is an expression of opinion that the Senate, for certain reasons which will be placed before us, should pay the bills without rescinding the order taxing these costs. We have before us the statement of the Deputy Minister of Justice that in his opinion the costs should be at a certain amount, but have we not the power, notwithstanding that statement, to declare that the balance of these costs should be paid ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is plain as A, B, C.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I be permitted to answer my hon. friend who has just spoken on the subject, and to say that it is obvious that the intention of referring the accounts to the Department of Justice was to ascertain the amount that should be paid. That amount, according to the statement made by the hon. leader of the government in this House, was paid. It is equally obvious that since that amount has been paid there could not have been a balance of account remaining unpaid, because the motion deals with a payment for legal services and expert witnesses, the subject-matter of the resolution which was passed by this House last session. It was dealt with last session according to the order of the House, and it therefore seems manifest that there cannot be any subject before the House.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Allow me——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Permit me further to say, before the hon. gentleman from Rothesay enlightens us further on the matter, that it would have been idle for this House to have referred the bill of costs to the Department of Justice for taxation if it be understood that after the department has taxed the account at a certain amount we are to pay the balance of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—What happened last session cannot affect our action this session, and whether the whole of the costs have been paid or not is a matter of opinion and open to discussion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I know that the hon. gentleman from Calgary is a very able lawyer, and it is a great labour for a layman like myself to argue with him. I ventured a suggestion with reference to a report of the Divorce Committee, and I was not allowed to open my mouth—but I observe now that the Commons has reversed the decision of the Senate in that case. My hon. friend has stated in speaking on the question of order that the account was disposed of. I state in this House freely and without fear of contradiction that I called on the Minister of Justice himself and he said that it was outrageous. He had no business to tax those costs. He was not in the office at the time, nor was the deputy, and some wretched clerk taxed the costs. The Minister of Justice authorized me to use his name in this House and to say that the bills should never have been sent to him, but should have been paid here. My hon. friend has presented an argument which is not tenable at all to my mind, because he is trying to raise a question of order to prove that this matter should not have been brought before the Senate of Canada. Two or three gentlemen have been trying to air themselves, but this is the highest court in the land and every grievance that originates in this House should be discussed in this chamber and should not be choked off. If this man has no right to be paid, then do not pay him at all, but I should like to see my hon. friend or any counsel of his celebrity go into court and come out without being paid. Mr. Aylesworth, who was a member of the government for a short time, told me the bill should be paid. Through what vindictiveness is it that it is not paid? All we ask is that the Senate in defence of its own honour should say whether for any reason this account should not be paid. My hon. friend has tried to choke it off, but his ground was not well taken in regard to the point of order. I ask the House to consider whether the decision of this clerk in the Department of Justice is to be supreme over this parliament. If it is we should know it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know whether it is quite competent to raise a point of order on the rescinding of a motion passed in a previous session. I think the power of rescinding applies to all motions except those adopted during the current session, and this is a motion passed last year. If we could not revoke what we did last year, where is the power to amend an Act of parliament or to bring in new legislation? If the point of order is with reference to the rescinding of a motion, it should apply to a motion passed during the present session and not to a motion passed during previous sessions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not present when my hon. friend raised this point of order, but from the discussion which has taken place I must confess that I cannot agree with him on the point of order which he has taken, for the reason that this account—and I may say parenthetically that I am not at all committing myself as to what my vote might be when the question of paying any more money is moved—this account was presented by a solicitor who performed special services on a committee. That account was thought to be exorbitant, and it was referred to the Department of Justice for taxation. It was taxed, and the amount which the Justice Department thought should be paid was paid. The motion now is clearly and plainly to pay the balance of the account. Surely that is not out of order. We may reject it, but perhaps if my hon. friend had been more explicit in his motion and had said 'that notwithstanding anything contained in the report of the Minister of Justice in reference to taxation, the balance of the account be now paid,' it would have been clearer, but I cannot well see how a point of order can be raised. The Senate is paramount. The Minister of Justice may report what he pleases, but the Senate may reject or confirm as they please, and if they think proper to order the payment of the balance of the account they have the right to do it. The statements made by the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) are of a most extraordinary character. The hon. gentleman in his remarks in reference to this account said that he had the authority of the Minister of Justice to state that the reduction of this gentleman's account was outrageous.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Allow me to correct what the hon. gentleman said. I waited on the Minister of Justice and he said he would not allow anybody to tax his account that way nor would he tax any account in that way, and that the Senate should pay the Bill—that he was entitled to be paid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—About as much difference as between tweedle dee and tweedle dum. The Senate authorizes sending an account to the Minister of Justice for taxation. The department of which the Minister of Justice is head reports ; the Senate acts upon that report, and then the Minister of Justice tells the hon. gentleman that the account never should have been in his department ; that he would not allow anybody to tax his bill in that way, and that it should have been paid.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is what I said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is an extraordinary position for the Minister of Justice to take with reference to his officials. One would suppose under our system of government that the head of the department is responsible for the acts of his officials.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I think the hon. gentleman lost sight of the fact that I stated that the Minister of Justice authorized me to make the statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That makes it ten times worse. I am not complaining of the hon. gentleman making the statement. I am complaining of the position taken by one of the leading members of the cabinet in repudiating the action of the officials of his department and authorizing the statement to be made in this House that what the official did should not have been done, and that the account should not have been dealt with as it was. However, this is only on a par with the manner in which the government has been administered departmentally for the last few years. I know it is contrary to the rules of the Senate and of parliament to refer to what may transpire in the other House, but any one who reads the newspapers—and I suppose I may refer to what appears there—will see one of the ministers voting against a motion of one of the other ministers in the same committee and in the House of Commons. This may be a new reading of the principle of responsible government. However, that has nothing to do with this question. I do not think the point of order is well taken, but I am somewhat surprised at the action of the Minister of Justice, and I do not well see how the leader of the Senate can approve of the position taken by his colleagues in matters of this kind. However, that is a matter for them to decide and not a question for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a quotation from Bourinot, page 452, which reads as follows:

It is, however, an ancient rule of parliament that 'no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the House has already been expressed during the current session.' The old rule of parliament reads : 'That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the House.' Unless such a rule were in existence the time of the House would be constantly frittered away in the discussion of motions of the same nature, and the most contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session. Consequently if a question or Bill is rejected in the Senate or Commons it cannot be regularly revived in the same House during the current session.

So that the point of order with regard to the rescinding of a motion cannot be invoked except in the case of a motion that has been made during the same session.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—In discussing these points of order we very often drift into a discussion of matters altogether outside of the point of order. The question of order arises in this way: A motion is made of which notice has been given by an hon. gentleman that the Senate give instructions to the proper officer of this honourable House to pay the balance of accounts due to the counsel-at-law and expert witness for services rendered by them to the special committee appointed during the last session of the Senate to investigate the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York. What is the matter which is referred to in this resolution? It is not interfering with the resolution of this House of the previous session. It has reference to a claim which was made for a certain sum for services. That claim was made last year and was referred to the department which usually deals with such matters, to determine the proper amount to be paid. We have the report of that department stating what is the proper amount, and now we have a motion for the payment of the balance of account due to the counsel-at-law. There is no question, it seems to me, of order in the matter at all. The wording of the motion is in itself perhaps a little short of being as complete as it might have been, because if this were stated to be the balance of the amount claimed by the counsel-at-law it is quite clear the matter would be open for discussion. I apprehend that is what the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Cloran) means—although what he says is to pay the balance of accounts due to the counsel-at-law. It is a perfectly good argument in answer to that to say that the whole amount due has been paid, but it seems to me that the motion before the chair is in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman from Toronto. If there is a claim which is not disputed for, say $100, and that claim has been paid and the receipt is laid on the table of the Senate, would a motion for the payment of the account be in order?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The balance of it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I say, would a motion for the payment be in order?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not if there is a receipt.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We are in the face of exactly the same situation. I claim that if the motion of the hon. gentleman was that the Senate should give instructions to the proper officer of this honourable House to pay the balance of the account, as filed by so-and-so, then the motion would be in order. But last session the claims were presented before this honourable House and this House decided that the amount due should be ascertained by taxation by the Department of Justice. That has been done; the amount due has been ascertained, and the amount taxed has been paid. That being the case we occupy the same position as in the case I have mentioned. If a claim for $100 had been presented and the full amount paid, and a receipt was before the Senate, would it be in order in that case to ignore the order of the House and move that that amount be paid? In my opinion the point is well taken, because as far as we are informed, if we are to act consistently with what was done by this House last session, the amount due has been paid.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is a pity the hon. gentleman spoke without knowing the facts. He says the amount due has been paid. Is that a fact? Does he assert that before this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am informed so.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Who is the hon. gentleman's authority?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am afraid the hon. member is confusing the amount due with the amount of the claim. I would not be surprised if he did. I am informed by the hon. Secretary of State that it appears from the papers which have been laid before this honourable House that the claim has been taxed, that the amount of the taxation has been paid, and that a receipt is on file as evidence of it. If so, the amount due has been paid.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—'If.' It is a good thing that 'if' was introduced. I have here a receipt in the following words addressed to the clerk of the Senate :

I duly received your favour of 17th instant inclosing cheque for $500 on account of counsel fees.

There is the only receipt produced before this honourable House from the records of the Department of Justice. He has received $500 on a claim of $3,303, so that the motion is perfectly in order. I quite agree with the hon. member from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) who has spoken on this matter, but before sitting down I protest against the action of the hon. member from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) in trying to limit the action of the Senate in this matter and prevent justice being done.

The SPEAKER—On the 10th of August, 1904. the following resolution was passed in the Senate :

That all the accounts for expenses incurred in connection with the select committee appointed to investigate the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York in Canada, other than travelling and hotel expenses, which have been handed in to the clerk for payment by the said committee, be referred to the Department of Justice for taxation.

This, from the documents laid on the table, the Department of Justice has done, in accordance with the resolution referring the bills to that department for taxation. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) under a form which I fear is somewhat irregular, appeals from the taxation of the Department of Justice, and asks that the Senate should overrule the taxation and grant a larger amount than the amount allowed by the Department of Justice. It would have been preferable that the resolution of the hon. gentleman should have mentioned the fact of the taxation and recommended that a further payment should be made regardless of that taxation ; but we have before us the resolution passed in August, 1904, which is self evident. It can be referred to in the discussion as against the resolution of the hon. gentleman. For that reason I declare the motion in order and that the point is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—When the hon. member from Calgary interrupted me I had just finished reading Mr. Coster's letter. I hope the hon. gentleman will give him fair-play and that the Senate will not consider itself bound by the decision of a subordinate official of the Department of Justice. The Minister of Justice and other ministers of the government have said that this amount should be paid, and that it was beneath the dignity of the Senate to refuse to pay it. Where is the secret influence that has been exercised to block this matter ? What the hon. member from Rothesay has said of the Minister of Justice is perfectly true. It was the same with the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. When I questioned him on the matter, he said, certainly the account ought to be paid. Once the Senate pledged its word to the agreement there is no backing out of it. Had this taxation been the decision of the Minister of Justice I would have had some respect for it, but the hon. member from Rothesay has told us that the Minister of Justice said that the account should never have been sent to his department and that he himself would never have undertaken to tax it. In the face of that statement and the statement I have made in the name of other ministers, the Senate should not hesitate one moment in ordering these accounts to be paid. The hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) says the amount due has been paid. The amount due has not been paid ; the amount allowed by a gentleman named Power may have been paid. He is the man who has undertaken to draw the knife through this account made out on behalf of the Senate. Here is the report of that official, made without the knowledge or approval of the Minister of Justice, made in contravention of his wishes. It is as follows :—

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 12th instant referring for taxation a number of accounts for witness fees, and also the account of Mr. Coster, who acted as counsel in connection with the select committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, I have the honour to state that the witnesses appear to have been paid at the rate of $5 per day and their travelling expenses. This appears to me quite sufficient——

That decision is not the decision of the Department of Justice, or the government of Canada, or of the Senate, but the decision of Mr. Power. Fortunately for our honour and the honour of the government, it is merely the decision of a clerk in the department. What did Mr. Power know about the work done by Mr. Coster? We cannot be tied down by the decision of a man acting without the sanction and against the wishes of his chief. This case has occupied a good deal of attention in the United States, in the same way as the investigation into the affairs of the Equitable of New York is now occupying the attention of the Canadian people. Who knows whether the action of the Canadian Senate last year, was not the beginning of the investigation into the affairs of the Equitable Life of New York and may be the beginning of investigations into the affairs of other companies in Canada and the United States which are in an equally rotten condition. Mr. Coster had integrity and ability, and was equal to the legal talent arrayed against him. He stood there alone against that talent and ferreted out these facts in spite of some members of the committee, yet we are told by a Mr. Power, in the Department of Justice, 'I will allow him $30 a day for each day of the actual sitting.' It is a wonder he did not allow Mr. Coster a little overtime, when he worked from eight until eleven or twelve o'clock at night. He does not allow him as much as a common labouring man who works overtime. This House cannot sanction such a report. Our bounden duty here, as men of honour, is to hold to the definite agreement and give instructions to the proper officer of this House to pay the accounts in full, not only the account of Mr. Coster, but that of Mr. Patterson, one of the most able and conscientious actuaries on the continent of America, a Canadian who holds a high position among the insurance people of both the United States and Canada. Is he to be told after making the best effort of his life to assist the committee in its investigation, that he must be satisfied with $5 a day and hotel expenses. I say it is not fair. Mr. Patterson holds a high position in his walk of life, and it is a shame if he is to be told that the immense amount of work he did for that committee should be paid for at the rate of $5 a day and expenses. They want to pay him at that rate only for his actual appearance before the committee, when I and other members of the committee know of his own knowledge that outside of such appearances he was occupied with the examination of documents that would fill a room. His account is a small one, amounting to $1,290, and he worked day and night. It is only fair to instruct the officers of the Senate to pay these accounts as a matter of honour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is only fair to the House to say in what position Mr. Power was acting at the time he taxed these bills. In the original letter he signs himself as Acting Deputy Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He had better not act any more as deputy.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I should hardly think it necessary to say anything on this subject. Hon. gentlemen are aware that a very great outrage was committed on the public by this Mutual Reserve Company. I have no fault to find with those who thought that the investigation should not take place; we cannot all agree on such subjects. From the time the investigation started there was a most determined opposition. Why should that opposition arise? I can understand why such a conflict might arise if we were in a court of justice. There is something to strive for there, but what was there to strive for in this matter? Was it wrongdoing to ask parliament to look into that question? As my hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has said, possibly our investigation may have been the cause of the investigation now going on in New York into the affairs of the Equitable Life. The hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen), having due regard to his position and status in the country as a well known man, brought up the question of insurance the other day in this House, and held that it was a question whether these insurance companies should have power in their own hands to invest their money as they thought fit.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I rise to a point of order. It appears to me we are getting away from the whole question. The subject before us is not the position of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, but whether certain persons employed by a committee of this House shall be paid for their services.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—If my hon. friend feels sensitive, I will not refer to it. I was only going on to show how necessary the investigation was.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman, I think, is speaking somewhat apart from the matter under consideration. The necessity of the investigation is not the subject before the Senate. It is a question of paying a balance of an account.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Why should he be paid if he did not do service? I am only showing the reason why he was employed, and why his services should be paid for, not with any idea of casting a reflection on anybody else. He was appointed by this honourable body, and did his work; and I was only trying to show the great importance of that work. The Senate and the country will some day wake up and see that the hon. member for Rothesay and the hon. committee and the gentleman who acted as solicitor, were right. Had their advice been taken the poor widows and orphans would not have suffered as they are going to suffer, because it is inevitable; but for some unexplained reason the company seem to have great power here. I will not say what I should like to say, because I might be reproved for using unparliamentary language. It is very difficult to prove statements, but I think if Mr. Coster had been any one else but Mr. Coster, he would have been paid in full. I hold in my hand a minute of the committee showing that the committee had the authority of the House to appoint and pay him, and I have here a statement showing what the committee agreed to pay him. Why was not objection taken then? Mr. Coster was appointed by the committee, the committee was appointed by the House and the House authorized him to be paid. The account was made up by the committee and signed, yet he was not paid. I hold in my hand a telegram from the Minister of Justice. He never served for any $30 a day, but because Mr. Coster comes from the lower provinces and not from the province of Quebec it is decided he shall not be paid more. The telegram of the Minister of Justice, dated November 2nd, promises to reopen the Coster matter as requested. With that telegram in my hand, can there be any harm in asking whether Mr. Power can dictate what Mr. Coster shall be paid? It seems to me there is an over-riding influence being exerted over this hon. body. I asked six months ago for certain returns regarding that company, and they are not down yet. I was met with the answer when I moved for them, that it would take months to prepare them. I have waited patiently and calmly for that return. Are we not entitled to the return? What is there to be kept back from the people of Canada? If there is nothing wrong, there is no harm in bringing it down; if there is anything wrong it should be produced without delay. The people of Canada will watch those proceedings, and I am very much mistaken if they will not declare in the long run that from first to last every difficulty has been placed in the way of this investigation, and that this refusal to pay Mr. Coster is a method of punishing a man who endeavoured to free Canada from the sharks. If he is not paid I shall endeavour to get him paid by public subscription from all over Canada for trying to guard the rights of the people. Had things turned out differently perhaps he would have been paid. He had a noble object before him, and the whole country looked to the Senate to protect those who were suffering through the course pursued by this insurance company. Mr. Coster can say: Here is my contract. I hold in my hand the bond of employment, the appointment to act as counsel for the committee. My account was passed by the committee, and yet parliament will not pay me. Some individual named Power, whoever he may be, seems to be more powerful than parliament. I find fault that there should be a power outside the Senate which controls us and curtails our right of action and our usefulness. There is nothing more to be said except that this man has been employed and it is not consistent with right or justice that he should not be paid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman read the telegram from the Minister of Justice ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend will understand this is a telegram I sent to the minister complaining of the injustice, and asking him as he had been away and his deputy had been away, to re-open the case, as I was not willing to accept the dictum of this clerk in the department. His answer is : 'Will re-open Coster matter as you request. (Sgd.) C. Fitzpatrick.'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Has the hon. gentleman made any further application to re-open the case ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have just said that I went to him and he said that it was an outrage and that Mr. Coster should be paid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did he reconsider the question ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He said the department had nothing to do with it, that it never should have been sent there at all.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I do not know what direct effect the investigation had upon that particular company, but I may say that indirectly it had a good effect. We may not have got from it the pound of cure, but we certainly have the ounce of prevention. The attention of the people of Canada was called to the necessity of carefully selecting the companies in which they insure their lives, and securing in every way the funds upon which their families rely for a living after the death of the insured. It has been shown that while the great majority of insurance companies are safe, there are some which are not, and therefore it is proper for the insured to be very careful in selecting the company in which to place their insurance. On the other hand the companies which to-day carry hundreds of millions of insurance, have been shown that the eye of this House at least if not, unfortunately, the eye of the Department of Finance is upon them; that there is a searchlight in operation, and that they must be careful in their methods, because they are amenable, if not to the Department of Finance and to the Department of Insurance, at least to this Senate. Considering those results, and considering further what has happened lately in the United States, where the affairs of one of the three leading companies of the world, the Equitable, have, through the acts of their president and vice-president, Mr. Hyde and Mr. Alexander, been brought to the attention of the legislature and the attention of President Roosevelt. I say considering those indirect facts, we should not begrudge the fees of the attorney who has been attending to the work. We should allow him the ordinary price paid to attorneys for conducting other investigations where the result perhaps has not been so far-reaching and timely. I should regret to see the Senate act in a small way in this matter. I shall not use the word I have in my mind in regard to that reference to the Department of Justice, but I may say that it is more or less of a farce. We have no business to refer to the Department of Justice the cost of what we are doing. There are in this House from twelve to twenty lawyers possibly just as well able to decide what is due to a leading attorney for professional services as those officials in the Department of Justice, where they are on friendly terms with the officials of the Department of Finance, at whose door perhaps, if investigation should be made, some blame might be laid. I do not say that any wrong, other than negligence, could be brought home to them. I hope for one that the motion of the hon. gentleman from Victoria will be carried, and that we will not in this instance singularize ourselves by littleness and smallness.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—The question before us is not whether that inquiry was a wise or an unwise one, or whether it resulted in great good or otherwise. The question we have to consider here is simply the account which is before us. While I took strong ground against the wisdom of the reference to a select committee, the Senate having granted the committee and sanctioned the proceedings, and authorized the retaining of counsel, that does not prevent me from exercising my judgment in reference to the counsel and witness. Ordinarily when a solicitor renders services to his client—and I take it that in this particular case the Senate is in the position of a client—the solicitor usually renders a signed bill. The client has one month by statute within which he may have that bill referred to taxation or pay it. I understand, though I was not present at the time, that this bill was referred to the Department of Justice for taxation. The bill having been regularly referred to the Department of Justice for taxation, if the bill was properly taxed by a proper taxing officer of that department, that fixes the amount which ought to be paid. The 'balance of account due' is a rather ambiguous expression. No matter what the account was rendered at, the amount fixed—I am speaking now of cases at law—the amount fixed by the proper taxing officer is the amount due ; but it is also open to the party aggrieved to appeal to the court from that taxation. It seems to me that this matter comes up somewhat by way of an appeal, but I understand it is claimed there really was no taxation by a proper authority. I can hardly go so far as that, and I am sorry that some hon. gentleman felt it necessary to speak of subordinate officers in the language they have employed. I do not know that officer, but I would feel hurt, if I were trying to do my duty in the Department of Justice, if my conduct in that matter had been spoken of in such terms. But I take it the matter is here now and I understand the Minister of Justice has virtually repudiated the responsibility of his department for the taxation. I do not see that any other inference can be drawn from his telegram. If I had been acting for the solicitor, I would have taken the account to the Department of Justice and I would have said: 'Am I to understand that you are going to revise the taxation of your subordinate officers, or do you repudiate the responsibility altogether?' I take it that is the position, because that is the interpretation to be put upon the telegram, that he throws the account back upon the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—When I presented the case to the Minister of Justice he said 'Let the Senate pay their own bills. We have nothing to do with it.'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I want to do justice to a professional man with whom I am not acquainted. As the matter comes before us now there has been no taxation, and there is to be no taxation. We have to tax the accounts ourselves and say whether they are fair and reasonable. Although I was strongly opposed to the incurring of this expenditure, I feel that under the circumstances I must do justice according to my light and as at present advised, I shall vote for the payment of the balance of the bill as rendered—I think we have no other alternative. I will therefore support the motion for payment of the account, because the amount has not been fixed. The Minister of Justice repudiates his right to fix it and that leaves the matter in the position that the amount due to these people is the amount certified to by the chairman. I think the committee ought to be very careful to allow the right amount, and I think we will have to fall back on the taxation of the committee and pay the balance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It might be as well that we should consider fairly the position of accounts before the Senate. I read now from Bourinot on the item of payment of witnesses, he says :

> By a rule common to the Senate and House of Commons, the clerk of either House is instructed to pay every witness summoned to appear before a committee a reasonable sum for attendance, to be determined in the Commons by the Speaker, and also for travelling expenses upon a certificate or order of the chairman of the committee, but no witneses shall be so summoned and paid unless a certificate shall have been first filed by the chairman of the committee or a member thereof, stating that the evidence of such witness is material and important, and no witness residing at the seat of government shall be paid for his attendance. Under this certificate it is the practice to pay witnesses their travelling and hotel expenses, but nothing is necessarily allowed for loss of time, even in the case of professional men. Printed forms are provided and certified by the clerk of the House before payment is made by the accountant. No witness who comes as a witness at the instance of parties interested in a private way is paid by the House.

When these accounts were first rendered some members of the Senate thought they were rather high. The accounts total $5,809. Mr. Bradshaw was paid in full, Stevenson in full—that is travelling and hotel expenses. The amounts paid were as follows : Bradshaw, $1,873 ; Stevenson, $55 ; Wells, $280. Mr. Wells, for Mr. Pendleton, $97. Patterson claimed $1,290 ; he was paid $240. Eldridge claimed $655, and he was paid $155.60. Coster claimed $3,303.60.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Was Mr. Eldridge the Mutual Reserve man ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never attended a committee, and gathered my information from reports from time to time. Coster claimed, as retainer, $250; he was paid $100. Then he claimed $5 per day, hotel expenses for 54 days. That was allowed in full. Then travelling expenses two trips St. John, N.B., to Ottawa and return, $83.60. That was paid in full. Then counsel fee from the 3rd June, 1904, to 2nd July, 1904, both inclusive, and from 9th July, 1904, to August 1st, 1904, both inclusive—54 days at $50 a day, $2,700. He was allowed $30 a day for every day the committee sat. He was allowed 20 days. His whole bill was $3.303.60 of which he was paid $1,053.60. My hon. friend stated there was only a receipt for $500.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—According to the record.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised some previous payments were made.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then we have not the complete record.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The resolution referring the matter to the Department of Justice was carried in this House without any opposition from either side. Mr. Power was acting deputy minister at the time, Mr. Newcombe, the deputy minister, being away. Mr. Power is a very fair and conscientious man and holds a prominent position in the Department of Justice. I have no further comment to offer than to say that the department followed the instructions of the Senate. I am very much surprised to hear the telegram which has been read; I never heard it before. It does seem to me very extraordinary, when such a telegram was sent, that the question was not reopened. If the minister thought the account had not been fairly considered and wanted to reopen the matter, he should have done so, but he has not thought fit to reopen the matter up to the present time, and, therefore, it looks as if he had concurred in the report of his official.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Is $50 the usual fee paid for counsel appearing before a committee of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, double that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The fees paid to counsel vary very materially. If a counsel appeared for one or two days a larger fee might be allowed, but certainly where an inquiry is protracted over a considerable period and the committee does not sit every day, sitting only from time to time, the allowance is usually smaller. However, I do not make any comment on this charge; I do not express an opinion.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then $30 would not be a fair allowance?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He did more work outside of the committee than he did in it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He asked $50 for 54 days, and he was allowed $30 a day for 20 days.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN——I happen to be a member of that committee, and in my humble opinion there has not been a committee of this House which has rendered better service to this country than the Mutual Reserve Committee. I know that thousands of people in Canada have contributed from year to year their hard-earned means with the expectation that there would be a fulfilment of the covenants of their insurance policies with the Mutual Reserve institution, and on investigation it was proved to be one of the most rotten institutions that ever had an existence. I am satisfied that the New York Mutual Reserve although in a miserably embarrassed financial position paid double for counsel fees, double the amount charged by Mr. Coster if he got every cent of his bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Ten times as much.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am quite sure Mr. Aylesworth never attended the committee for $30 a day. In the next place the hon. Secretary of State says that Mr. Coster was allowed $30 every day the committee sat. I should like to know what Mr. Coster would be expected to do a thousand miles from his home. Here he was in an hotel, and I can honestly say that in my extended experience in business matters and lawsuits I never saw a man work more diligently night and day than Mr. Coster. I think it is a serious matter if we are going to cut him down to $30 a day for every day the committee sat and allow nothing at all when he was away from home and working in his room at the hotel.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Why did the committee not procure a lawyer nearer home? What would be the consequence if the committee had brought a lawyer from the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The committee was guided in their selection of this gentleman by the assurance that he was well posted with regard to all the affairs connected with the Mutual Reserve. We had the most positive evidence that he was. We knew that he had handled some lawsuits against the association, and knew the history of the company from top to bottom. Under those circumstances, we believe that he was a good man to employ, and that is the reason he was selected. I regret very much that Mr. Patterson was put off with $5 a day and travelling expenses. I can assure this House that when that investigation was going on here Mr. Patterson had in his pocket an offer of $20 a day and travelling expenses if he would go down, I think it was to Indiana, for the purpose of investigating some financial tangle that took place there in connection with insurance. His usual fee was from $10 to $20 a day, I believe. He is an exceedingly clever actuary, a man of first-class education to begin with, well up in his profession in the way of criticising transactions of insurance companies; and I think it is a small thing to ask that man to remain here on an allowance of $5 a day. I think, everything considered, Mr. Coster's account is not an unreasonably large one. He laboured very assiduously night and day, and did all he could. He had two or three lawyers opposed to him all the time. The company were not even satisfied with that, but they had their New York lawyer present. During the whole of the investigation we had two Canadian lawyers fighting continually, taking advantage of every technicality that could be thought of to obstruct the investigation. I am positive that in the county from where I come the people have saved sufficient money to pay the whole of the law costs from the number of policies which have been cancelled by members who have left the company.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—In the speeches which have been made reference has been made only to counsel. But I observe in the motion that the experts are mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the witness the hon. senator from Wellington has just been talking about. Mr. Patterson is the only one.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—He is not an expert at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No other expert can compare with him.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Is there any proof that he was employed the twenty days for which he charges?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As a matter of justice, it should not be called twenty days only. We had sittings in the morning at ten o'clock and we had sittings in the evenings from eight to eleven. There were twenty days actual sitting. We sat Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays. We did not sit on Saturdays or Mondays, but the counsel could not go home to New Brunswick in the meantime. He used to spend his time looking up documents.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I am glad to hear what is said with reference to the effect of the examination made by the committee. My own judgment at the time the examination was going on was somewhat against it. I thought there were many times when the committee ought to have been stopped. Those who left the company would have done so without the investigation. But it must be remembered, with reference to counsel, that the Senate appointed the committee to carry on the examination and authorized the employment of counsel. Now, it appears to me that we are committed to the expense. It may be unfortunate, but it is so. The witnesses and different persons employed, including the lawyer, are entitled to a fair allowance for their services. I do not think that for a man of Coster's standing the amount which is allowed him is sufficient, when we consider the time which he has devoted to this work.

With reference to the examination of the matter by the Department of Justice, there appears to be something very remarkable about it. I think Mr. Power is a man of reputation in his department, and I am sorry that any reference should be made to him in the way of a slur of any kind. But the telegram submitted by the hon. gentleman from Rothesay declares a willingness, to say the very least of it, on the part of the minister, that the examination should be opened up, and conveys an impression that he is not himself satisfied. I think the bill ought to be paid, inasmuch as the Senate committed itself by a deliberate action to the appointment of a committee to do the work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman include the expert ?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Are we bound to vote for the fee claimed by the expert if we vote for the payment of the fee to counsel ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It includes everything.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Although I have not seen Mr. Coster since he left Ottawa last year, I have not the slightest doubt that he would be man enough to refuse payment of his account if the expert witness—without whose work Mr. Coster would not have been able to prove the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association to be a band of thieves—was not paid also.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—How much was Mr. Patterson paid ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is asking for the 54 days he was here $1,290 and travelling expenses—at the rate of $20 a day. I am proud to feel that this Senate has agreed with the chairman of the committee in regard to this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Honourable gentlemen must recollect that this item ought to go into the estimates ; there is no appropriation for it. I do not see how it can be paid this year if voted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the position the Senate last year referred the question of these costs unanimously to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice made a report ; that report as I understand has been acted upon and the sums indicated by the Department of Justice have been paid.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, they are not paid yet, only a part of them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand they have been paid, or if not they will be paid when the parties apply for their money. Now it is proposed that this House which, without any difference of opinion left the question of the taxation of these costs to the Department of Justice, should ignore its own action of last year, and the action of the Department of Justice. The hon. gentleman from Rothesay has adopted what I consider to be a somewhat unusual course. He has made the statement that the Minister of Justice repudiated the action of the gentleman who was acting as his deputy. That is a very extraordinary circumstance and one that deserves to be inquired into.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—By whom ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—By the proper party.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Who is that ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall try and make that clear. We are in this position, that it is the duty of the Department of Justice under the circumstances to make a further report to the Senate. I do not think it is the duty of the Senate to conclude that the officer who made the report was not authorized to do so. The Department of Justice would have been justified in declining to deal with the matter, but having become seized of it, the Department of Justice cannot say now : We have given you a report, we cannot do anything more about it. As the matter has been referred to the Department of Justice and as according to the hon. member for Rothesay, there would be some question as to what the Department of Justice really decided, we should have a further report from the department. When the whole matter was fresh in the minds of members last year, they thought the claims made were exorbitant, and should be taxed by the Department of Justice. I do not see why now, without further light on the subject, we should agree to pay claims which last session we considered exorbitant.

The Senate divided on the motion which was rejected by the following vote :

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Can a senator vote when he comes in after the motion is put or while the vote is being taken?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—He must hear the motion put from the chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The proper way is to call the names of the senators first.

The division list was read.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman whose vote is challenged was absent when the motion was read, he had no right to vote.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would ask if the Hon. Senator McGregor was in the House when the motion was put?

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I was not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then I ask to have the vote struck out.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I believe a senator, in order to be allowed to vote, must hear the question when it is put from the chair, and must be within the precincts.

The SPEAKER—Do I understand the hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia to say that he did not hear the question put?

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I did not hear the question put. I heard the debate and was in my room when the division bell rang.

The SPEAKER—Did the hon. gentleman understand the question put by the chair?

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I did not hear the question put, but I think I understood the question.

The SPEAKER—The name must be erased.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Was the Hon. Mr. Ross present?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I should like to know why the Hon. Mr. Dobson did not vote?

Some hon. MEMBERS—Paired.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State a question. I understand there is a division of opinion with regard to the effect of this motion voted on. Some hon. members say it is to pay only the balance——

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The matter has been dealt with by the House.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am asking for information; is the man not to receive the sum already awarded to him by the Department of Justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That has been paid.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I understood it was not.

PATENT OF WM. A. DAMEN BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (M) An Act respecting patent of Wm. A. Damen.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to concurrence in the amendments. I rise to call attention to the character of the amendment which has been made. On the face of the report made by the House of Commons it looks like a very innocent amendment, but on investigation it will be found to go a long way beyond what appears on the face of it. Last year by chap. 72 we extended the rights of a number of patentees to their patents until the first of last January, a term of six months. The Bill which is now before us, when introduced in the Senate, was for the purpose of adding another patent to those mentioned in the preamble of chap. 72 which we passed last year. In the House of Commons they not only added that patent to the number mentioned in chap. 72, but extended the rights of the patentees to all these inventions, for another year, including the one that we are dealing with. Instead of granting an extension for six months, the Bill now extends all the patents included in chap. 72, for a period of two years. I call the attention of the Senate to the loose way in which we accept those amendments without understanding what they really mean. It is another lesson to us that we should be careful to consider amendments made to our Bills by the House of Commons. My own opinion is that we deal too leniently with these inventions. People get a certain right for a number of years to manufacture a patented article in the Dominion. They do not move during the whole time, and every one else is prevented manufacturing that article. Then at the expiration of the time they come here and ask for an extension. In a number of Bills passed in the Senate this year, the House of Commons reduced the time to six months and we accepted that. In this instance, however, the House of Commons extended the time to two years, and not only that but included in that extension several other patents. There is a clause in this Bill to protect those who have commenced to manufacture the patented article since the first of January.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I am very much obliged to the gentleman for calling the attention of the Senate to the nature of the amendment. While the House of Commons have granted a longer extension of time than usual, clause 3 protects all parties interested, so that no person can be injured by the Senate accepting these amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 176) An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act.

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The method adopted in making amendments to the Bill has been to repeal the clause and re-enact it with the changes, even though they are only a word or two. In reference to the first clause the department require when there are any changes made in a building used for excise purposes that the plan must be filed. It is to apply to cases where the improvements are very immaterial.

The first clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only change is that the word 'gauging' is struck out and the word 'weighing' is substituted. Gauging is done away with and weighing takes its place.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 162) An Act to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

Second Sitting.

The Senate met at 8 p.m.

Routine proceedings.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL—THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 181) An Act to amend the Bank Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill was held over for a few days for the purpose of ascertaining whether in the opinion of those who have given it some thought and attention, particularly the Finance Minister, it would be desirable to fix a limit to the number of directors. The opinion of the government is that it would be better to leave the Bill as it is. I had myself suggested a limit of fifteen. The answer to that suggestion is that there are many small banks with a capital of one and a half to two millions who are now satisfied with a very small number of directors, and that there would be a pressure on those small banks to bring up the number of directors to the limit. Therefore it would probably be safer to leave the number at present undefined rather than bring it up to a figure higher than it ever has been.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Ought it not be proportionate to the amount of capital.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but there is no clause in the Bank Act applying to that case.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman is no doubt right; there should be a limit to the number.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The banks are the best judges of the number of directors they require.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I understand, the maximum number of directors appointed is ten.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those words are struck out by this Bill. It is now optional with the shareholders of the Bank to fix the number of directors. The leader of the opposition himself suggested a limitation, and as fifteen is the number fixed under the Joint Stock Companies Act, that figure was spoken of. However, when I brought up the matter a second time, he said he had no very decided opinion on the subject and did not care to press his views. On discussing the point with some gentlemen who profess to have given it some thought and attention, they urged that if there was a limit, it would be an incentive to some of the smaller banks to increase the number of directors. As it is now, there are many small banks who have not ten directors.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is now proposed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To leave it optional.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is the proper way.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have no very decided opinion on the subject, but I think since we are amendng the Act we had better leave it to the different banks without fixing a limit of fifteen. Let them regulate the number themselves. The smaller banks, if they are judicious and careful in their management, will see that they have not too many. Large banks like the Bank of Montreal may find it necessary to have directors in different parts of the country, and in different countries, so I think it is just as well, if the Act is amended at all, to let it go without fixing a limit.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It would be desirable to fix a minimum so that there should not be less than a certain number.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the law now.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I do not know that this legislation is going to be beneficial, I have very grave doubt of it myself. Ten is a good number for a board of directors for a bank. I can easily see that this will open the way for a great many men to get on the board of directors of a bank who would not be able to do so if this Act had not been passed. There are men in the country who hold quite a large amount of stock and who would be glad to get on a bank board, but instead of being of use they may be actually a hindrance because they are not up to date in their views regarding banking. It would have been better to leave the number at ten and give the Bank of Montreal the desired power to elect an honorary president. I do not know whether the banks have been consulted, or whether they sent in a request for this change. I should like to know from the government if they have asked for this legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that there has been any formal communication with the banks. As hon. gentlemen know, a Bill was introduced at the instance of the Bank of Montreal, giving that bank power to increase the number of directors. The Finance Minister thought it was better not to single out the Bank of Montreal, that it might create a little feeling of jealousy on the part of the other banks, and it was thought better to leave the matter to the shareholders. I do not think the privilege of electing a large board is likely to be abused. There are many small banks which have now only five, six or seven directors. They have the right to go up to ten, but their good sense has led them to keep within narrow limits, and therefore I do not see that the privilege granted under this Bill is likely to be abused, judging from the experience of the past.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—As one of the public who have nothing to do with banks either as manager or director, I fail to see why a bank should be regulated more than any other society. I do not see why the government should take these associations called banks and impose certain rules on them, unless there is some special reason for it. If the number were proportionate to the capital, I could understand it. Unless it is based on some good foundation, it is an unwarranted assumption on the part of those who impose such a restriction on the bank. The shareholders should be allowed to elect forty directors, or only two, if they choose. They are handling their own money, and moreover one talented man is worth fifty ordinary men, so it would depend largely on the talent of the directors. I wish to know if any hon. gentleman here can say why this arbitrary number should be fixed ?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The restriction is removed by this Bill. There is no limit now except the minimum. My hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) asked if the different banks of the country have sought this legislation. The reply of the hon. Secretary of State, was that he did not understand they had, but this Bill has been before the public for a long time, and if the banks of Canada felt that the Bill was not in the right direction, they would have at once opposed it. They have been neutral in the matter, and consequently there does not seem to be any harm in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (159) An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is to provide for the intermediate period covered by the change which is taking place in converting territories into provinces. The clauses all relate to the proposed new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should not the last subsection of clause 1, relate to both provinces ? It makes provision for an electoral district which is partly in Alberta, but it does not seem to make provision vice versa.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was carefully drawn in the Justice Department, and I presume all the possibilities were discussed. It is so palpable, it must have been considered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Perhaps my apprehensions are unfounded, because if the electoral district is partly in the province of Alberta, the other part would be in the province of Saskatchewan, and it is therefore provided that the proceedings shall be conducted in the province of Alberta. That will meet the case.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (161) An Act to amend the Northwest Irrigation Act, 1898.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the lands belong to the federal power, the irrigation laws will necessarily be under the Federal Government at Ottawa ; and this Bill makes provision for their management and the appointment of such officers as may be necessary to carry out the terms of the Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

VANCOUVER, VICTORIA AND EASTERN RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (139) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.

He said : This Bill has reference to a railway company in the province of British Columbia. The legislature of British Columbia incorporated a company with authority to build a railway from the cities of Victoria and Vancouver, penetrating the Hope Mountains and connecting with the railways in the Boundary Creek country, at or near Midway or Rossland. In 1896 this company had an Act passed by this parliament confirming the provincial Act, and one of the reasons for asking for this Bill is that it is doubtful whether the legislation then granted by the Dominion parliament properly confirmed the provincial Act. Clause No. 1 was passed upon by a sub-committee of the Railway Committee of the House of Commons and by the Justice Department; and the clause now appearing in the Bill is the result. This clause is practically the same as was passed during the present session of this parliament confirming to the Nicola, Kamloops and Similkameen Railway powers and privileges which had been given them by previous legislation, but which were considered to be more or less in doubt. With respect to clause 2, the company asks for power to build a short line of railway between the Fraser River bridge near Liverpool and a place called Oliver's on the line of the Victoria Terminal Railway and Ferry Company. This is a line connecting the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster with the city of Victoria on Vancouver Island. With respect to clause 3 the company asks for permission to cross the boundary line in the province of British Columbia with a view to obviating or overcoming physical difficulties connected with the building of the line on Canadian territory.

As the House will know British Columbia, as a whole, is very mountainous particularly southern and central British Columbia, and it is very difficult to construct railways. The whole country is mountainous, with very narrow valleys. Hence it has been found that to run a line of railway from Midway straight to the coast it would be necessary to have very heavy gradients at several places and the result would be a railway costing an enormous sum of money, and one which would cost immeasurably more to operate in the future than a longer alternate line. So that the company in clause 3 ask permission to cross the boundary line at a point to be decided upon by the Governor in Council. That amendment was made in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, that is to say, the permission to cross the boundary line, and the point at which they shall cross is to be determined by the Governor in Council. It must be shown that it is necessary for the purpose of avoiding the difficulties of construction. The other clauses are not very important. Clause four is the usual provision with reference to entering into an agreement between this company and some subsidiary companies which are practically owned by the holders of the charter of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway Company, with a view to amalgamation and consolidation. Clause 5 is the usual provision for the time of construction. These I think are the essential features of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Where does the navigation come in?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It comes in between Vancouver Island and the mainland. It is the intention of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway to make an agreement with the Victoria Terminal Ferry Company, a local company, operating two short branches and a ferry between the island of Vancouver and the mainland at Port Guichon on the Fraser River. This Bill, I might say in general terms, is one of enormous importance to British Columbia. The entire delegation of British Columbia members in the House of Commons and in the Senate are unanimous in support of this Bill—a somewhat unusual thing in matters of this kind, unusual not only in regard to British Columbia but in regard to every other province. In the Commons a rather strenuous opposition to this Bill was raised in the committee, but I am advised that that opposition has ceased, and there is no longer any desire on the part of any person to see this Bill defeated or amended in such way as to defeat its object or to defer its passage. It will, therefore, be unnecessary for me at this stage of the proceedings, to deal with some of the objections that were urged in the other House in regard to this Bill. I desire that this Bill be read the second time tonight and go to the Railway Committee to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see why I should not raise an objection at this stage of the Bill, prompted by the position taken yesterday by the government. The government would not introduce the Autonomy Bill because it was not printed in French, and I think the government should be consistent and should not press this Bill because it is not printed in French.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman is quite in error. The Bill is printed in French, as I took very good care to ascertain about midday to-day. I inspected some of the files of members of the Senate and did not find it there so I took the trouble of laying a French copy of the Bill on the desk of my hon. friend. I have some copies here and would be glad to send them to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have two English copies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am surprised that my hon. friend should express surprise at any inconsistency on the part of the government. That is a matter which we can fully appreciate and he need express no surprise. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who moved the Bill, a question regarding the line described in the second line of the third paragraph, which reads as follows:—

The company may at such points on the international boundary line between the west bank of the Similkameen River and the Columbia River as the company deems expedient—

In order to connect those two points is it necessary to go through the United States?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the portion of the country described by the hon. gentleman as being so mountainous as to render it necessary to divert the line southward in order to reach those two points?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The object of crossing the boundary line at a point between the Similkameen River and the Columbia River is that there are great physical difficulties in the way of construction. There is a mountain range locally known as Anarchist Mountain or Sidley Mountain, which runs north and south, as nearly all the mountain ranges in British Columbia do. To cross that mountain would entail enormous difficulties and would necessitate gradients that would be unworkable. By following the watercourse of the Similkameen River they can get round the southern end of that mountain, diverting the line of railway for some 30 or 40 miles through the State of Washington, and coming out again into the province of British Columbia, and continuing from thence to the town of Princeton and the coast. It is entirely with a view of surmounting these difficulties that the order of the Governor General is asked for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If they receive a report from their engineers or surveyors that the line can be built in Canadian territory between those points, the government will insist upon it being so built; but if the character of the country is such that it cannot be done they will permit it to go through the United States. I understand that to be the meaning of the clause.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that a very long and sharp discussion took place in the Commons over this Bill. The 'Free Press' of the 27th June, published an article on the Bill which is not accurate, and, as far as I am concerned, I wish to contradict the statement contained in that article and make my position clear. That report makes it appear that the members from British Columbia are opposed strongly to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is untrue. I do not know of any member from British Columbia who is opposed to the Canadian Pacific Railway. It states also that we are urged on in the matter because the Canadian Pacific Railway bought the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. Now, we are all delighted at that purchase. The facts are just the reverse of what is stated in this article. There is not a member from British Columbia who is not glad that the Canadian Pacific Railway have bought that road, because it will put new life and vigour in that railway, which has been doing nothing for years. The 'Free Press' says:

The British Columbia members, all seven of them, and the three Senators from the province——

That is incorrect, to begin with, because there are only two Senators from the province. The article continues—— are spurred to quicker action by the equipment of the Vancouver Island Railway by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

That is false, because we are all delighted at it.

They say that this corporation is an octopus, with a large 'O.'——

I do not know if any member said that. If he did I am entirely ignorant of it. I know the members, and they are all extremely friendly to the Canadian Pacific Railway. They see what the railway has done, that it has opened up the Northwest country and developed the trade from the coast to China and Japan. The article makes a very nasty insinuation against members that because they formerly got tickets from the Canadian Pacific Railway for transportation, they sold their independence. That is not a very nice thing for a paper to say, and I should like every member of this House to give that paper the strongest castigation they possibly can. The article continues——

Freed from any of the charges of former subservience by the new law which compels Canadian railways to issue passes to members of parliament, there is now evidence of a spirit of independence of the persuasive methods of the railway corporations.'

It indicates that formerly we had no independence and were cringing to the Canadian Pacific Railway because we had free passes. I can deny emphatically every word the 'Free Press' has said. A few years ago a gentleman from the United States wished to get a railway charter similar to this, and I was opposed to it, for I thought it would do us more harm than good. I saw Sir Charles Tupper about it and the Bill was afterwards defeated. Now, I have changed my mind. The Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway both run into the United States territory and no harm will be done by granting the permission desired in the present case. We lost our trade with the mining country because we had not a road of this kind. The trade went to Spokane instead of to Canadian cities, and I think this road will do us good. In supporting it, I desire to express my entire friendship for the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know what it has done and what it is doing.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If the road runs across the boundary and into United States territory, what authority has the Railway Commission over that portion of the road running into the United States? I can understand the prudence of diverting the line if there be the mountain range spoken of; but we should be very careful and very guarded indeed when we grant permission to run 40 or 50 miles across the line and make connections with United States lines on the the other side.

The Bill says that if the commission is satisfied that it is necessary to avoid the difficulties of construction, they may permit this diversion. Well, we know what the commissioners will do under the circumstances. We know also that if this road is built for the purpose of reaching some of the iron mines up there, and the company desire to ship the ore to the United States, we have no evidence that they might not possibly tap our mines and carry the ore to the United States. My hon. friend says, 'hear, hear.' Has he any evidence to the contrary, and is there any reason why he should say, 'hear, hear,' ironically? We know very well that the smelting operations may be carried on, on the United States side, and thereby prevent the manufacturing of those ores into finished material in the province of British Columbia. It is a matter we ought to consider and look into carefully. It is true, as my hon. friend said, that the members from this province are all in favour of it. Is there an hon. gentleman in this House near whose county a railway is going to run who will not be in favour of that road being constructed? We know the effects of that, and we know it would have the same effect upon a member from British Columbia. I do not think there is any danger that they will not be able to find some means whereby they can obviate running into United States territory, unless they desire, for the purpose I have mentioned, to get in to the mines and carry the products of those mines from Canada into the United States to be smelted there. While I am not going to oppose this road, I hold the government responsible, and say that they must be satisfied that there is no possibility of constructing this road on the Canadian side before they permit the road to run thirty or forty miles into United States territory. We do not desire to build roads on the other side. We do not desire to carry away the traffic from our country into the United States. It will be said, 'But you know we have roads running from east to west and from west to east, extending into United States territory, and they are a benefit to the people living in Canada.' but it cannot be shown that this diversion is in the interest and for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada. I therefore feel that we ought to be very careful and move slowly in this matter, and see that we are right before we pass the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—As I understand, it is necessary for this line to be built to develop the trade of British Columbia. May I ask which 'Free Press' my hon. friend is alluding to ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Ottawa 'Free Press.'

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I have always understood that the members from British Columbia voted in the House of Commons and in this chamber as a unit in support of this Bill, and my hon. friend's observation proves that that is correct. The reason assigned by the member of the government from British Columbia, is that there is a mountain range running north and south, at right angles to the boundary line. We had the same difficulties in Nova Scotia in building the Southwestern Railway there, from Halifax to Chester, Liverpool and Yarmouth. We had high hills there—not mountains—running at right angles to the shore, and consequently it was very difficult to get a line of railway around them. If these mountains run in the way indicated I can understand that it would be difficult to get along in British Columbia. But the difficulty suggested by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas surely must have been met in railway building years ago. We all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway line in going down to the maritime provinces goes across a corner of the State of Maine, and surely whatever arrangements were made with regard to that road crossing the State of Maine, and then entering the province of New Brunswick and going on to St John, can be made in regard to this road. I should imagine there would be no difficulty in that regard. I agree that if it were practicable to build a line within the borders of British Columbia, that it should be built in that way in preference to entering the United States, but if it be a fact that it cannot be so built without increasing the expense of the road with no good results whatever to the province of British Columbia, I think that after all the contentions and haggling in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, that body have arrived at a fair solution of the question ; and I am prepared to vote for the Bill in its present state.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It has been said that because a portion of the road runs through United States territory, the Bill should not be passed. Now with four thousand miles of international boundary between Canada and the United States we cannot expect that there will not be some engineering required to effect the construction of a railway on Canadian territory. Take the Northern Railway which is looked upon as a purely Canadian road. From Winnipeg to Port Arthur it runs through the State of Minnesota, which is a part of the United States. Nobody ever suggests that there is any harm in that railway running through thirty-five miles of United States territory. I can quite understand the difficulty that is met in British Columbia. Where they have a sea of mountains, which they have to avoid in the same way that the Northern Railway has to avoid the Lake of the Woods, I cannot see any harm in the railroad running through a portion of the United States for the purpose of getting easy grades to make connections with that portion of British Columbia. Therefore I feel disposed to support the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (147) An Act to amend the Seamen's Act. He said :—

This Bill refers to the employment of seamen in the province of British Columbia. The object is to enable shipping masters in British Columbia, especially in Vancouver and Victoria, to procure crews for ships leaving port. It provides that the shipping master may employ not more than two deputies, and that they may charge a sum of money to be approved of by the department, but never to exceed ten dollars.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What provision is to be found in this Bill or in the Seamen's Act, chapter 74, to prevent either foreigners or others from acting in that capacity entirely irrespective of the authority of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I do not know of anything to prevent United States agents inducing sailors to go over to Seattle or Tacoma from the city of Vancouver or Victoria.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not refer to that. I think my hon. friend said one of the difficulties that confronted British Columbia was the fact of United States agents going into our ports and acting the part of shipping agents.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—They induce sailors to go to the United States where they are engaged on United States ships.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that it should be a penal offence for any one to come into our ports and interfere in that way with the spirit of the Act.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I do not know how we can prevent United States agents coming into the country and advising sailors that if they went to Seattle they could secure employment on United States ships at a remunerative salary, but it is a fact that Victoria and Vancouver have been very largely denuded of sailors, and vessels have been compelled to go from these ports to Seattle and Townsend to secure crews. This legislation has been submitted by the department at the earnest solicitation of the Boards of Trade of Victoria and Vancouver and of shipping men generally. It has been found that in those cities on the coasts crews cannot be easily obtained. Shipping masters do not go out of their office to secure sailors, and the result is that the crews cannot be found when they are wanted. I think the possibility of crimping as it used to prevail is obviated by the provisions of this Bill. No deputy can be employed who sells liquor in any way, nor any boarding house keeper who sells liquor, and it is also provided that the amount of money paid by the government to the deputy shipping master for obtaining sailors cannot be deducted from the earnings of the sailors.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I understand it, this Bill is for the purpose of facilitating the employment of crews by shipping masters and it makes provision that two deputy shipping masters with the approval of the Minister of Marine may be appointed at the instance of each master. They are, I apprehend, charged with a certain duty for which there is certain compensation, but there is nothing to prohibit anybody else from doing this particular work or acting in that particular office. What is the use, I ask my hon. friend, of clothing these deputy shipping masters with the authority prescribed in clause 2 of the Bill if every Tom, Dick and Harry, including United States agents and others can come into Victoria and perform the same services without any penalty being imposed.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—My hon. friend does not imagine that a foreigner from Seattle can come into Vancouver and secure sailors for a vessel sailing from Vancouver. The shipping of sailors must be done under the shipping master or his deputy. The grievance in Victoria and Vancouver in regard to sailors is that greater inducements are sometimes offered them to go over to Seattle and there engage on United States ships or others and so our ports are deprived of the sailors we ought to have. The difficulty of securing sailors is also emphasized by the fact that the remuneration paid to the shipping master is so little that no person takes the trouble to secure them ; but a United States shipping master cannot do business on Canadian territory. He must privately induce the men to go over the boundary. All sailors are enlisted on board the ship through the shipping master, and it is impossible for any person other than a shipping master or deputy to enlist any sailor for any ship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this Act provide for anything more than allowing the shipping master to charge $10 instead of 50 cents? That appears to me to be the chief provision of the Act. My own impression is that we are altogether too liberal in dealing with sailors and masters of vessels in our inland waters as far as regards United States sailors. I have often heard a complaint that while the United States seamen were permitted to accept employment and sail on Canadian vessels, no Canadian or British subject can take command of a United States vessel unless he first becomes a citizen or has a certificate from that country. They prevent altogether the employment of British subjects upon their vessels. I have had sailors and officers of vessels make great complaint that while they were deprived of the right of employment on United States vessels the Yankees could come over and sail our vessels and take command of them on the inland waters. I am very much inclined to the opinion that there should be a little reciprocity in that matter, but I do not know that this measure affects it. This Bill merely permits the shipping master to do certain work and charge ten dollars for it instead of fifty cents.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee on the Whole of the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the debate which took place in the other House on this subject. In reading the reports of the debates in the public press, I notice the Minister of Justice gave a very decided and positive opposition to this Bill, although it was introduced by his colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I would ask the hon. gentleman if the opinions of these two gentlemen are reconciled ? This is another case of legislation by departments and not by the government. It is a rather unseemly sight to see one minister opposing another, particularly when the Bill is a government measure, and I am somewhat interested to know whether they have come to an amicable understanding on this question or whether one of them has resigned.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The Bill has been changed since it was introduced in the House of Commons. One of the exemptions proposed in the original Bill has been eliminated. For instance, clause 1 in this Bill as it was originally drafted, provided that sections 7, 16 and 18 of the Seaman's Act, chap. 74 of the revised statutes, shall not apply to shipping masters or deputy shipping masters in British Columbia. Now, section 7 of the Seaman's Act provides that no person who sells spirituous liquors, or tavern keeper or boarding house keeper, shall be eligible for the position of shipping master or deputy shipping master.

"It was proposed in the original Bill to make that clause inapplicable, which would have the effect of permitting persons who sold spirituous liquors to become shipping masters or deputy shipping masters. In the House of Commons that was struck out. That, I think, is the only opinion the Minister of Justice expressed on the matter, and the provision as it now reads is that sections 16 and 18 of the Seamen's Act shall not apply. This Bill deals entirely with the charge which may be made for shipping sailors in the province of British Columbia. The present charge made by shipping masters is 50 cents per sailor. This makes it possible to pay any sum of money that may be agreed upon between the captain of a vessel and the party providing the sailors, up to but not exceeding the sum of $10, but whatever price is paid must be approved of by the Minister of the Department, and is subject to be changed at any time by him.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I wonder if we have in this Senate any person representing the interest of the seamen, for it seems to me that this Bill is putting a tax on seamen to which they were not subject before, raising that tax apparently from 50 cents to $10, which is a very serious matter to people who receive a very limited sum for their services. I cannot see why the fee should have been raised from 50 cents to $10.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—My hon. friend has not read the last clause of the Bill. It provides :

4. Notwithstanding the next preceding subsection, the sum which the owner or master of a ship engaging or discharging a seaman in a shipping office in British Columbia may deduct from the seamen's wages under section 17 of "The Seamen's Act," shall not exceed what it would be if section 16 thereof were in force in that province.

Section 16 of the Seamen's Act provides that the sum of 50 cents shall be paid upon each engagement of a seaman, and the sum of 30 cents upon each discharge of a seaman shipped in any of the provinces specified, so that the amount that is chargeable to a sailor in British Columbia is not any more than before.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It is difficult to understand that, as I read the Bill, because the first clause says that section 16 shall not apply to shipping masters or deputy shipping masters in the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I do not see why an exception should be made of the province of British Columbia. For over 30 years, I have represented the county of Lunenburg, which is largely interested in shipping. We have about 2,500 men at this moment engaged in our deep sea fishing fleet alone, all of whom have to be shipped, and they are shipped under the general Act. Of course the shipping master is paid by the master, but in settling up for the voyage, it is taken out of the seaman. There may be some reason why British Columbia should be treated differently from other provinces. Altogether we have about 8,000 voters in the county of Lunenburg, fully one-half of whom are fishermen, and I know this Bill as introduced by the minister would not suit our country at all. However, I do not oppose the Bill, if the representatives of British Columbia in both Houses are satisfied. The circumstances may be peculiar and require special legislation. If it were a general measure, I would feel it my duty to oppose it, in the interest of the fine old county of Lunenburg.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I had it in my mind, when the last speaker rose, to make some remarks in the same line as he has made. This Bill may be acceptable to the people of British Columbia, but I feel very confident that it would not be accepted in the eastern provinces of the Dominion. I have not had very much to do with the shipping of sailors of late years, but I had some experience years ago, and I know very well what was the practice then. The sailors when they arrived in port were generally led to leave the vessels. If they were discharged from the vessels, they fell into the hands of the boarding-house keepers, and if their voyages were not up they were in a great many cases induced to leave the vessels and place themselves in the hands of the boarding-house master. When the vessel was ready for sea, the captain, in order to engage his crew, was obliged to go to these boarding-house keepers, and enlist their services in order to make certain of getting his sailors on board his vessel, and it was a common practice of the boarding-house masters to make a charge for providing sailors on delivering them on board the vessels. That charge varied. I did not know that it ever exceeded $10, but I have often known $10 to be paid for delivering these men on board. So far as the duties of the shipping master are concerned, they are simply to attest to the signing of the articles. The boarding-house keeper and the captain bring these men before the shipping master and he is merely a witness to the signing of the articles, which is the agreement under which the sailors serve on board the ships. Now it would appear to me that under the Bill as it stands, the shipping master would be in a position to charge, and no doubt would charge if he was legally entitled to do so, $10, for merely going through this form of witnessing the signatures of the seamen to the articles; but I do not see how the captain of a vessel or any person else can impose upon him any duty of supplying or finding the sailors. The captain must still go outside and find the sailors and bring them to the shipping master to be shipped if the practice in British Columbia is the same as the eastern provinces. Another case that might arise—and I know of many cases of that kind with us—the captain of a vessel often has perhaps members of his family or men living in his own particular community, forming a very large part of his crew. These men require no one to procure them, they come voluntarily and sign the articles before the shipping master and he receives 50 cents each for merely witnessing the agreement under which they engage to act as seamen on board the vessels. I confess that from the explanation given, I do not see how this change of the law is to be of any advantage to any one in British Columbia, unless it is the shipping masters, in enabling them to charge $2 for every seaman shipped.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I could not catch the remark made by the hon. gentleman in his explanation as to the diversity of opinion between the two ministers. Did it arise out of the provision in the original Bill which prevented the appointment of tavern-keepers as shipping masters, or is that in the original Bill?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The original Bill as submitted in the House of Commons read that certain sections of the Shipping Act should not apply in British Columbia. Consequently it was proposed under the first Bill to make such persons eligible. That is the point. They are not eligible in the Bill as it stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not repealed ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—No, and it will apply to British Columbia the same as to the rest of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (156), An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Representation Act. He said : In the Northwest there are no regular voters' lists. The lists are made up after the issue of the writ. Enumerators are appointed either by the Governor in Council or by the returning officers and the enumerator goes around and makes up his list in a very primitive way, and files three copies of it in the polling division. There has in the past been considerable liberty allowed as to the place where a man might vote. I think men have sometimes voted outside of the district in which they live. The first clause of the Bill provides that except that as hereinafter provided—which applies to scrutineers or deputy returning-officers who are allowed to go outside of their own divisions to vote—an elector may only vote at the polling station of the division in which he is a resident at the time of voting. The next clause makes provision for the posting of the lists. It must be done in a post office or some public place. Heretofore the lists were practically not posted, but they were put up at any three places which the enumerator thought proper. Of course after the province has been organized the legislature will no doubt enact laws with regard to the franchise. As we have adopted the provincial franchise, this Bill is simply for the short period which must elapse until the territory organizes and prepares voters lists.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages under a suspension of the rules.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (186) An Act to provide for the regulation of Wireless Telegraphy in Canada. He said : This Bill is introduced upon the suggestion of the home authorities, and is, I believe, almost an exact copy of a Bill passed by the imperial parliament last session. It provides for regulating wireless telegraphy, making it illegal for any wireless telegraphic station to be installed without first obtaining a license. It provides also for the form and conditions of the license, and the penalty for working without a license. The Bill is a very simple one. It is necessitated by the new discovery of wireless telegraphy, and it is to meet the conditions arising therefrom.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

On the third clause.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—This clause provides that—

> 3. No person shall establish any wireless telegraph station, or instal or work any apparatus for wireless telegraphy in any place or on board any ship registered in Canada.

One can understand why the license should be obtained from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with reference to a ship, but what right has he to control 'any place,' or what right has the government of Canada to control any place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any place in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The Dominion government have established a number of wireless telegraphic stations in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and along the Labrador coast, the most recent one being on Sable Island, and it is essential that the government should have the right to license stations in any place in Canada. The establishment of these wireless telegraphic stations all over the Dominion is a very important thing.

I can conceive in matters of great national importance, for instance in the case of disturbances arising in the country, it would be absolutely necessary that the government should have the regulating and controlling of this system of telegraphy. I think my hon. friend will see that there is certainly just as much reason for government control on the land as on the sea, and probably a great deal more.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How about a system of wireless telegraphy entirely within the boundaries of a province ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The same would apply.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The federal government would be infringing on the rights of the province in exacting a license for a system of wireless telegraphy entirely within the boundary of any particular province. It is only by reason of the provision in the British North America Act relating to cases where lines of telegraphy connect two provinces that they have any jurisdiction in the matter.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I will supplement what the hon. gentleman has said by pointing out that the hon. minister referred to it as a copy of the English Act, but of course the English system is different. Of course under the ordinary systems of telegraphy the provinces have certain rights. The Dominion government is apparently taking that right for the whole country, and while it may be that on Sable Island or any government property it is perfectly right to do so, there might be a question whether they could do so on territory not within their control.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It cannot be limited to a province. If a system is constructed in any province it may communicate with a foreign country, and secrets may be conveyed in that way. There are times when the government takes charge of all means of communication—in cases of tariff revision. They take charge of the telegraph system, so that information shall not be conveyed. How much more important is it in regard to wireless telegraphy outside of the province ? The messages go through the air. The British government felt that it was of the first importance that they should control wireless telegraphy. We on this side of the Atlantic do not entertain the fears entertained in Europe, but they call our attention to it from an imperial point of view, and they hope that wireless telegraphy shall not be permitted in a general way without the government having some control over it. Before that policy was adopted, Marconi had secured some privileges both on the English coast and foreign coasts, as well as on the coast of Canada, and it was intimated that so far as Marconi was concerned, the arrangement would have to stand and the government would have to take their chances as to any control they may have over him. He got certain concessions in Great Britain and Canada and was in some degree bound to observe any regulations that might be made in Canada, but other corporations are now springing up and asking certain rights. I had an application the other day from a company of United States people who desired to establish wireless telegraphy. I told them that there were two difficulties in their way. In the first place they could not obtain a charter under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, and in the next place they would require to have the permission of parliament before they could begin operations.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it is not a question of the national importance of wireless telegraphy. We quite recognize its importance in the telegraphic world to-day, but let us instance the case of two of those stations being established for commercial purposes within the boundaries of the province of Quebec, does my hon. friend assume to say that the federal government can arrogate to itself the right of forbidding the establishment of those stations unless a license is taken out from the Minister of Marine for their establishment ? It is only in pursuance of the tenth subsection of section 92 of the British North America Act that the federal government exercises its jurisdiction with regard to telegraphic lines generally. The exception with reference to the province exercising jurisdiction is in regard to lines of steamers, telegraphs or other works or undertakings connecting the province with any other province, extending beyond the limits of any one province. The Bill would certainly be within the purview of the Federal parliament if the system connected two provinces, or if it went beyond the boundaries of any one province, but it seems to me some exception should be made in the Bill, in order that due regard may be had to the rights of the provinces to regulate the establishment of stations within their own boundaries.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the former Act was drafted, telegraphy did not mean telegraphing through the atmosphere ; that was never dreamed of. Supposing you have two stations in the province, you may have also a station in a foreign country that you know nothing of. There is no limit to the possibilities of wireless telegraphy. It has been shown that they can transmit messages three or four or five hundred miles. I read the other day that one of the regular liners running out of New York—the Lucania, I think —was in communication during the first half of the journey with Great Britain and during the last half with the United States. They published a daily paper on board, so that the possibilities of wireless telegraphy are beyond conception. While there may be two stations in Canada, and you may assume they are limited to that, there may also be stations in half a dozen places outside of Canada. The provision regarding telegraph systems which my learned friend read does not apply, because while this is called telegraphing, it is really atmospheric communication.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In other words it would be utterly impossible for a province to legislate with reference to the establishment of wireless telegraphic stations within the boundaries of that province.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I may call my hon. friend's attention to this fact ; very recently before I left Victoria a wireless tower was put up in order to communicate with Tacoma and Seattle and other United States cities. That was done without any authority from the government. They had no particular status in the country. Now, to all intents and purposes that is equivalent to a cable crossing the straits of San Juan de Fuca, for which they would require permission from the government. I do not know how wireless telegraphic stations could be established without the possibility of communicating with the neighbouring states all along the boundary. I am not prepared to argue that the provinces would not have the right to establish these stations, but I very much doubt it. It seems to me this Bill is along the right lines, and the government are well justified in taking the present method of regulating this new discovery.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Supposing the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company desires to have a line between Tadoussac and Rivière du Loup across the river or from the head of the Saguenay to the south shore, just for the purpose of their own navigation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not suppose there would be any opposition. A good deal would depend on the character of the party.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would the government exact a license from them ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under this measure they would.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In cases where the government had confidence that the people were not going to abuse the privilege there would not be any trouble.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The case put by my hon. friend to my right has not been answered. If the Richelieu Company desired to establish wireless telegraphy from the head of the Saguenay to Montreal would they have a right to do it without a license ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that not be infringing on the rights of the provinces unless the hon. gentleman takes the ground that the provinces have no control over the electric waves?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudiere)—It seems to me it must be under the control of one authority. You must have some infringement of provincial rights. When you grant a railway charter you decide that the government has the right to provide where a railway station shall be located in any province, and the company are allowed to expropriate lands in the province only where parliament says they may expropriate. In that case you are interfering with provincial rights, and it appears to me that this is about the same thing. In granting a license, the government say where the stations shall be located. You must not have two wireless telegraphic stations close to one another. We have incorporated the Fessenden Wireless Telegraph Company, and the Marconi Company was incorporated two years ago. With regard to Sable Island, the Marconi Company erected a station there and they object to the Fessenden Company building a station on the same island, claiming that it would interfere with their messages. Even if it be some infringement on provincial rights, is it not better that we should put these matters under some regulation of this kind?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The question is as to adhering to the constitution and it seems to me the point deserves serious consideration, although the law may not have any effect at all. It seems to me that it should be worded in this way: 'For the transmission of messages beyond any province.' Otherwise I am afraid that the Act will be absolutely ultra vires, and will have no effect whatever. I appreciate the object, and it is a very good one, but we must try to frame the law within the constitution, so that the object will be attained.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—As the imperial government has passed a Bill similar to this, and has recommended to the government of the Dominion the passage of a Bill of the same tenor in Canada, I think it deserves perhaps a little more consideration than some hon. gentlemen appear to be willing to give it, and after all it is only a matter of obtaining a license at a cost of some ten dollars from the Dominion government, and when you come to think of this matter, I believe that the federal government should be the controlling power where there is the possibility of a little difference as the question of the authority of one or the other. There must be some supreme head that is to control in matters affecting the whole Dominion, and this I think is one where the provincial rights should give way to the higher authority of the federal government.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why is the minister the only one able to prosecute?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Because that is proper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may be in the case put by the hon. gentleman opposite, where the Richelieu line were erecting two stations, it would be unfair to prosecute them providing they were not giving communication outside of the province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not think the Richelieu Company could be sued if they paid the minister for the license. I do not see how the remark of the minister answers my question.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to know if the minister is entitled by the Act to name the places where the stations will be located, and has he the right to expropriate? It appears to be the minister alone that settles the whole question.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—He does not need to expropriate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would those regulations go so far as to order an expropriation for the purpose of constructing a station?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there is no reference to expropriation under this Act at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, but there are restrictions and conditions and terms.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say to my hon. friend in connection with clause 5 that there should be taken into consideration the exercise of extra-territorial jurisdiction with reference to the establishment of those stations on ships beyond the limit within which this government may exercise jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The third clause says that the Bill deals only with ships registered in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is not this clause infringing on provincial rights?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I should not think so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A man wants to conduct experiments in one particular place, and the federal government exacts a license from him.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—As the government has undertaken to license wireless telegraphy, in the event of a scientific investigator wishing to carry on experiments he would be infringing the law unless there were special provisions in his case. No doubt the license would be a mere formal matter. and very little or no fee would be charged.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment. The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

REVISED STATUTES AMENDMENT ACT.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (193) An Act to amend the Revised Statutes respecting the salaries of certain public functionaries and other annual charges on the Consolidated Revenue.

He said : This Bill is simply to provide for the salaries of the Lieutenant Governors of the new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, fixing their salaries at $9,000 per annum, which is the same as the salaries of Lieutenant Governors in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and Manitoba. I think, in Quebec and Ontario they are paid $10,000, in Prince Edward Island $7,000. All the others are paid $9,000.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second and third time under a suspension of the rules.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (162) An Act to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894.

He said : The Land Titles Act has been administered, I understand, from Ottawa up to the present time, and will continue to be until after the formation of the government in the provinces, and until the legislature has made some provision for carrying on the work. It will then be, no doubt, dealt with by the province.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is one consideration arising out of the proposed transfer of the registration of Land Titles to the provincial government that I should like to ask my hon. friend about ; possibly inquiry will have to be made into the subject. The assurance fund which has been established by this government from the funds which are paid in from time to time by those obtaininig titles must by this time have reached a pretty large sum. I should like to ascertain if the government has considered the handing over of that fund or the dividing of it between the two provinces as the basis of an assurance fund for the guarantee of titles ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, of course that fund will be handed over. It will be temporarily administered until the provinces make proper provision for assuming control.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has that fund been kept separate from the Consolidated Fund ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned till 3 o'clock tomorrow.

PACIFIC BANK OF CANADA BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (No. 175) An Act respecting the Pacific Bank of Canada.

He said : I was practically authorized by the committee, in reporting the Bill, to say that they had consented to report it under the impression that they could not well abstain from doing so inasmuch as the same action has been taken in similar cases during the session, but that they considered the practice of this House, and of both Houses in fact, in regard to the extension of time for the introduction of Bank Bills is too lax, and they thought in future it would be well to lay down some hard and fast rule, such as, for example, that the time for presenting Bank Bills should not be extended unless the promoters were prepared to proceed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

The report was adopted.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was then read a third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 173) An Act respecting the St. Maurice Valley Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (No. 139) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—(Hon. Mr. Templeman.)

TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS, from the committee appointed by both Houses to consider the subject of tuberculosis, presented their first report, and moved that it be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has the committee gone into the matter of finances at all ?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the chief thing. People are dying now while you are waiting for action to be taken. The committee should have pointed out the way and asked the government to contribute. In my province they are raising money for this purpose. It will take two or three years before that can be matured, and the committee should have at once attacked the financial aspect of the question and called on the federal government, provincial government, municipalities, banks, churches and every one, to contribute money to build hospitals for the treatment of those who are affected.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—In answer to the hon. gentleman, I said we had not dealt with the financial question, but I may point out that this report is simply a prayer to the Dominion government to aid in providing means, and we suggest also that an appeal be made to all the institutions the hon. gentleman has named to co-operate.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Hon. gentlemen will notice that in terminating the report a suggestion is made that a delegation wait on the Dominion government and present this report and make a request that the Dominion government will aid us. I now beg to move :

That a delegation of the Senate be appointed to wait upon the government, together with a like delegation from the House of Commons, to present a copy of the report which has been adopted this day in connection with tuberculosis,' and

That the said delegation be composed of :

The Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., the Honourable Sir William Hingston, Kt., the Honourable Messieurs Béique, de Boucherville, Casgrain (Windsor), Edwards, Ellis, Fiset, Godbout, Kerr (Toronto), McMillan, Robertson, Sullivan, Wilson and Young.

I am sorry that at the moment I have not been able to arrange the date when the delegation should meet the government, but it will be done at an early date, and all the members of the delegation will be advised.

The motion was agreed to.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing :

1. Under section 6, chapter 101, Edward VII, the details of policies filed with the Superintendent of Insurance in certified schedule.
2. The last return made by the Mutual Reserve Life Association, of New York, made up to 31st December, 1904.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman asked me a question about the returns from the department of insurance. On inquiry at the department they informed me that they were completing them as quickly as possible, and would get them ready without delay.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Next year, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, by August. They are not ready for the printer.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Parliament should be delayed until they are brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have not gone to the printer yet.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—We passed a resolution last year that this company should make a return to the department of those who accepted terms, what the terms were, and what they were to receive. That is the information I want. I have been a long while in public life and was never aware until the other day that anything ordered by the House need not be furnished. I was not aware that a return called for could be placed in the pocket of the insurance inspector, whoever he may be, and that he might decide whether it was proper for parliament to see the information called for or not. This House ordered a report to be made and that report should be in our possession. What reason can they have for keeping it back. In the early part of the session I was answered that it was private. What is private? We have the case of the Equitable Life Insurance Company before us to-day, and everything in that company has been turned upside down. If such information had been private the Equitable Insurance Company of New York would not have been investigated. We have come down to a terrible state of affairs. I must keep within parliamentary bounds; I shall be called down if I do not; but if I were to characterize the whole thing as it should be characterized, I am afraid His Honour the Speaker would call me down at once.

There is no use being mealy-mouthed about it; the policy-holders in Canada are not satisfied, because they cannot get information which they should be furnished with; and the answer we have to-day is that these unfortunate people and all others who are endeavouring to help them cannot get the information which, in my humble opinion, we have a right to. I think I was told that the return would take six months to prepare. If the company got the statement up in ten weeks, surely the young men in the department could prepare it in six months, and I have delayed to see if it could be brought down. I propose to make no motion. but I shall place the responsibility where it belongs. If the papers are not brought down voluntarily the government must take the responsibility, and when the time comes that they wreck the company, which is not far off, then let those who differed from me take the responsibility of the whole matter. Between now and next session I hope to obtain the Insurance Report, and I shall next session introduce a Bill in this House to wind up the Mutual Reserve Company in Canada. I beg to withdraw my motion.

The motion was allowed to drop.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (52) An Act to amend the Franchise Act, 1898.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said: This is simply providing what I thought was already law—that the voters' lists receive the imprint of the King's Printer to show that they are official and come from the government printing office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How is it to be known that they are official? Are they to have the King's Printer's name on them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; I presume it is for the purpose of verification when it is used in court.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing it was a forgery—because I presume that is the reason that a Bill has been introduced providing that the lists shall bear the King's Printer's imprint in order to show their authenticity—if there is a forgery, I do not see any penalty provided.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That does not require a penalty to be prescribed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know there is a penalty for forgery, but would it apply to this case?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes; clearly.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (170) An Act to amend the Militia Act.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 69) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta.

He said: The Bill which I have the pleasure of presenting for your consideration—and I hope also for your approval—is one of the many evidences that we have recently had of the growing time in this Dominion.

Heretofore Canada has consisted of but seven provinces. When these two Bills, this and the sister Bill making a province of the area now know as Saskatchewan, become law, there will be nine provinces. The two provinces to be added to the Dominion give promise of being in the not distant future the two most important provinces embraced in the whole Dominion. Each province enters confederation with a population very much larger than the population of Manitoba at the time it entered the union, much larger than Prince Edward Island, and larger than the population of British Columbia in 1871 at the time that province entered the union. One of the remarkable facts which attracted my attention in considering this subject is the marvellous growth and development of the two provinces. In the thirty years since British Columbia and Prince Edward Island entered confederation the growth of the Territories as compared with the growth of the two provinces in that period has been marvellously great. While British Columbia has increased its population five times since confederation, the increase in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia would be less in the thirty years than the reputed increase of the Northwest Territories in one year, if we may rely on the authorities that give us the number of persons coming into that country. That is a striking instance which gives one a fair appreciation of the marvellous growth and development which is taking place—that in one year each of those provinces will have grown more in population than Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island have done in the thirty years since confederation. It conveys also an idea of the richness of that country, of the undeveloped wealth which must be there to attract the rapidly increasing population which has been going in. I venture to say that in no part of the world will the labour of husbandmen be rewarded in a greater degree than it has been in the Northwest, according to the evidence furnished us, nor is there any part of the world in which the same number of farmers will be producing as large a crop and as valuable a crop. I think that observation cannot be controverted, and that fact assures us of the marvellous growth that will mark the future history of the two provinces. When the question of granting full provincial powers came up, the first point for consideration was, should we make one province of the Northwest. The feeling among the members of the Northwest was favourable to a single province, but it appeared to the government, and I think to all reasonable men who reflect upon it, that it would be a very great mistake to create one province with an area of five hundred thousand square miles. In time to come it would overshadow all the rest of the Dominion. For that reason it was thought wise to have two provinces forming what now will be known as Saskatchewan and Alberta. Even with that subdivision the two provinces will be of enormous extent, and they will contain a greater portion of arable land, land fit for cultivation, than in any other section of the world. With those facts kept in view we can appreciate what those provinces will be in the next quarter of a century. In the next place let me say British Columbia entered confederation with 30,000 persons. Its population in 1901 was 187,000; it had increased 142,000 in thirty years. Manitoba entered confederation with 25,000 population; it has grown to 255,000. Since confederation the population of Manitoba has multiplied by ten. I need not quote the maritime provinces, because the growth there has been comparatively small. The Territories and Manitoba have increased about ten times from the period from the date I have given, in 1871.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Give us the population of the Northwest Territories now. The hon. gentleman says they have increased ten times.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have been estimated at 500,000; they probably rank something over that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is only for the purpose of subsidies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Later on I may be able to lay my hand on a table which will give the estimated number. Between the two it is somewhere, I think, a little over four hundred thousand. In 1901, when the census was taken, the population was put down at 158,940. I estimated the average increase year by year. In 1902 the increase was not rapid. In 1903 it did increase very much, about 50,000. In 1904 it still further increased, and it is estimated this year that upwards of 100,000 will come in, so that it will probably bring the population before the end of this season up to the neighbourhood of 400,000. Now in regard to area, I find that in the United States, Pennsylvania has an area of 45,000 square miles with a population of 6,000,000. Compare that with Alberta, which has 254,000 square miles, 5½ times larger than Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania today supports six million people and could support more, because it is quite true that a very considerable number are engaged in manufacturing, but if that state can support 6,000,000 people one cannot go far wrong in saying that Alberta in time will be able to support certainly 25,000,000 people. For many years to come no doubt the largest industry will be agriculture. That is the industry the success of which we all rejoice in, because it distributes wealth more evenly than any other industry you can name. There are of course other industries in which perhaps more money is made than on the farm, but if wealth flows in it is distributed among a limited number of people, and the remuneration to the labourer is fixed in many instances at a low rate. There is no industry that is so beneficial generally to the country as agriculture, and it is a very proud thought to the members of this House that in the Northwest, with the rich area of land, with the fine climate that they have, with the facilities for the construction of railways, the growth of the agricultural industry will be in the next 25 years probably phenomenal. I see it stated now in the papers that although we have two railways which pass through the wheat belt, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific Railway, with their many branches, it will tax their capacity to bring out the crop of the present year, if the anticipations which we all hope will be fulfilled are realized. That gives one an idea of what that country is capable of producing. The product of the soil will absorb all the transportation facilities which now exist, although the country is being pretty well permeated with railways. Comparing states in the neighbouring union and their population with the provinces we are now establishing, I find that Ohio has 41,000 square miles, against 250,000 square miles in Saskatchewan. Ohio has a population of 4,157,000.

The areas of the other western states vary from 40,000 square miles to 83,000 square miles. All of them are very much smaller in area than either Alberta or Saskatchewan and I am justified in saying have less capacity for supporting an industrial population, so that we may look forward to the time when the west will really be the populous part of the Dominion. Probably that was another reason why it was wise and prudent to subdivide the area into two provinces. It might perhaps have been better to have had a third province, but under the present conditions it was thought advisable to create two, and they probably will answer. The Territories come in not alone with a larger population than many provinces of the Dominion, but they also come in with pretty wide powers. It was my privilege some 30 years ago in this chamber to introduce a Bill giving powers to the Northwest Territories. That Bill gave them really very considerable powers, so far as the management of their internal affairs was concerned. They had a local assembly—Lieutenant Governor Laird was the first governor appointed—and they were given control over many domestic matters. Since 1875 powers have been added from time to time until at present one may also safely say that they have all provincial powers except the right to go into debt, the right to tax themselves. They have the right to incorporate companies, the right to establish various industries, and to grant licenses and very many more powers, so that practically the transition will not entail any violent change. It is proposed in the Bill now before the House to grant each province four senators. We already have four from the two, which will be an increase of four more, and further increase will be made by the parliament of Canada as the population justifies, up to six. The idea—I may foreshadow it now—will probably prevail in the future to follow the lines that have been adopted in regard to the older provinces. We have grouped together the maritime provinces, represented by 24 senators; Quebec, represented by 24 senators; Ontario represented by 24 senators, and it would not be unreasonable, particularly in view of the anticipated increase of population, to give 24 senators to the country west of the Ontario boundary. That would embrace Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and any other provinces that might be formed later, because the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan only extend to a certain latitude. I have here a map which I will place on the table showing the two blocks representing the new provinces, and hon. gentlemen can form some idea of the area of these provinces as compared with the rest of the Dominion. I have given now the constitution of the senate as proposed. The representation in the House of Commons will be adjusted after the next quinquennial census and after the dissolution of the present parliament. At present there are from the Territories ten representatives in the House of Commons. Assuming that the population is 500,000, they would be entitled to ten each, on the basis which has been established since confederation, which, as you know, is equivalent to a population for each electoral district of some 25,300. That is arrived at on a scale which was adopted at the time of confederation. As hon. gentlemen know, representation is based on the population of the province of Quebec—that is the standard by which all the other provinces are governed, in the number of representatives to which they are entitled. At the present figures, if one of these new provinces should have a population of 250,000 it would have about ten members in the House of Commons, so that after the next quinquennial census if the two new provinces are found to contain 500,000 they would be entitled to 20 members in the House of Commons.

The feeling for some time past, for the last two years at all events, has been outspoken that they should have this provincial autonomy. The government did not feel that they were suffering at all from the absence of it. With the preceding government and with the present government, the feeling was in no way to restrict them in any fair expenditure so long as the finances were judiciously and economically administered. There was no desire in any way to check them; on the contrary there was a desire to give them liberally what really was necessary for their growth and development, and here it must be remembered that in estimating the amount which ought to be allowed for the administration of each province, one has to take into consideration the large area involved. It is very much cheaper to govern a small country than a larger one, and more particularly a country situated as the Northwest is. In many sections of new countries, the population converges in centres and distributes itself slowly and gradually, that has been the history of Ontario and Quebec; but that policy does not seem to have been adopted by the people who go into the Territories. Owing to the fact that the good lands extend over a large area, that travel over a level country is easy, and that they have no forests to cut down, the population has distributed itself in an extraordinary degree. One would have thought it would have gradually grown as it has grown in Ontario and Quebec. Many of us can remember when the population of even Ontario was limited largely to the frontier; and the back country was remote, uncultivated and uninhabited, for very many years. It was so also in the province of Quebec. Population followed the river St. Lawrence first, then followed the St. Maurice and other streams flowing into the St. Lawrence. That was a highway by which they could travel readily. In the Northwest there has been a marked difference in the method of taking up lands. Settlers have had no hesitation in going twenty, fifty or one hundred, two hundred, even three hundred miles away from neighbours. I presume that may be largely due to the fact that in the earlier years the Hudson Bay Company had posts distributed over the country at distances of three, four and five hundred miles apart. Then came the class of men known as half-breeds, who were utilized by the Hudson Bay people who formed colonies. Take for instance the settlement at St. Albert, which is many hundred miles from Winnipeg. That was a settlement made probably 150 years ago, so that the conditions in the Northwest are entirely different from the conditions in the eastern provinces and the population seems to have scattered over a very large area. The effect of that necessarily has been to make the administration of affairs very much more expensive. Bridges had to be built. The rivers there you all know sometimes cut great gorges in the country and make the bridging very expensive. Freshets sweep down through the plains through a cut or stream and deepen and widen it, making the work of bridging extremely difficult. So the subsidy per head ought to be calculated on some other basis than that which exists in the older provinces, the expenses being very much greater in consequence of the wide distribution of the people. That distribution, while it has its disadvantages in that respect, has counter advantages, because it creates a flow of immigration, by leaving the impression that there is space and room for very many millions of people. You may travel ten, fifteen, twenty or fifty miles over a country that is capable of supporting a population without finding inhabitants. That creates, of course a stimulus in taking up lands. Although none of us favour the lands falling into the hands of speculators, still the fact of large syndicates being formed to buy up tracts of land from the railway companies and loan companies has had the result of bringing in population by channels of immigration that in the earlier years were never dreamed of. It was due entirely to the facilities for getting land that a large population has been induced to come in from the United States. As we all know, very many farmers in the older states sold their holdings at liberal prices and bought lands in the Northwest Territories. That transition is going on constantly, and from recent reports is steadily increasing. It must increase, in fact, so long as lands can be obtained in the country north of the boundary line for a less sum than south of the boundary line. The division between the United States and Canada in the western country is an invisible boundary to which the people pay very little attention. They move over from the United States to Canada, and as our laws are much more fair and just, and the administration of affairs is more economically carried on, there is this satisfaction about it, that the United States citizens who come in make excellent Canadian settlers.

The allowances made in the past have been on a pretty liberal basis, and in fixing the amount which this Bill settles as to payment to each province, it will probably help hon. gentlemen to form a fair estimate as to whether the amounts are reasonable or otherwise if I give the financial statement for the last year as far as the Territories are concerned. They were allowed in the last fiscal year for civil government, $101,540 ; administration of justice, $21,000 ; public works, $680,000; education, $345,000; agriculture and statistics, $47,000; hospitals, charities and public health, $40,000 ; miscellaneous, $68,000; total, $1,313,000.

To those sums must be added moneys that were spent directly by the government of Canada, because, as hon. gentlemen will have noticed when the estimates were going through, there have always been generous contributions to public works in the Northwest. We spent on public works about $100,000 ; justice, $100,000; miscellaneous, $124,000; lieutenant governor's office, $3,630; incidental justice, $32,000; insane patients, $70,000; schools in unorganized districts, $65,000; making a total expenditure of $1,636,000. I will give you the financial statement under the Bill and probably it may help to consider it properly by quoting at the same time the allowances to the other provinces. I have a statement here from the Auditor General's Report of 1902-3 which gives the financial allowances made to the various provinces. For support of the government and the legislature, $50,000. In Manitoba the amount is exactly the same. In British Columbia it is $35,000, in Prince Edward Island, $30,000; in New Brunswick, $50,000; in Nova Scotia, $60,000; in Quebec, $70,000; in Ontario, $80,000. I gave in the first place the amount expended by the federal government over the whole area of the two provinces. I am now about to give an estimate of what will be paid under the Bill which we are discussing.

For support of the government and legislature, $50,000 ; eighty cents per head on an estimated population of 250,000, $200,000. Of course hon. gentlemen know 80 cents is the per capita allowance made under the British North America Act to all the provinces. That is to be increased until they reach a population of 800,000, the increase to be ascertained by a quinquennial census. In view of the assumed rapid growth in population of the provinces, it was thought fair that instead of waiting for the decennial census they should be entitled to any increase that would be possible under that rule every fifth year. The limitation is up to 800,000.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—In each province?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In each of these provincs, but it is not the same in all the provinces. The 80 cents is the same, but the limit of population is not the same. The next item would be the amount allowed inasmuch as those provinces have no debt. When the provinces came into confederation as hon. gentlemen know, the debt of each province was assumed, and where the debt of the province was less per capita than the debt of the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, the province admitted to confederation was allowed a certain sum to bring up the equality; that is, they were assuming a part of the debt at confederation which was a larger amount per capita than the debt existing in the individual provinces. As these new provinces have no debt now, they come in on a basis of 5 per cent on $8,107,500. That is based on a per capita debt to-day of $32.43 per head.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to direct the hon. gentleman's attention to section 20, where provision is made until the population goes up to 1,200,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is in reference to another clause than the one I am discussing now. That is compensation for the absence of public lands. We decline to give them the lands. I am discussing the per capita allowance in connection with the debt, not the compensation for lands. As we take the lands which they claim they have a right to, assuming the present population at 250,000, until it reaches 400,000 we allow them $375,000 a year in lieu of the land. Now that 400,000 may increase to 800,000, when the allowance will be increased to $562,500, and when the population reaches 1,200,000 there will be an increase to $750,000, so that the allowance will then be $1,125,000.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And 80 cents per head besides?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. That is entirely in lieu of lands; it has no reference to the other. The 80 cents per head is on a different basis.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The consideration for lands is in perpetuity?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. Now the amount added to the sums for support of government and for legislation, per capita allowance on debt account and the compensation in lieu of lands for some years to come, would make in all $1,030,375, which would be the total amount allowed to each province. There is an additional clause in the Bill which for five years gives them a specific annual grant of $39,750 for public buildings. It will terminate in five years, so that during that period they will receive $1,124,000 per annum. The Bill of course provides not only for the organization of the government but for its administration. The number of members to be elected, until the province otherwise orders, will be 25. No doubt a debatable question which may arise is with reference to the distribution of electoral districts. That has been made with a good deal of consideration in the other House, and I believe it to be fairly reasonable. Of course it is subject to change by the provincial legislatures. On and after the first session they have a right to alter the boundaries and they will have absolute control of their own internal arrangements. They can increase or diminish the number of representatives. It was thought that twenty-five would be a reasonable number at the present time and that number has been decided on in the Bill.

There is another clause which has created a good deal of discussion, No. 17, the educational clause. I do not propose going into that fully at the present time. It may be necessary for me to make further explanations on that subject at a later stage. All I can say now is that clause 17 is really a compromise. It does not confer the full powers that were given to the minority.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What was the compromise?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The compromise is the existing clause 17. I say it is not what parliament gave to the minority in 1875. I had the privilege of introducing the Bill of 1875 in this chamber. It went through the House of Commons, after being fully discussed, without a single dissenting voice. On that day, the 2nd of April, 1875, there were 145 members present in the House of Commons, among them my hon. friend to my right (Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and the leader of the opposition (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), and Hon. Mr. Macdonald, of Cape Breton. On that occasion there was no division; it went by unanimous consent. It contained the clause which has been debated so recently in the House of Commons, in the press, and, I will not say in the pulpits, but certainly on the platforms. As I say, it was unanimously adopted by the House of Commons. When it came to the Senate it was discussed here. Two gentlemen, now, I am sorry to say no more, in this chamber opposed the Bill and moved an amendment to strike out clause 11 of that Bill.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Was that the first educational Bill for the Territories ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was the first educational Bill in the Northwest Territories. We had a full discussion and the ground taken in this chamber was that as this had been a very controversial question in the past, it was much better to settle it then for all time to come. It was argued that people going into that country would know the conditions that existed there in regard to schools and would thereafter have no reason to complain. Sir Alexander Campbell, who was the leader of the opposition at that time, expressed very strong views in support of the government proposition, giving as his reason that it was very much better to settle it then and there than have it the subject of controversy in the future. He remembered, as others of us remembered, the discussions that had taken place, the dissensions that had arisen, the unfortunate scenes that had occurred in Canada in connection with those discussions; and with all that in view, he and others expressed the opinion that it would be far better then and there to settle it so that it could not be disturbed thereafter. When the parliament of Canada settled it at that time the parliament of Canada had been authorized by an imperial Act to do so. Hon. gentlemen know that what is called the first confederation Act was an imperial Act. When British Columbia came into the confederation that had to be an imperial Act. When Prince Edward Island came into confederation that had to be done by an imperial statute. When Manitoba came in, they had to go to the imperial parliament. The imperial parliament then came to a conclusion and said: 'There are new provinces to be added from time to time; can we not once for all vest in the parliament of Canada full power to create new provinces and give them such powers as the parliament of Canada think wise and prudent. So that the parliament of Canada, when they dealt with this question in 1875, had just as full and ample powers as the imperial parliament had when they settled this question in the former Act. When section 93 of the British North America Act was enacted and it was introduced in the charters granted to all the provinces, it insured to the minorities those rights and privileges which they considered themselves entitled to. And let me say here, with a very intimate knowledge of this subject, because I have had to do with it for considerably over forty years, that it was a gentleman who was not a member of the church to which I belong who really put those clauses of the British North America Act on the broad basis on which they stand to-day; that is the late Sir Alexander Galt. At a later stage I will be very glad to give to members of the committee the various drafts which were made of those important sections known as section 93. The first section was a bald one, limited to Quebec and Ontario. It was widened from time to time until it assumed the proportions it possesses to-day. I may say here that in 1866 the question came up and Sir Alexander Galt, who represented an important element in the province of Quebec, was not satisfied with the existing conditions there, He stated that while the feelings of the people were kind and tolerant, still the matter required to be crystallized into an Act of Parliament, so that there could be no departure from the principles that were then recognized of allowing the minority to have their own schools and placing the matter on that basis. Sir George Cartier and Sir John Macdonald both assured him that this would be done. It was not done in 1866, and he then resigned in consequence, and remained out of the government for some months. However, he went to London, and a meeting was held in the beginning of 1867; and he then and there framed the basis of the present section 93 of the British North America Act. It is due to him rather than to anybody else that it was made a part of our constitution. At the time we dealt with it in 1875, I say we had just the same power as the imperial parliament had. We recognized our power and we exercised it in a way that we thought was wisest and best, and I may say here for the gentleman who took the most prominent part in opposition to it—the late Hon. George Brown, who at that time had a seat in parliament—that after that section was carried George Brown buried the hatchet for ever as regards any opposition to the subject of separate schools. He said in the concluding part of the debate on that occasion :

> Now that it has been settled by this parliament it is for ever removed from any question hereafter. It becomes part of the British North America Act and as such must be enforced.

It is worthy of note that although George Brown spoke against clause 11, not one line was to be found in the Toronto 'Globe' of that period against the adoption of that principle and in support of Mr. Brown's views. He did not subordinate the 'Globe', which was then the organ of the Liberal party, to his own individual views. He allowed the 'Globe' to continue to represent the views of the Liberal party, which were in favour of the extension of this principle to the minority in all parts of the Dominion. It is worthy of note here because it was not alone the Toronto 'Globe.' The organs of the Conservative party never hesitated about the line of policy they should adopt. They all supported it, because Sir John Macdonald himself, from the first time he entered parliament in 1854 up to the date of his death, was always a strong advocate of the rights of the minority. He recognized that if you wanted to make a population loyal and true and tolerant you had to give way in this matter, that there should be no hesitation so far as any religious body thought that they had from their standpoint a right to teach their own religion in any school, and Sir John Macdonald always advocated that principle down to the time of his death. Those who have had any experience in the effect of that toleration must be convinced that it is the wisest and best plan after all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The true principle is that the child belongs to the parent and not to the state. God holds the parent responsible for the child's bringing up. The education of a child is not simply the acquisition of knowledge of geography and arithmetic and kindred subjects. It is to bring up the child to a sense of the moral duties that are incidental to life in this world, and these moral duties are those that are taught in all religions. There is no church existing that does not teach a higher life. They may differ in their dogmas, but they are all one in recognizing that the Sermon on the Mount is the golden rule by which we should all be governed. That is the principle, and I take it that it would be a terrible mistake to introduce the public school system from the United States, ignoring entirely the existence of a God. The effect is visible to-day in the Republic to the south of us. I ask hon. gentlemen does crime, dishonesty and fraud exist in any part of the world to the extent that it does in the United States ? There are more murders committed, more forgeries, more robberies committed,—not perhaps stealing as the burglar would steal, but stealing through other sources, stealing by fraudulent methods. An hon. gentleman alluded a few minutes ago to the Equitable Life Insurance Company. There is an instance of what I referred to. That is one of the object lessons. Such a man as Chauncey Depew, who certainly ought to be above anything of the kind, stated the other day that one fraudulent transaction amounting to a quarter of a million had taken place. He was asked if he approved of that. He said, 'No, I did not approve of it.' He was asked 'Were you conscious of it ? Were you a party to it ?' He answered, 'Well, I cannot deny my responsibility.' In that case money was taken from where it honestly belonged and placed where it had no right to go. There is no country in the world where more dishonest practices are carried on than in the United States. Methods are employed which save a man from indictment. That is the criterion : how far can I go and make money safely. If I go so far, I will escape an indictment and cannot be prosecuted for robbery or for obtaining money under false pretenses. I cannot be made to answer for acquiring it dishonestly ; but judged by the strict moral rule no man of honour, no man of common honesty, could say that money acquired as it is in the very many instances of which we have had illustrations is honestly made. I have had occasion before—I am not going to do it now—to quote the evidence of clergymen, not of my own church, but of other churches, showing how in the United States men were deserting the church. I saw that the Rev. Mr. Stewart, the other day at a meeting of a Christian body in Toronto said they were surprised to see the men going to church in that city, and stated that in the United States the men never went to church although the women to a certain extent did attend. The number of men who visited any of the churches to which they belonged in the United States was comparatively small. I dare say it has been a matter of observation to hon. gentlemen—it has been to me when I visited the cities of the States—to note in the very large churches the small number of men who attended. It seemed to be the prevailing practice that the men were not under the influence of the clergy. I attribute that largely to the fact that God is excluded from the schools, that men are educated without any sense of the true object of this life, which is the preparation for the next. The whole idea of life is misunderstood, and life is turned into channels that Providence intended it should not run into. I say that the dogmas of every church teach high principles, and therefore it is very much better that any dogma should be taught than that all should be excluded from the schools. I remember very well the time when we had no public schools in Canada. I am speaking now of Upper Canada ; I remember when there were only the district schools—in every district there was one school. All over the rest of the country the schools were just as the people chose to make them ; if there were enough members of a particular congregation they had a school of their own and taught their children religion in their schools ; and I think no better family existed in the world than the population of early Canada. They were a model population. Crime rarely was practiced ; men lived honestly. You rarely heard of any threats. I remember perfectly well in my early days travelling from Montreal to the west. When the stage would be leaving McGill Street in Montreal, the bank clerks would come to a man and say, 'Where are you going ?' He might be going to Cobourg, Port Hope, Brockville, Toronto, Prescott or Cornwall. 'Well, would you take charge of this package ?' It would probably be a package of money. There was no express in those days ; you never heard of any man deceiving another, although a perfect stranger. No man would betray the trust reposed in him. You never heard in those early days of bandits—people being stopped at the point of a pistol and robbed. That did not exist ; but it is one of the features of the present age. I attribute it largely to the fact that we have excluded religion from our schools.

Those are views which perhaps hon. gentlemen may not concur in, but they are views formed after very many years experience, and noticing the effect not only on men but on communities. It has been my particular good fortune to have had this question of education somewhat prominently under my control. In the early fifties, it was a burning question in Upper and Lower Canada, more particularly in Upper Canada. In Lower Canada, I am glad to say, it never assumed anything like the same bitterness—in fact it never assumed any bitterness. The conciliation there was ample and abundant. The proof of that is to be found in many volumes that could be quoted here to-day. It was, however, a burning question at that time in Ontario. I had to do somewhat with the settling of the question and therefore my attention was probably more drawn to the subject than it would otherwise have been. I shall say no more on that subject other than this ; the proposal in the present Bill is vastly different from the concessions, as I may term them, that were made by this parliament in 1875, and which were fully discussed in this chamber. Those are a mere skeleton of what parliament then conferred upon the community, but for the sake of peace the minority are willing to accept them. They will make the best of the situation. Practically there are to be no separate schools beyond the fact that there may be half an hour's instruction from 3.30 until 4 o'clock, if the trustees so desire. Beyond that, the teachers have to pass through the Normal school and hold certificates and they have to be under the control of the inspector. Whether a teacher belongs to a public or separate school, he must hold the same certificate according to the grade of the school. The school is open to the inspection of an official named, not by the trustees, but by the government. The books in the schools are fixed by the government. When I say the government, I mean the commission delegated by the government of which I think one of the members is chairman. So that practically the schools are public schools up till 3.30 in the day.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Have they a separate Normal school ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is the qualification of the teachers the same ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there is no separate Normal school. The only province where there is a separate Normal school is the province of Quebec, where the generosity of the people there contribute to the support of the Normal school for the purpose of educating teachers for the class known as the dissentients. It is only in Quebec where that exists.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has just said that this clause was a compromise accepted by the minority.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman inform us who accepted that compromise in the name of the minority, or who was entitled to do so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been no convention held of the minority. They have not spoken through official channels that I am aware of. I myself have seen letters from gentlemen who were entitled to speak for the minority from the positions they held and who have discussed freely this educational question, and who, recognizing the public feeling that has been aroused, thought it was best not to demand what we were entitled to, but for peace sake to accept the best arrangement that could be made, and preserve peace and harmony.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could those letters be made public?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I could not say that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They might impress us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All I can say is that I myself, from being connected with this matter, from having carried on the negotiations in this chamber some thirty years ago, feel more than ordinary interest in the subject. When I found the high feeling that was aroused when this Bill was first submitted to parliament was likely to create a great deal of bitterness and unpleasantness, I thought it was much better to yield, far better to accept what has been conceded than to seek to obtain more with the acrimony and bitterness and prejudice that would naturally follow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wanted to know if there was any mandate from the minority to any person to speak in their name.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think as far as that goes, there has been no mandate—what one could call a mandate—either from the minority or the majority in the Northwest. I think they have taken less interest in the subject than the people at Ottawa and Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman does not know that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I judge it from the newspapers I read from the Northwest, the observations I have been enabled to make, and from the expressions of public men up there and persons who have travelled through that country. I may say here that half an hour has been accepted as a reasonable compromise. It is to be presumed that no objectionable books will be forced on the school. We have confidence in the kindly feeling that will be maintained in that country. A great variety of people are going in there from all parts of the world, and I think that the tendency will be rather—more particularly if this compromise is accepted—to diminish the prejudices that might otherwise arise. If the original clause had been insisted upon, there is no doubt it would have been opposed, and we know how difficult it is to maintain and carry out a law of that kind which is objectionable to a considerable majority of the population. I need not refer to the Manitoba question as an illustration of it. When my hon. friend from Richmond (Hon. Mr. Miller) was discussing this question in 1875, and eloquently maintaining the propriety of the clause, he instanced an illustration in the case of Manitoba and he said he could point to Mantoba as having had that question settled. He said it could not be disturbed there. He said the whole question has been removed from the political arena for ever. He was not a prophet in his own country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the hon. gentleman is no more a prophet to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If a legislature is determined to take away these rights that are obtained under the sanctity of the constitution, and if courts are made up of men with weak minds and intellects full of prejudices—we are all born with natural prejudices and caprices—where religion comes up there appears to be a peculiar obscuring of the vision. Those of us who had to do with the Manitoba question thought that was certainly settled, and five years afterwards my hon. friend here quoted it as an illustration of how much better it was to have it settled in 1871, than to have it an open question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman tell us why the Manitoba school question is not settled to-day ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because the parliament of Canada could not settle it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the Privy Council not settle it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have always been opposed to the decision of the Privy Council. I think they decided on the ground of expediency. They thought that the little red school house at the corner of the concession lines would be a proper receptacle for all denominations. It was a pure expediency judgment. However, I was going on to say that it is very much better to settle this question in such a way that it will not create any opposition in the future and I think that the skeleton is so slight that it cannot offend anybody, and if the children get the half hours' instruction and if as I believe will be the case, the schools are carried on fairly and justly and objectionable books are not used, probably as time goes on in a community where all belong to one church, I do not anticipate any government would care to interfere with the teaching of religion at other hours, provided there were no children belonging to other congregations. Where you get a body of people who are all in harmony, Presbyterian or Catholic, if they happen to be all of the one church, or if they can agree on a dogma, I am sure that no government in the Northwest would interfere with their permeating their literature through the schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is against the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I can point now to where the law is not observed. There are to-day in the maritimes provinces denominational schools, and there is no public law for them. They are there by the good sense and toleration of the people of the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised by my friends from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia that there are schools carried on there where Christian Brothers are teachers, and where practically——

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The state supports them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have certificated teachers and they receive their allowance just as the other schools receive it. There are other hon. members here who can say whether I am right or wrong. When the other provinces came in the schools as they had existed in Upper Canada were practically denominational schools, but they were not established by law, and in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—though section 93 of the British North America Act applies to Prince Edward Island—the denominational schools had no authority to exist of course, and for a time they were wiped out of existence ; but as the years went on people living together thought it would be far better to yield a little, even if they considered it was only prejudice on the part of the minority to desire to educate their children in their own way.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is one such school in the city of Halifax, but outside of that I think there are none.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think there is one in Moncton, and I think there are schools in Prince Edward Island. My hon. friend can tell me if I am wrong. Are there not some schools in Prince Edward Island in which although certificated and subjected to inspection, they allow religious teaching ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not sure that they do.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—If a school was perpetuated against the law and not under the law, it would be a fraudulent school.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It would not be against the law to teach religion.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes. He says it is contrary to law to have these schools in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, but that they have them. It is against the law and it is worse than the system in the United States.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It is not anything of the kind. We had our free schools in Prince Edward Island, but in Charlottetown, in order to please and to yield a little to our Catholic brethren, we have the St. Peter's school in Charlottetown which is taught by Roman Catholic teachers, paid by the government entirely. That is a concession made by the government and not fraudulent at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A separate building ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—If it is against the law, it is a fraud.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman explain to the Senate the difference between the rights enjoyed by the minority in Ontario under the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, and those which are conferred upon the people of the Northwest Territories in the new provinces, and what is the difference between the 16th clause as originally introduced by the premier and the amended clause which he is now discussing. That is really what the House wants to understand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause as introduced first was a recital of section 11 in the Act of 1875.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the ordinance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and the practice under that was to have two boards having absolute control, one of separate schools and one of the public schools, and the money allotted was divided between them and apportioned by the boards. The first clause 16 re-enacted section 11 of the Act of 1875, and this is an entirely different clause now.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Under clause 16 they were really getting separate schools in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And under clause 16 as at present framed they do not get anything ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have a right to religious instruction from 3.30 until 4.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is not a separate school ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend has not answered my question. We can all read the two clauses. I asked him if he could explain to us the difference between the concessions made to the minority in the Northwest Territories as they were originally intended to be given by the 16th clause, and the present clause ; and then I asked him, in addition to that, how far is the minority in the Northwest Territories restricted in regard to the question of education than they would be if they came in under section 93 of the British North America Act. We all know what that is so far as it affects Upper and Lower Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the law stood in 1875, and as they put it in operation for very many years—the local legislature passed an Act codifying it in 1884—there were two boards of administration, what was known as the Protestant Board and the Catholic Board, and they consisted of six members.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Twelve members.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At all events equal numbers. The board of the minority were given half the money and absolute power and control over the schools to teach religion all day if they liked for that matter. There was no restriction ; even their inspector was appointed by themselves, and not by the government. They were absolutely independent of the government. Under this Bill, the schools are under the control of the minister who has charge of education. Substantially up to half-past three they are absolutely public schools except this, that the trustees may belong to the minority. If it is a separate school, presumably the trustees have been elected from that body, but the inspector is appointed by the government, and the teachers must hold certificates on a par with the teachers of the public schools so that the conditions are extremely wide.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand the hon. gentleman, the difference is only in the half-hour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is all, except this, there are trustees elected who have the control and management of the schools internally, but they are not permitted to teach other books than those supplied by the department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the compromise is giving the half-hour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes ; there is the additional fact that the trustees belonging to the minority body, who have control of the schools, have a good deal of power and a good deal to say in the domestic arrangements. For instance, the selection of a teacher is an important matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But all subject to the regulations of the department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He must hold a certificate from the proper authorities. You can quite see where the trustees belonging to the same religion as the larger proportion of the pupils, there would necessarily be a religious atmosphere given to the school, but if there are children attending the school belonging to other denominations, then they would have no right to intervene with anything like religious teaching. What I say is this, if they were all of one religion no government would interfere seriously with their having prayers at the opening of the school—in fact they would have a right to say the Lord's prayer at the opening.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose there are two sets of trustees, Catholic trustees and others ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If the Catholic schools are in separate buildings entirely, where does the half-hour come in.?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From half-past three to four.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But if they are Catholic schools they do not require the half-hour, because they will inculcate their tenets all through.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Even those schools that are separate will be subject to the regulations of the department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sure every one who has listened to the explanation of these Bills by the hon. Secretary of State, will acquit him of any desire to raise excitement or create a feeling similar to that which was exhibited by himself a few nights ago when the hon. gentlemen referred incidentally to the subject. Having said that, I frankly confess that I approach this subject with a very great deal of diffidence, and with a desire as far as possible to treat the subject in as calm and collected a manner as my hon. friend who has just spoken. We have now the Bills presented creating two provinces, after a demand for them had been made for the last two or three years by the people of the Northwest Territories and also by the party with which I have the honour to be connected. Whenever the question was broached in the House of Commons, it was constantly voted down by the Liberal party until on the eve of a general election when the whole Northwest Territories were in arms demanding what they considered their rights in the way of local autonomy. Nothing was heard of the intention of the government until the excitement in the Northwest Territories became so great and their demands for provincial autonomy so loud that we had an announcement from the premier that if the Liberal party were returned again to power they would deal with this question and organize the Territories into provinces. Whether their action was the result of the agitation, and of an intimation from their supporters in the Northwest Territories that unless the people were granted that concession there would be no probability of any supporter of the present government being elected, it is not difficult to say. That announcement made by the premier, resulted in the return of a number of members supporting the present government. Upon the assembling of parliament we had the most extraordinary exhibition ever made before a legislative body —the premier of the country bringing down measures creating two new provinces in the Northwest Territories without the consent or apparently the knowledge of two of his most prominent ministers, one of whom represents the Northwest Territories and who was supposed to understand the wants and requirements of the section of the Dominion he represented—a gentleman, too, who had, when in power in Manitoba, deliberately deprived the minority of that province of the rights which were given to them under the law to which my hon. friend has called attention. That which has followed since I need not repeat. We all know the difficulties that presented themselves in the way of the Conservative government and myself when head of the government, in trying to settle the school question in a manner that we believed to be honest and equitable to the people who had enjoyed those privileges before being deprived of them by the Manitoba government, of which Mr. Sifton was one of the principal members. What resulted from that? Mr. Sifton on his return to the country at once took exception to the clauses relating to education. Subsequently, however, after negotiations extending over some time, an arrangement was effected. What my hon. friend opposite now designates as a compromise clause was substituted for the original clause 16 in the Bill. I have tried to elicit from the hon. gentleman the difference between these two clauses, but he very dexterously avoided altogether the explanation which I expected he would have given. He has told us, however, what the meaning of the present clause is. All I can tell him is, and I think he knows it, whoever accepted that compromise, if compromise it may be termed, certainly is not in accord with the sentiments of the vast majority of those who are affected by it, nor is the interpretation which he has given at all in accord with the explanations of the organs of the party to which he belongs, some of which organs are principally owned by members of the cabinet. However, I may refer to this point again before I close. We know there was a little rebellion in the cabinet after the return of Mr. Fielding from Europe. He was not satisfied with the provisions of this Bill and if rumour be correct, or partially correct, he was on the verge of leaving the cabinet unless the concession which he demanded was made. I think his speech on this question was the most ingenious one delivered in the House of Commons. It all resolved itself into this one point, that unless they accepted the amended clause the premier would have to resign, and that would have broken up the government; and rather than break up the government and lose his portfolio he would swallow the dose prepared for him while he was absent in Europe. It is precisely the same with others in the cabinet. The explanation given by the hon. gentleman on the questions to which I have called attention are in accord with the utterances of some of the ministers during the last election. They are diametrically opposed to the utterances of some of the other ministers when they were speaking in Quebec and the maritime provinces. I shall not weary the House, although I have them under my hand, with reading extracts from these speeches to show what their opinions were. Their opinions, stated in public and in portions of the public press, were in accord, as they supposed, with the sentiments of their particular readers and the portions of the country in which they happened to be.

I approach this subject with a good deal of diffidence because of the diversity of opinion which exists as to the actual power of the Dominion government under the British North America Act to deal with questions of this kind. We have had a variety of opinions. We have had Sir Wilfrid Laurier telling the lower House that upon the entrance of any new province similar to these which are about to be established, the provisions of the 93rd section of the British North America Act would apply. If that interpretation of the law be correct, it would automatically operate in favour of separate schools as they existed at the time the Territories were made provinces. I do not think there can be a question on that point. That opinion was also given in much stronger and more forcible language by Mr. Monk in dealing with this question. I must admit that Mr. Borden as a lawyer takes exception to that interpretation, and outside of parliament there are differences of opinion. An eminent lawyer in Toronto,

Mr. Christopher Robinson, takes a view of the question which is to a certain extent in accord with the views taken by the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons, but you will notice that he adds to the opinion which he gave to Mr. Sproule, one of the members of the House of Commons, upon a certain question that he had asked, that it must be left to the courts to decide, as he could not venture to give a decided opinion upon the question. Mr. Haultain, who I believe is a legal gentleman, takes a very strong view in favour, not only of the autonomy of the provinces in all other respects, but in regard particularly to education, claiming that the British North America Act provides that that subject shall be left exclusively with the provinces subject to the provisions of the British North America Act. His argument is that as the Northwest Territories were not a province or provinces at the time the British North America Act became law, therefore they do not come within the purview of the 93rd section of the British North America Act, and if they do not come within the purview of that clause, the provinces have under another section of the Confederation Act the right to deal exclusively with the subject of education. If we legislate respecting education, how far are we trenching on the rights of the provinces, and how far would our legislation be decided by the Supreme Court to be ultra vires. That is a grave question, and no doubt will have to be settled in the future by an appeal to the courts. Mr. Haultain has already declared in his public utterances that in case this clause is forced upon the new provinces, they will appeal to the courts in order to settle the question. It would seem to me, therefore, that it would have been better if the Dominion government, before introducing these Bills, had submitted the case to the Supreme Court and if necessary the law lords of the Privy Council in England, in order to have their opinion and interpretation of the clauses of the law to which I have called attention. If it should transpire that we have gone beyond our powers in dealing with this question or with any other question affecting the provinces, then I take it the Dominion parliament and government would be in a somewhat humiliating position. It seems to me, and I think it would appear desirable to most people who have considered this question, who have been connected with the agitations which have taken place in the past, and who have had to undergo condemnation and praise from different parties when they were dealing with this matter, that it should be settled in such a manner as to prevent any future litigation upon this very grave and important question. That is the view which I hold, and I think it would be well if the government had pursued the course which I have indicated.

My hon. friend the Secretary of State referred to his course in the past in reference to the passage of the Bill granting territorial rights to the Northwest Territories in 1875. I remember very well a little of the by-play that was going on at that time. What he says is correct so far as the agitation at that time in the House was concerned. He also referred to the part that he has played upon the question of education during the last forty wears. I do not know that I should weary the House with an historical account of the separate school question, but I hold in my hand a short synopsis of the whole legislation upon separate schools since 1807. I was somewhat amused when I heard the hon. gentleman refer to the action of the political parties in the past. The record shows that instead of the Liberal party having been either the fathers or supporters of separate schools the contrary is the fact. Turn to the memoranda which the hon. gentleman published and circulated a short time ago in connection with this subject, and you will find that George Brown, Oliver Mowat and the whole Liberal party at that time with scarcely an exception, voted against the establishment of separate schools in the old province of Canada, and also in the new provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. To us who have lived long enough and had something to do with events for the last forty years, it is really amusing to hear hon. gentlemen arrogating to themselves the credit of having done that which was really done by the Conservative party. My hon. friend took a very prominent part in the establishing of separate schools. I give him credit for the honesty and perseverance that characterized him in days past when he was dealing with this question, but I do not forget that when all this was done the hon. gentleman belonged to the Tory party and was acting with that party and not with the Liberal party, as I can show by the memoranda I have in my hand showing who voted for and voted against the Bills that my hon. friend himself introduced. He allowed them to remain without putting them on the statute-book in 1862. Perhaps it is not fair to say what the reason was, but the inference was that it was opposed by the party with which he is now connected, the late Sir Oliver Mowat and others voting constantly against him and the principles involved in the Bill.

Now, I am not taking any particular credit to the Conservative party for what they have done. I have already announced in this House, and I have no hesitation in saying now, that notwithstanding the horrors which my hon. friend has depicted in this House of crime in the United States arising from the fact of there being no separate schools, I have never been a supporter of separate schools per se, but I believe there are fundamental principles of Christianity which should be taught in all schools altogether independent of the peculiar dogma taught either by the Roman Catholic or the Protestant churches. I took that ground in 1895-6. I know, because I was a party to the legislation when Manitoba was brought into confederation, that it was intended that separate schools should be given and guaranteed to the minority in that province, and at that time most of you know that it was a grave question as to where the minority was to be found. The fact is, if we are to take history as we read it, that the Protestants were in a minority in the Territory at the time it was made a province and came into confederation. That being the case, then we may draw the inference from what was done that it was intended to protect the rights of the Protestants of Manitoba at that time. Such was the intention of Mr. Galt when he insisted upon clause 93 of the British North America Act being enacted to protect the rights of minorities in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Since the hon. gentleman has claimed all the credit for the Liberal party for having secured separate schools, I will read from a statement now before me which will show who has done most for separate schools.

The Act of 1807, or 47th George III., chapter 6, makes provision for public schools.

Under this Act no provision was made for religious instruction, but the trustees had power to regulate the schools and consequently they could introduce religious instruction if they chose.

I may add that that was the character of the schools in the town of Belleville some 70 years ago.

The Act of 1808, or 48 George III, chapter 16, amends the above, but only as regards the location of the London schools.

The Act of 1816, namely 56 George III., chapter 36, page 383 of volume of Acts from 32 George III. to 37 George IV., in library, makes no special provision for religious training, but leaves power in the hands of the trustees to provide for the government of the schools.

The Act of 1819, or 59 George III., chapter 4, page 450 of the library volume, amends the previous Acts in unimportant particulars, but makes no mention of religious instruction.

The next Act is that of 1820, namely chapter 7 of 60 George III., see volume in library mentioned above.

This Act provides for the continuance of the Act of 1816 above mentioned, with certain exemptions, but no provision is made for religious teaching.

Nevertheless under these Acts in consequence of the complete control the trustees had of the direction and teaching of the schools, the district in which Catholics had a majority or a considerable minority were in the course of time provided with schools directed in a manner agreeable to the Catholic people.

The Act of 1824, or 4th George IV., chapter 8, made permanent and extended the preceding Acts and provided the sum of £150 per annum, to afford the means of moral and religious instruction to the more indigent and remote settlements. The object stated was to purchase and distribute by means of the district boards of education, books and tracts calculated to afford the necessary instruction.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What province does that refer to?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Ontario—old Upper Canada.

This is the first legislative recognition in Canada of the principle of placing religious instruction on the programme as a principle of public policy, but it was not specially intended to further the views of Protestants or Catholics, either of whom could when they were in the majority no doubt obtain some benefit by purchasing Protestant or Catholic tracts and books.

No further legislation took place until the union. Though in 1835 and 1836 there were movements in regard to schools, the events of 1837 rendered impossible any attention to education. The negotiations for the union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada absorbed the attention of public men for some years after. At length in 1841 the two provinces were united and the province of Ontario came under the influence of the members from the province of Quebec. The very first Act regarding education shows the influence of the Catholic members from the lower provinces.

In the upper province at that time the question of separate schools had not been carried to the extent that the representatives of the Roman Catholic faith of Quebec carried it, and consequently they insisted or persuaded the members with whom they came in contact from Upper Canada to grant further concessions. At that time my hon. friend who is looking at me knows that these members were principally Protestants. I am glad to bear evidence to the fact that where the Protestants have been in large majorities, and the agitators have not entered among them, they have made great concessions which would not have been made otherwise had an agitation been started, and aroused the feeling that has unfortunately been exhibited in other instances. I may add that I firmly and conscientiously believe that if this question of education were not touched at all in this Bill the great majority—and I think there will ultimately be a great majority—of Protestants in the Northwest would have made concessions which would have been acceptable to the Roman Catholic settlers. That is the opinion I have of the Protestant community when not roused by inflammatory speeches and by agitation that should never exist. This statement continues:

The Act of 1841, 4 and 5 Victoria, chapter 18, passed by the Baldwin-LaFontaine government (Liberal), repealed the Acts previously mentioned as insufficient for the purpose. It provided among other things—

First, that Christian Brothers should be eligible as teachers though not British subjects. (Section 7, subsection 3.)

And this suggests to me an explanation of the remarks made by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, in reply to the question put by the hon. Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman said that in Charlottetown they permitted nuns and Christian Brothers——

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—No, they simply permitted Catholic teachers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I went to him and asked him then if that carried with it the teachings of the Roman Catholic faith, or Roman Catholicism, and he said no, they are working under the Public School Act, though taught by Roman Catholic teachers. That was a common practice when I was a boy. We never used to draw the distinction as to what a school teacher's faith was in those days. Then,

2nd. That separate schools might be established whenever the minority differed on religious faith from the majority. (Section 11.)

3rd. That the boards of examiners in cities and towns corporate, should consist when necessary one-half of Protestants, one-half of Catholics, to examine teachers and govern the schools. (Section 16, Statutes of Canada, 1841, chapter 18, page 102.)

The Act of 1843, or 7 Victoria, chapter 29, in sections 54, 55, 59, provides :

1. That no child shall be required to join in any exercise of religion objected to by the parents.

2. That where the teacher of any public school was a Protestant a separate Catholic school could be formed on the application of ten or more freeholders, and vice versa if the teacher was a Catholic.

So that it gave the right to establish separate schools where the teacher was a Protestant, and the right to establish a Protestant separate school if the teacher was a Catholic—to my mind a most absurd provision.

3. That such schools should be entitled to their share of public appropriations.

The Act of 1843, 7 Victoria, chapter 9, provides for the apportionment of the school funds of the united provinces between the two provinces.

The Act of 1845 (Draper and Papineau, Conservatives), 8 Victoria, chapter 41, page 235, makes provision for public instruction in the province of Quebec. It makes provisions (section 26) for the interest of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, and repeals the Act of 1841 so far as it applies to Quebec.

The Act of 1846, 9 Victoria, chapter 20 (Draper government, Conservative), sections 32, 33, page 729, provides for the establishment of Protestant and Catholic schools under certain conditions.

The Act of 1847, 10 and 11 Victoria, chapter 19 (Draper and John A. Macdonald government, Conservative), amends the Common School Act of Upper Canada by providing that the corporations of cities, towns and municipalities shall be corporations for the purposes of the School Act. It recognizes the existence of separate schools in sections 5, subsections 3 and 5, and 7.

The Act of 1849, 12 Victoria, chapter 83 (Lafontaine-Baldwin government, Liberal), page 563, of Statutes of Canada, part 1, 1849, which repealed the Act of 1843, does not contain any 'privileges for Catholics. though it does for coloured people. This Act, it was stated, was never read by ministers ; was objected to on all sides and allowed to remain a dead letter.

It is a most extraordinary thing that the legislature at the time should make a special provision for coloured people and leave out the other portions of the community, unless it was supposed that the coloured people should not associate with the children of the white people. That is the only inference I can draw.

The next Act making provision for separate Catholic schools is the Act of 1850, 13 Victoria, chapter 48 (Lafontaine government, Liberal), section 19, page 1263 of Statutes of Canada, 1850. This Act enacts provisions for separate schools for Catholics, Protestants and coloured people, according to the provisions of the Act of 1843.

The Act of 1851, 14 Victoria, chapter 111 (Lafontaine government, Liberal), one section only, explains the Act of 1850, section 19, and enlarges the power to establish separate schools in cities and towns. (Statutes of 1851, page 2129.)

The Act of 1853, 16 Victoria (Taché and Hincks government, Liberal and Conservative), chapter 185 of the Statutes of Canada, 1853, section 4, page 905, further provides means for strengthening separate schools by freeing their supporters from assessment for the common schools, &c.

The Act of 1855, 18 Victoria, chapter 131 (Tache-Macdonald, Conservative government), page 553 of statutes, was specially enacted for the purpose of defining and enlarging the powers of the Catholics to establish separate schools. It repeals section 19 of the Act of 1850 and the 4th section of the Act of 1853, but provides more fully than these did for the establishment and government of separate schools.

In 1859 a Bill was introduced by Mr. Ferguson, a private member, providing for the repeal of the Acts authorizing the establishment and maintenance of separate schools. This Bill was debated briefly by Ferguson and McGee but no division was taken and the Bill was not reached again that session.

The Secretary of State will remember that, because he was in parliament at the time. It may be mentioned that Mr. Ferguson was an extreme opponent of separate schools in any shape or form.

The Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, 1859 (Cartier-Macdonald Conservative government), chapter 65, sections 18 to 36, page 771, re-enacted the Act of 1855 of the Cartier-Macdonald government, and this continued to be the law on the subject till the Act of 1863 was passed.

In 1860 Mr. Scott introduced a Bill to amend the Acts respecting separate schools in Upper Canada. This Bill passed its second reading on 16th May, 1860, on a vote of 59 yeas to 19 nays, and was supported by J. A. Macdonald, Carling, Abbott and other Conservatives. The Macdonald-Cartier government were then in power.

Mr. Mowat and those who followed him invariably voted against separate schools. I only mention that fact to show the Liberal party's stand upon this question of education in old Canada.

In 1861, on the 23rd March, Mr. Scott introduced his Bill again, but it was not reached till the 16th May, when the order for the second reading was discharged and the Bill was withdrawn ; no vote was taken (Cartier-Macdonald government).

In 1862 Mr. Scott again introduced his Bill which was carried as far as the second reading by a large vote of 93 to 13, but not reached again for a third reading, though an attempt was made to give it precedence (Cartier-Macdonald government), Mowat and other Liberals voting against it.

That is the time the Bill was dropped and an election followed immediately. I have a pretty distinct recollection of that, because I had an election at that time and was defeated on this very question because I refused to go the full length of pledging myself to vote to take from the minorities of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the rights that were granted to them under the Act. However, I never regretted the position I took then. I believe it was the proper course, as I believe it is correct to protect the rights of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects.

The Act of 1863 (Sandfield Macdonald government), 26 Victoria, chapter 5, was then introduced by the Hon. Mr. Scott, and was assented to on the 5th May, 1863.

In that case Mr. Mowat and other Liberals voted against the Bill. I am not sure whether my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in the House at the time.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, I came in in 1863.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is the time the hon. gentleman was elected, and I was defeated. I do not know what position the hon. gentleman took on that question, but as he belonged at that time to the Conservative party, I take it for granted he voted with his leaders and supported the Bill.

The Act of 1863 was duly re-enacted and embodied in the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1877, chapter 206, volume 2, page 2140.

This Act was prepared, I have good reason to know under the direction of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. I do not instance that fact to complain that the hon. gentleman sought the advice of the hierarchy, whose interests he was looking after at the time any more than I——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I got Mr. Ryerson's consent, which perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes, I do know. Rev. Mr. Ryerson was just about as clerical as any of the gentlemen to whom I have referred belonging to his own church. I have a very good recollection of Egerton Ryerson, one of the best educationalists who ever occupied a position in Canada and to whom Canada owes in a great measure the educational system which prevails in Canada.

This Act was prepared under the direction of the Catholic hierarchy, and has continued to be the law ever since, with certain amendments from time to time to protect the manner of making assessments and collecting the rates, The law as it exists at present is to be found in the Ontario Revised Statutes, Volume 11, page 2466, chapter 227.

Upon this memo. I based the statements which I have made with reference to the history and growth, if I may so term it, of the separate school question from 1807 to 1863.

Mr. Scott's Bill of 1860 was supported by a vote of 59 to 19, and John A. Macdonald, John Carling and J. J. C. Abbott voted for it, the Macdonald-Cartier government being in power. Journals of 1860, page 450, Conservative government.

Mr. Scott's Bill of 1861 was introduced on 23rd March, 1861, and not brought up again till the 16th May, when it was discharged. No vote was taken on it at all. Journals 1861, 36-363, Conservative government.

Mr. Scott's Bill of 1862 was introduced on April 7th ; was debated on the 29th April and again on the 30th April ; was carried on May 2nd by a vote of 93 to 13 ; John A. Macdonald, Carling and Conservatives generally voting for it, and Sir Oliver Mowat and others voting against it. Journals, 1862, page 147, Conservative government.

Mr. Scott's proposition of 1863 was passed by a majority of 74 to 30, John A. Macdonald, Abbott, Carling and Conservatives generally voting for it, and Mowat and Liberals voting against it. Journals, 1863, page 130, Sandfield Macdonald government.

It is thus obvious :

1. That previous to Mr. Scott's entry into the affair the two enactments of any value to Catholics (i.e., the Acts of 1855 and the re-enactment of it in 1859) were by the Conservative government, and

2. That but for the Conservatives Mr. Scott's amending Act of 1863 could never have been carried.

3. That Mr. Scott was but the agent of the Catholic bishops, who then as now thought that they could take care of their church interests pretty effectively.

Those are deductions which I have drawn from the facts which I have read to the House. They may not be interesting to some, but they are facts which, placed upon the records may be of benefit to those who are dealing with the question in the future. The next historical events, the record of which I am not going to read, relate to the New Brunswick School Act and what followed after confederation. The Manitoba separate schools shall also receive attention. I will show how they were dealt with and by whom they were dealt with, but I do not know that I shall take the trouble to read the statement, because they are of such a modern date that most people know the effect of them. It will be noticed by the statistics which I have read in reference to the schools, that the period to which my hon. friend called attention in the history of this country when everybody was honest and he could trust his money and his packages to any person to take them a distance was a period when religion was not exercised in the schools by law at all. In his boyhood days and in my boyhood days religion was taught although not recognized by the law; it was taught in the manner in which I indicated when I spoke of the matter before. The fundamental principles of religion were taught, and not the doctrines of the Episcopalian or Roman Catholic or any other church. The masters of the schools I attended in those days were principally Irish mathematicians who came to the country, educated men who were not fit for anything else, and they generally taught school, I received a good portion of my education from them. If at that period we were all honest, and rascality and villainy of the character described by my hon. friend prevails in the United States where no separate schools exist, how does he reconcile the two cases ? I think no child should be brought up without being taught the rudiments of Christianity. There are principles in connection with the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches upon which all agree. You go further than we do upon many points, and all I can say is that I hope we may be right and reach the heavenly home as well as you gentlemen who think you have a better religion than we have. It being six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

Second Sitting.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 8 p.m.

Routine proceedings.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL, on resuming the debate, said: When the House rose at six o'clock I had given a short resume of what I may call the history of the rise and progress of separate schools in Canada. I intimated that I had a short memorandum of historic events which took place with reference to the New Brunswick School Act and also of the Manitoba School Act. It is very short, but I did not consider it necessary to read it to the House. I have, however, been requested by a number to give it as they would like to see the full history of the school question, not only as given from 1807 to the present time, but also the action of parties in parliament in dealing with the New Brunswick and Manitoba school questions. As it will not take many minutes, although not strictly pertinent to the measures before the House, perhaps it would be excusable to give it under the circumstances. If you refer to Todd's Parliamentary Government, page 346, you will learn that in 1871 a Bill passed the legislature of New Brunswick regulating the schools, out of which arose the difficulties that afterwards culminated in an appeal to the authorities here, and also carrying the case to the Privy Council in England. The Act was passed by the New Brunswick legislature in 1871. On January 10, 1872, the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick protested against the provisions of that law and asked for its disallowance by the Dominion government. The government of the day decided not to interfere with that legislation. However, on May 20, 1872, a motion was made in the House of Commons by Mr. Costigan, asking the government to disallow the Bill. That was lost. Subsequently another motion was made that a petition be sent to Her Majesty to amend the Confederation Act in regard to the separate schools in the province of New Brunswick. That also was lost. In 1873, on May 14, a motion was made in the House of Commons asking the government to disallow the New Brunswick School Act of 1871, imposing taxes on non-supporters of public schools. That motion was carried. However, though the resolution passed parliament, the request was not complied with by the Dominion government. Sir John Macdonald was head of the government at the time, and his Attorney General declared that the Act being intra vires they would not disallow it, notwithstanding the passage of the resolution in the House of Commons, asking them to do so. Subsequently the government referred the question to the law officers of the Privy Council in England, who decided the Act to be intra vires. That ended the question so far as the Separate School Act and the school law of New Brunswick were concerned. I may say, however, that since that time those who have paid any attention to the working of the Act in New Brunswick, know that the most liberal construction has been put upon the provisions of that Act and they have followed the same course as had been explained by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island in reference to the schools in Charlottetown. Bear in mind, the Privy Council in Canada and the law Lords in England sustained what we now term provincial rights. Whatever the constitution gave them in matters of this kind should not be interfered with. In 1878 we had another illustration of that principle, and it is somewhat worthy of note that on the day we are celebrating, the 12th of July, in the year 1878, Isaac Butt presented a petition to the government in England from 20,000 Irish Catholics, praying for the disallowance of a Bill which has been passed by the New Brunswick legislature incorporating the Orange Society. The decision of the English authorities was that the Bill was within 'the competency of the legislature of New Brunswick' and therefore should not be disallowed—another instance in which the Privy Council as well as our own government of that day asserted and maintained the principle of provincial rights. Turning to the Manitoba School Act, the Act bringing that portion of the Northwest Territories into the confederacy as a province was passed in 1870. The separate schools clauses were added to that Bill, as most of you are aware, in the words used in the British North America Act, in reference to the right to separate schools in Ontario and Quebec, but as there was no law at the time in Manitoba, Sir Geo. E. Cartier moved that the words 'and in practice' be added, because Sir George at that time knew that the denominational schools had existed in Manitoba, and he supposed as parliament did, at the time, that by putting in the words 'by law or by practice' he would continue the rights enjoyed by the minority in that province, prior to the passage of the Manitoba Act. Under that provision of the Manitoba Act, a Bill was introduced in the Manitoba legislature by Mr. Norquay, leader of the Conservative government, establishing separate schools much upon the principle existing in Ontario and Quebec, and those rights continued and the schools were organized and maintained under that law until 1890, when Mr. Greenway repealed the law and abolished separate schools and the use of the French language in that province.

There was an appeal to the Manitoba courts on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority, by Mr. Barrett, then a resident of Manitoba and an officer of the Inland Revenue Department, I believe. He entered an action testing the legality of the law. The court decided it to be intra vires. This judgment was appealed against to the Supreme Court of Canada which unanimously decided, strange to say, even in opposition to the court in Manitoba, that the Act of 1890 abolishing separate schools was ultra vires. Then appeals were taken to the Privy Council in England, who declared the law passed by Mr. Greenway to be intra vires on this ground, notwithstanding the fact that the Manitoba Act provided for the retention of all the rights and privileges that had been enjoyed by law and practice in Manitoba, the Catholic minority had the same rights that they had possessed prior to the passing of the Manitoba Act. That is, there being no law at the time Manitoba entered the union establishing or supporting denominational schools, such schools having been supported by private funds, the minority have the same right to continue them and consequently the repeal of Norquay's law was not in contravention of the power of the Manitoba legislature. They added to that decision that a wrong had been done to the minority, and that they should appeal to the Dominion government to introduce remedial legislation. Then followed an application on the part of the minority to the Privy Council of Canada for remedial legislation. The question of the right of appeal was submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada which decided by three to two that the minority had no such right. The dissentients to that judgment were the late Mr. Justice King, formerly of New Brunswick, and the late Mr. Justice Fournier, who was a judge at the time. The last judgment of the Privy Council in England declared the Act passed by the Manitoba legislature abolishing separate schools to be intra vires for the reasons I have given. But as I say, they added to that judgment that a wrong had been done to the minority in Manitoba which should be remedied by legislation. The minority appealed to the Law Lords of the Privy Council against the decision of the Supreme Court, which denied them the right to appeal to the Dominion government for remedial legislation, which appeal was sustained. An appeal to the Dominion government for remedial legislation was made in 1892. The government tried as far as possible to come to some amicable arrangement, but it could not be done. The appeal to the Privy Council was in 1894, the judgment of the Privy Council was in 1895, and the remedial order, which was passed by the government of which I was the head at that time, was dated March 21, 1895. The resolution of the Manitoba legislature reaffirming its position on the question was passed on the 19th June, 1895. Then the supplementary order was issued. Most of you know what followed. The remedial legislation was blocked by the opposition in the House of Commons talking parliament out of existence. My hon. friend opposite smiles, but that is the literal truth. The fifth year of the parliamentary term expired in the month of April. The party, then as now headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, talked night and day until the term of parliament expired, and so persistent were they in their opposition to remedial legislation that they did not even allow partial estimates to be passed to pay the employees of the government. They, however, when they came to power passed an Order in Council contrary to law, and the Governor signed it in order to provide money to pay the government employees. I have placed these historical facts on record that they may be of use hereafter.

Referring to the legislation of to-day and the position occupied by the gentlemen who now control the destinies of this Dominion, their actions in 1895 and 1896 must be left to the judgment of the electors and to their own consciences. There was a reason, and a good reason, based upon equity and upon the judgment of the Privy Council for the government to take action in the attempt which they made to remedy the wrong which the Privy Council said existed, and which I believe did exist. I have under my hand extracts here that will fill two or three pages from the utterances of my hon. friend sitting opposite, Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, the hon. Secretary of State, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the whole party, in which they condemn in the strongest terms the action of the government for interfering with prerogative and privileges of self government in the province of Manitoba. Even my hon. friend from Halifax wrote a pamphlet on the question which in order to refresh my memory I read again the other day in which he takes the same ground with those whom he was supporting in opposition to remedial legislation, declaring in as plain language as he could without committing himself too far against remedial legislation under the circumstances. Whether he has been doing penance for that during the last ten years I do not know, but I am very much inclined to think that he will support the present government notwithstanding his utterances and his sentiments in the pamphlet to which I have referred. If I may be permitted to do so, I will pay him the compliment of saying it is one of the best defences of the subject that I have read though I think his conclusions were wrong, and I think he would agree with me to-day, but the political exigencies of that time demanded the course which he pursued in support of his friends. The political exigencies of to-day require that the supporters of the government, although I know they conscientiously disagree with the course pursued by the ministry, should sustain the government in the course they are taking now, even though it is diametrically opposed to that which they took in 1895-6. I remember very well the numerous paragraphs which were written and the great use that was made of the words 'political exigencies' by the late Hon. Thomas White in one of his speeches. It was looked upon not only as a moral error, and delinquency on his part but as a political sin that any party should ever act on the principle that politica exigency justified a politician in departing from his honest convictions in order to support the government. How far the supporters of the present government, particularly the gentlemen from Manitoba who took part in the repeal of the Separate School Act in Manitoba, have acted in such a manner is a matter for them to explain, not for me. I purpose to act, as far as I can, in this matter consistently with what I did before, because I felt that I was doing right then, and I can reconcile the course I am pursuing to-night with the way I acted then.

My hon. friend the Secretary of State referred in glowing terms to the growth and development of the territories. We all rejoice with him on that fact. He intimated that the population of the older provinces was not growing as rapidly as he would like to see it grow, or as rapidly as the population of the Northwest. That is easily explained. No one can go through the Northwest Territories, especially Manitoba, without meeting in every second man a settler from the older provinces. One of the principal reasons why the population of Ontario did not show as large an increase as we expected and why we lost six representatives in the House of Commons was the fact that thousands of her people moved from Ontario to Manitoba and the Northwest Territories and British Columbia. An hon. gentleman sitting opposite to me, who is an Ontario man, now boasts of being a resident of British Columbia. It is gratifying to know that we have a Northwest of our own to which our people who desire to acquire lands can go, instead of emigrating as they did twenty or thirty years ago to the United States. We retain the population in the country but it is lost to the older provinces, and that accounts in a great measure for the apparently slow growth of population in the older provinces, and for the rapid increase in Manitoba and the Northwest. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Brockville, (Mr. Fulford) is not here to-night, because this being the 12th of July I should like to refer to a letter of his which appeared in the London 'Chronicle' on this very question, and to enter a protest against the statements which he made on that occasion. I informed him that I intended to bring this up and I had hoped he would be present. The hon. gentleman was in England while this agitation was going on with respect to Provincial Autonomy. As I said to him, I suppose the reason he wrote the letter was because he wanted to make himself solid with the Irish Catholics. He was then on the point of taking an automobile trip through Ireland, and in order to get a good reception he wrote this inflammatory, I was going to say untruthful letter, under a misapprehension, I hope, of the facts. The London 'Chronicle' of April 25th last, contained his letter. Referring to the agitation in Canada, he says :

In a population where the Catholics number about 43 per cent of the entire population, and where there is a small but active minority of political Orangemen, it is not to be wondered at that occasionally there are sectarian extremists.

It is only by the efforts of people of this character that the political aspect of the Orange Order can be kept alive. A certain class of mediocre bigots can only secure political prominence through these means; therefore, it is found necessary to wave the Protestant banner every decade or two.

Now, as heretofore, the agitation is confined almost altogether to Toronto, which is extremely Tory, and more wildly Orange than any city in Ireland. The introduction of legislation in the Dominion Parliament by Sir Wilfrid Laurier creating two new provinces in the Northwest furnished another wild outburst from these so-called enthusiastic Protestants, numbering, as I have said, but an extremely small proportion of the population of the Dominion, and confined almost altogether to Toronto.

If the hon. gentleman had asked me, I could have shown him by reference to the Orange statistics that the organization which he speaks of as an extremely small proportion of the population of Canada, runs up to over 200,000. He continues, following almost in the language used by the Secretary of State, to explain clause 17, of the Bill :

There is no proposal to establish sectarian schools in western Canada. The schools are in every particular, both as to standard, teachers and public inspection, similar to other schools, with one exception, that between 3.30 and 4 o'clock, where the majority come under this particular legislation, religious instruction can be given by the resident clergyman.

There is more of this character of writing in the letter, but I have read enough to show the manner in which a Canadian senator undertook to educate—I was going to say mislead the people of England. I do not purpose to answer the hon. gentleman myself. I shall allow the Toronto 'Globe,' the leading organ of the Liberal party in Canada, to deal with Mr. Fulford, and reply to his denunciation of the Orange Order and his declaration that the excitement was confined to that particular class of politicians in Canada. In the 'Globe' of April 10th, there is an editorial, which contains the following :—

Those who suppose that opposition to the educational clauses in the Northwest autonomy bills is confined to Toronto, and that it is dependent on Orange-Toryism for its vitality, are living in a fool's paradise.

It is not very often I can agree with the 'Globe,' but I do in this case ; Senator Fulford must have been living in a fool's paradise when he wrote his letter, stating that the whole agitation against the educational clauses is confined to the Orange society. The Globe continues :

The point of capital importance, and which cannot be disproved by shutting one's eyes to its undesired existence or by shouting bravely that it does not exist, is the unmistakable fact that not in Toronto alone, but in scores of centres throughout this province the sanest and steadiest and most intelligent men cannot bring themselves to approve of the Dominion Parliament, on any pretext whatsoever, interfering in the educational affairs of the new provinces. The men who make this objection are not Tories. They are not Orangemen. They are Liberals. They are, some of them, the men who give virility and prestige to Liberalism in their constituencies, and without whom there would be no Liberal party worthy of the name. To ignore the fact of their opposition, to minimize its significance, or to misunderstand its quality, is to play the part of children in a situation which demands the wisdom and courage of men.

Another delusion is the notion that this significant opposition is wholly based upon racial or religious prejudices.

Now that is pretty strong language, and I think it is a sufficient answer to Mr. Fulford's declaration that the agitation is confined to Orange-Toryism in the city of Toronto. I do not propose to follow that point further than to call attention to a mass meeting which was held in Massey Hall in the city of Toronto, for the purpose of denouncing the remedial legislation, if such I may term it, that is now before parliament and condemning the action of the government in framing the 16th or any other clause affecting what they term the educational rights of the Northwest Territories. Who were those who attended that meeting? Were they the leading Orange Tories of whom Mr. Fulford writes? My hon. friend opposite me knows very well they were not. They were nearly all leading Liberals of that city, such men as Caldicott, Thompson the lawyer, and Leighton McCarthy, and a number of others that I could mention. Not satisfied with denouncing the government, they denounced the Tory members from the city of Toronto for not being present to assist them in their condemnation of the present government, and yet in the face of such facts we find government supporters attributing to others that which the leading men of their own party are guilty of. I do not desire to be understood as saying that many Orangemen are not opposed to this legislation, but any man who knows the facts will not attribute to them alone the agitation in the city of Toronto. If he does he is either speaking of matters of which he knows nothing, or wilfully perverting the facts. So much for the 12th July, and the Hon. Mr. Fulford.

In conclusion, I want to refer for a few moments to the provisions of the Bill. To the money arrangements I have no objections to make. I should like, however, to have seen one province instead of two. My own conviction is, and I believe it is the conviction of the great majority of the residents of Manitoba and the Northwest, that the arrangement should have been to increase materially the area of the Province of Manitoba and erect the balance of the Northwest Territories into one province. The Hon. Secretary of State, in speaking of this, ingeniously said 'you could control and manage a small province cheaper than a larger one'; but there is considerable difference between the cost of governing one province and the expenditure involved in governing two. By giving a large addition from the present Northwest to Manitoba, and making but one province west of Manitoba in the Territories, the expense of governing that part of the Dominion would have been much less. There is very little difference in the cost of managing a large province and that of managing a smaller province, as we know by the experience of the smaller provinces of the Dominion. British Columbia does not require more territory. It is large enough now, and the developments and discoveries in that country prove it to be one of the richest of our provinces. Three provinces west of Ontario would have been quite sufficient for all the purposes of government, and would have been infinitely better than the proposed arrangement.

I think also it is a very great mistake—and this has been my conclusion for many years, both with regard to Manitoba and the Northwest Territories—that the lands have not been given to the local authorities to manage for themselves, and relieve the country of the charge upon the revenues of the Dominion, in lieu of the land, which must be made for all time to come, of the interest on over one million dollars. When the Dominion has sold all the lands or given them away for railway purposes in the two western provinces, there will be no returns to recoup the annual payment. The interest on the amount will have to be paid for all time to come.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—There would be no land to sell.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There will be none to sell, and after it is all gone the interest charge will remain for ever. I do not share the fear expressed by the Prime Minister, when he referred to this subject, that if the lands were given to the provinces, the price would be made so large that it would prevent settlement. That has no force whatever, except as an excuse for depriving the people of that part of Canada of the control of the lands. I am opposed to interference with the autonomy of the different provinces. We have heard a great deal on that subject this session in the different committees in dealing with minor matters, such as railway charters. Under the constitution certain rights in connection with these roads are given to the provinces, which I think is a blot on the constitution. I have always believed, and believe still, that the whole range of transportation systems should be under the control of the Dominion. We are not dealing with that question now; I refer to it merely for the purpose of pointing out how tenaciously the Senate has adhered to the principle of provincial rights in that respect, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite do not hesitate to vote for a proposition which takes from the new provinces rights which I believe are guaranteed to them under the law. I shall not deal, because I am not capable of doing so, with the legal aspect of that question. I shall leave that to others who in all probability will follow me, and who can deal with it more intelligently than I can. But I may refer again to the uncertainty as to the power which this parliament has to deal with the educational question. It would be exceedingly unfortunate if we should have interminable law-suits, whether instigated by individuals or by the provinces themselves, testing the question of the power of this parliament to legislate upon a purely local question. For that reason I repeat that while strongly in favour of the erection of that portion of the Dominion into a province or provinces, I do think, in order to avoid the difficulties which may arise, and which are presenting themselves to the mind of every thinking man who has paid any attention to this question, that it would have been better to have allowed this measure to stand for another six months, until the government could have submitted these disputed points to the Supreme Court or to the Privy Council in England, and have them finally settled. Convinced as I am of the propriety and statesmanship of that course, I propose to move, seconded by my hon. friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. de Boucherville), That the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

If that were carried, the government could act upon the suggestion made, I will not say exclusively by myself, but which I now repeat, to ascertain precisely the power we possess, and then legislate in accordance with the authority given us by the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Will the hon. gentleman state what question in his opinion should have been submitted to the courts?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have pointed out a number of differences of opinion. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is contradicted by the leader of the opposition in the lower House, while his opinion is sustained by Mr. Monk and Mr. Bergeron. Then another opinion has been given by Mr. Haultain, and another by Mr. Christopher Robinson, upon different points which have been raised in the debate. I might add that the Minister of Justice has given a very deliberate opinion in the House of Commons, but I venture the assertion that a Philadelphia lawyer after reading it would be unable to understand what it means. I read it two or three times myself, and my blunted intellect was quite incapable of comprehending its meaning. I asked a number of lawyers if they understood it, and they all replied that they did not. My hon. friend is a student of political history and knows the points to which I have referred.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This is a measure on which, in my judgment, it is most peculiarly appropriate that the Senate of this Dominion, both collectively and individually, should express an opinion. Late as the session is, long as it has been protracted, I for one have no objection whatever to the debate being continued as long as our hon friends see fit to continue it; for I am well convinced that the longer this question is debated, the more it is brought before the public, the more convinced they will be that the government on this occasion has pursued a just and wise course, and that they are not in the slightest degree liable to the imputation made by my hon. friend that their course to-day is diametrically opposed to their course eight years ago. As I have said, this is a question which it is peculiarly appropriate that the Senate of the Dominion should pass upon. We are here, if we have any function at all in the constitution, for the express purpose of guarding the rights of the smaller provinces. For that purpose the members of the Senate have been given a life tenure, for that purpose the smaller provinces are provided here with a much larger representation in proportion to their numbers than the larger provinces are conceded. It is perfectly clear that while it is abstractly possible, though not probable, that one particular province might dominate in the other chamber, it is inconceivable under any circumstances that any one province should exercise an undue influence in this body. Therefore I say that it is peculiarly appropriate that the measure should be fully discussed in the Senate of the Dominion.

It is not my purpose to follow my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who I may remark has treated this question with unusual moderation and in an unusually reasonable manner, through the somewhat lengthy dissertation with which he has favoured us, as to events which occurred, I was going to say, prior to the creation, at any rate prior to the creation of this confederation, nor do I desire either to enter at any great length into the legal subtleties which trouble my hon. friend's mind. Some years ago I had occasion to discuss this question of the value of legal opinions with a very eminent English lawyer, no less a personage than the late Chancellor of England, my lamented friend, Lord Herschell ; and I very well recollect that he was good enough to expound to me and to an interested audience how it was that legal opinions were obtained, even in so good a constitutional country as England. I remember Lord Herschell telling me that on one occasion Lord Palmerston had consulted the late Sir Richard Bethel on a question of great importance affecting principles of international law. Sir Richard Bethel, after due consideration, presented to Lord Palmerston a learned, lengthy, well-reasoned, logical, clear opinion, taking a particular view of the case. Lord Palmerston took the opinion, but expressed to Sir Richard Bethel his regret that he had arrived at that conclusion. Sir Richard expressed his surprise that Lord Palmerston had not told him what conclusion he wished him to arrive at, and remarked that there was a good deal to be said on the other side of the question ; and he withdrew his opinion. Forty-eight hours later he presented to Lord Palmerston another opinion, still more learned, still more logical, still clearer, and still better reasoned, in support of Lord Palmerston's view.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is what the government have done in this case.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have not the slightest doubt that the government could obtain opinions on any question in any particular direction they desired. That has been my experience and I think it is the experience of most men who have had much to do in the matter of legal opinions.

There is one feature of this whole discussion to which I think the attention of this House and this country may well be called. It is remarkable that the parties who are most directly affected by this legislation are the parties of all others who appear to care least about it. We know that Ontario has been set in a turmoil ; we know that Quebec has been agitated more or less on this question ; but the Northwest has remained perfectly cool and impassive. Fiery agitators, I admit, have had no trouble whatever in stirring up the angry passions of my friends in Toronto to almost boiling pitch, but the fiery agitators, when they got as far as Edmonton, struck a barrier of perpetually frozen ground so far as this question is concerned at any rate. There has been plenty of time ; this matter has been before the country for fully six months ; there has been plenty of opportunity for our countrymen in the Northwest, if they thought they were aggrieved, to make their wishes known. I ask, in the judgment of this House and of this country, whether all the advices they have received from the Northwest do not go to show that to-day there is no serious discussion or dispute on this matter. But the other day a member of the government was sent back for re-election to the very heart of the region most concerned, and yet the men who tell us that the Northwest is disturbed and agitated over this question, did not dare to put up a man to oppose him and he was elected by acclamation. I remember perfectly well the state of things in Manitoba when in 1896 it was proposed that the government of the Dominion should coerce that province. There was plenty of agitation then ; there was plenty of demonstration then ; there was no uncertain sound either from the people or the legislature of Manitoba on that occasion. Now I ask the House what is the natural inference to be drawn from those circumstances. I say the natural inference is this, that there is no substantial grievance, that the people of the Northwest are not in the slightest degree dissatisfied with what the government propose to do in this matter.

I come to the merits of this case. First I shall discuss what I may call the natural equity of the case, then I shall have a word or two to say as to the legal aspect thereof. Again I have to ask the House and to ask the country what right of the majority do we propose to interfere with, what just privilege of the majority do we propose to take away ? On the contrary it will be found on examination of this Bill that every legitimate right of the provinces, every legitimate right of the majority in these provinces has been scrupulously guarded and protected. As the hon. gentleman has admitted, as the hon. Secretary of State has declared again and again, the provincial authorities retain the fullest power to decide the qualification of every teacher who teaches in every school, whether separate or public. The provincial authorities retain the fullest authority over the course of study, over the curriculum, over the books that are to be used, and they retain the right of appointing examiners to see that the various teachers who are employed conform to their regulations. What is the special privilege, the only special privilege, which this Bill proposes to confer. It proposes to confer the permission on those who choose to use it for one-half hour in every day to have those children whose parents desire it instructed in the religious tenets of the religious body to which they belong, and that is not confined, as I understand the Act, to any one particular denomination. The Anglicans, the Methodists, my Baptist friends, may, if they choose, avail themselves of the privilege. The Presbyterians may do it—for aught I know the followers of Buddha, if there are any there, can do it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is no longer a privilege if everybody has it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is all the Bill does. If my hon. friend is correct that it is not a privilege, it is not a thing which can interfere materially with the rights of the majority. The Catholic minority, or any other minority, could not well ask less, and if there is any party who are likely to suffer from granting of that right or privilege, call it which you will, it is those very men who propose to erect separate schools under the conditions prescribed. Recollect that in erecting a separate school, in most cases the men who for conscience sake choose to do so, put themselves at a certain disadvantage. They will have in most cases, as I have known in Ontario and elsewhere, to pay more in proportion than their neighbours. They will probably have to put up with less efficient teaching, because they will not be able to pay as large a salary in most cases as the teachers in the ordinary public schools enjoy. Under these circumstances, I say the majority have small right to complain, and that the interference with the so-called rights of the majority does not exist except in the imagination of men who wish to make a grievance out of nothing.

Now, hon. gentlemen, I will admit frankly that if we were approaching this question for the first time, if we took this matter up with an absolutely clean slate, if we were bound by no previous engagements, I will admit that it is a fair question of argument, and I do not hesitate to say, that I myself would strongly incline to advise no interference in the matter of education with the new province. But we are in no such position. We are entering this discussion bound, if ever a parliament was bound, by a solemn compact entered into by both the great parties in Canada, without dissent, without dispute, without division, as far back as 1875, when there was no population in those territories worth speaking of. For 40 years, and more, I have been a member of the Canadian parliament. I was present in 1875, although I did not take part in the debate when this question was under discussion. My hon. friend beside me has truly stated—my hon. friend opposite has not denied the fact—that on that occasion, both the leaders of the great parties, so far as in them lay, and their followers, including, I think, my hon. friend himself, raised no objection whatever to those provisions in the Act of 1875, and they formally and solemnly guaranteed to the minorities the rights which we now propose to guarantee to them when these provinces are erected into separate provincial communities.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They had not provincial rights then ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Nor have they to-day. They have no provincial rights to-day. That is the fallacy which underlies most of the arguments advanced. to-day. They are spoken of as if they were independent provinces coming into confederation. They are not independent provinces. They are provinces of our creation, as I shall presently show, and the Dominion of Canada have a right to dictate to them, in law at any rate—I do not say it would be expedient to do so—and say on what terms we will admit them to a provincial status. I am myself a strong advocate of provincial rights as they are defined by the Confederation Act, but on this question of provincial rights, I have to say that it does not exist in this case at all at the present moment. I repeat that these provinces have no provincial rights until we create them, and I say there is no legal obligation on the Dominion to take that action. Does any hon. gentleman dispute that position ? If so, I should like to know on what grounds they pretend to do it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, the Minister of Justice did not, if the hon. gentleman will read his opinion, dispute that proposition, nor do I see that any human being can pretend that there is at this moment any province either of Alberta or Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are not in existence.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is none existing to-day, and there will be none existing until such time as the parliament of Canada passes and the Governor General of Canada gives the royal assent to the measures creating them. I repeat here, and I am prepared to repeat anywhere, before the strongest advocates of provincial rights in this Dominion, that it is an utter absurdity to allege that these new provinces stand on all fours with the older provinces of the Dominion. These older provinces had separate and independent existence before the confederation was formed. They could not have been compelled to enter into confederation—at least it would have been in an extreme degree inexpedient for the British government to have passed an Act forcing them into confederation against their will. We certainly would not have compelled them. But in the case of these new provinces, the very land of which they are composed was actually purchased with money belonging to the older provinces of Canada. They have been developed, and are being developed at huge and monstrous cost by the money of the older provinces of Canada. For my part I should like to ask this House, and I would like to ask my hon. friends from those provinces, whether they are of the opinion that the new provinces owe anything to older Canada. I have witnessed the birth and growth of the new provinces during a period of forty years, and I say here, and I challenge contradiction here or elsewhere, that never did older states sacrifice more for the benefit of younger states than the older states of Canada have during the last five and twenty years for the benefit of the younger provinces which they are now creating. I say that the history of North America, not to speak of other countries, has nothing like it to show. The history of the United States will show nothing in the slightest degree resembling such sacrifices made by the federal power for the benefit of new and distant provinces as we can point to during the last five and twenty years. From 1870 to 1896, it is a literal fact, demonstrable from our financial records, that one-third of the entire net income of the people of Canada was devoted to the task of providing for the wants of the new dependencies in the Northwest. We paid for their lands. We paid and are paying a very large sum to-day, for quieting the Indian title. We paid for constructing the road to make their country accessible. We paid heavily to preserve law and order all through the distant territories, and here let me say that two of the brightest features in Canadian history are these : that throughout the whole course of our confederation and before confederation itself, to the honour and credit of the governments of Canada be it said, whether they have been Liberal or Conservative, they have always dealt justly and fairly with the Indian possessors of the soil, and that under very difficult circumstances they have maintained law and order and enforced respect for life and property, from the Yukon to the farthest boundaries of the Pacific or Atlantic Ocean, as it never was enforced on the other side of the boundary line. Let us recall the facts, and I desire simply to recall the absolute facts of the case—if they grate a little on the ears of some of my hon. friends opposite, let them blame the facts and not me. Let us recall the facts ; let us remember how through all that dreary period from 1878 to 1896, while old Canada remained stagnant, while every third male inhabitant of Canada between the years of twenty and forty, as our records and the United States records will show, found a home in the United States, when the growth of our collective population was less than the growth of the oldest country in Europe, when our trade and commerce were practically standing still—during all that period older Canada was pouring out money like water for the benefit of her northwestern territories. It is a coincidence—I will not say the cause, for fear of hurting my hon. friend's feelings—it is a coincidence that all that has changed and changed remarkably since 1896. As I have dwelt a good deal on the sacrifices older Canada made for the Northwest, I have this now to say, that if all that is changed now, if for the last eight or nine years Canada has been advancing by leaps and bounds, if in the last seven years, as I had occasion to show in another place, the material progress of Canada is not only equal to but has surpassed that of any other civilized nation in the world ; if the growth of our population in a single year probably equals the growth of our population in ten former years—if an honest census had been taken—the predominant factor,—the causa causant, as I may say—of this progress lay in the unparalleled growth of our northwestern country. Without that it would have been utterly impossible for us to have made the showing we did; but while I grant that, I say also that the residents of the Northwest should not in their turn forget the sacrifices which Canada made on their behalf in the past. As I have said, it appears to me to be utterly absurd to pretend that the condition of these provinces that are to be, which do not exist to-day, can be placed on all fours with the position of the provinces which, having an independent existence, combined to enter into our present federation. Hon. gentlemen will mark that I am not discussing the expediency of restricting these new provinces. The question is of the legal right to impose terms. To my poor mind we have heard quite enough of provincial rights, and it would be just as well that we should pay some regard to the the rights of the Dominion too. I am perfectly willing for my part to raise and stand by the cry of Canada first, but I never have and I do not intend to raise the cry of Ontario first and Canada second, or Quebec first and Canada second, or Nova Scotia first and Canada second, or the Maritime provinces first and Canada second. This is all the more true and all the more fair because these provinces are at the present moment exceedingly well represented both on the floor of this House and on the floor of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I say they are well represented and therefore there is not the slightest fear of any material injury or injustice being done to them. It requires no prophet to predict that in all human probability before another decade has passed we shall have fifty members on the floor of parliament from the Northwest country between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains, and no leaders of parties would ever intentionally do any injustice to the men who are going to form so large a component part of the body to whom they will be responsible. In this connection I desire to say a word or two as to a certain injustice which, in my opinion, has been done during this contest, not so much perhaps in this Chamber as in other places, and in the press particularly. I am sorry to say that grave injustice to my mind has been done in the press of Ontario to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and to the province of Quebec. I should like to ask these gentlemen who are to-day condemning, as my hon. friend condemns, Sir Wilfrid Laurier for having acted in a manner diametrically opposed to his professions in 1896—I should like to ask him and to ask the country if they have wholly and entirely forgotten 1896 ? What would have happened to Canada had Quebec in 1896 chosen to throw her weight against Manitoba. Have any hon. gentlemen here, have any of those men who are raising these charges against Sir Wilfrid Laurier considered well what the result would have been had Quebec arrayed itself beside my hon. friend, and beside my hon. friend's colleagues—if I can call them colleagues—had Quebec arrayed itself on the side of my hon. friend and his allies or supporters, for the purpose of coercing Manitoba. I have seen two rebellions in the Northwest and I have no desire to see or take part in a third ; and I say that at that particular time had Quebec thrown its weight, as I have said, against Manitoba, the result in all human probability would have been that our confederation would have been rent asunder or at the best that the progress of the Northwest would have been retarded for many years ; and those great results to which I pointed so recently would have been in all probability utterly unattainable by us, at any rate without much greater sacrifice and much greater delay. I doubt exceedingly whether these hon. gentlemen who are to-day denouncing Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by consequence denouncing the province of Quebec, fully understood what passed in 1896. I say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party in 1896 took their political lives in their hands if any men ever did so ; and though it is true that when they appealed to the province of Quebec that province responded nobly to that appeal, and though the province of Quebec on that occasion rose superior to race and religious prejudice and refused to be made an instrument for the sake of political advancement or even for the sake of gratifying their own prejudices in coercing their sister province their risk was none the less. Canada owes a great debt to the Liberal party and a great debt to Quebec and to Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the action he took on that occasion. Let us be fair. After all what is it, if they allege, as some of these gentlemen do allege, that Quebec is making a demand upon us, what is it that Quebec demands ? What is it that Quebec proposes ? It proposes purely and simply this : that we guarantee to these people in the Northwest the simple privilege that I have mentioned that during one-half hour in each day those who so desire may, at their own proper cost and charges confer religious instruction upon a certain portion of the population. That is a good deal less than Catholic Quebec has guaranteed to the Protestant minority within its borders. It is less and a good deal less than Protestant Ontario has guaranteed to the Catholic minority within its borders.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—And I am free to admit that as far as I can judge it is considerably less than the actual legal obligation incurred by us in the Act that we passed in 1875.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I ask the House to be fair. I ask them to recognize that those obligations which we ask them to implement are obligations not of our making at the present moment, but they are obligations which were formally entered into by the parliament and people of Canada as far back as 1875 ; and I appeal to the Senate as the body which is by its constitution and by the position it holds, best qualified to pass upon this matter in a judicial and temperate way. I appeal to them to sustain the just, fair and reasonable terms now proposed to be made in this difficult question. While I am disposed to give every reasonable latitude to these provinces and desire to interfere with them as little as we possibly can ; while I repeat that all this argument about provincial rights falls to the ground from the simple fact that they are not provinces at all to-day, that they can only become provinces by the act of this parliament. I maintain that under those circumstances we are amply justified in imposing the very light and trifling restrictions which we propose to place upon them with respect to this particular question, which be it remembered are less than the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec have voluntarily submitted to from the moment they entered into confederation down to the present day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To-day the government presents for our consideration a most important measure. It comes to us fresh from the crucible of the House of Commons. It is the paramount measure of this session.

We have been told so without any circumlocution, and in presenting to the House of Commons this child of his predilection, proud of his handiwork, self-satisfied in the thought that the new provinces would owe to him their political existence, it was the Prime Minister who used these words: 'We are at the door of the 20th century. It is Canada's century. Such shall history style it. On the very threshold of this century, which shall be ours, I present this Act of legislation that will create two new provinces, and will give them their own autonomy.'

Alas ! the Bill which the Prime Minister introduced in the House of Commons, on the 21st February last, has failed to justify the promises made by its author. Mutilated by the hand of the Prime Minister himself, it is now no longer that apparently equitable measure that was to do full justice to the minority; henceforth it becomes a law, spoliatory in character, which strips and robs our fellow-countrymen and co-religionists of their rights.

Before the country and before history I here accuse the government of having deliberately, coldly, calculatingly given way and sacrificed the rights of the minority; given way before the menace of fanaticism, made sacrifice to an interest that had to be counted with.

No; the Bill that comes before us to-day, and that we are asked to accept, is not the one that, on the 21st February last made its triumphal appearance in the House of Commons and for which, with a speech that made a certan reverberation, the Prime Minister received from the large majority of the people's representatives both enthusiastic support and significant applause.

Deep piercing modifications and cruel mutilations have changed the nature and altered the purport of that Bill.

No longer is it the generous wine that strengthens, rather has it become the subtle poison that permeates the organism, that penetrates its every fibre and that kills it unmercifully.

The Bill presented to the House on the 21st February, by the Prime Minister, contained a vivifying principle.

The Bill that comes to us from the House of Commons, amended as it is by the Prime Minister himself, contains the germs of dissolution.

Might we not well apply here the line of the French poet:

'De tout Laurier, un poison est l'essence,' and paraphrase the same in the words of an English bard;

'Death lurks beneath the laurel wreath?'

In order to demonstrate the essential difference that exists between the Bill as it was presented for a first reading in the House of Commons and as it is to-day after having been altered by its own author, allow me to draw your attention to the educational clause, and to compare that clause 16 of the original Bill with the clause 17 of the Bill now before us.

That simple comparison will afford you the entire story of the humiliating retreat which the government has beaten and will set forth, in all its extent the disastrous sacrifice that we are asked to condone.

Firstly, we will take clause 17—16 as it appeared in the original Bill. It runs thus:—

16. The provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province as if, at the date upon which this Act comes into force, the territory comprised therein were already a province, the expression 'the Union' in the said section being taken to mean the said date.

2. Subject to the provisions of the said section 93, and in continuance of the principles heretofore sanctioned under the Northwest Territories Act, it is enacted that the legislature of the said province shall pass all necessary laws in respect of education, and that it shall therein always be provided (a) that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the said province or of any less portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name it is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessments and collection of rates therefor, and (b) that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor, and (c) that in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessment of such rates as they impose upon themselves with respect thereto.

3. In the appropriation of public moneys by the legislature in aid of education, and in the distribution of any moneys paid to the government of the said province arising from the school fund established by the Dominion Lands Act, there shall be no discrimination between the public schools and the separate schools, and such moneys shall be applied to the support of public and separate schools in equitable shares or proportion.

The better to grasp the true significance of this clause 16 of the original Bill, let me remark that the second subsection is merely the word-for-word reproduction of clause 11 of the Northwest Territories Act, 1875, as it is in force to-day and as we find it in chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, clause 14.

The federal law that to-day governs the Northwest Territories, is the supreme authority for the moment at least. So long as the Territories have not obtained their autonomy, the authority that defines the rights and obligations of those far-off religions, their real though temporary charter is the Northwest Territories Act, 1875; and concerning the matter of schools this is what that Act says:

The Lieutenant Governor in Council shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education, but it shall therein always be provided that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the Territories, or of any less portion of subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor; and also that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and in such case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

The Bill, as it was introduced, and the Act of 1875, which it reproduces, therefore accorded the Territories the right to legislate on matters educational, but with this very significant restriction, that all territorial legislation, in order to conform to the law should always ordain that in each school district:

1. The majority could establish therein whatever schools they think fit—neutral or denominational, English or French.

2. The minority, whether Catholic or Protestant, could establish therein separate schools, denominational or neutral, French or English.

3. The maintenance of the separate schools must be at the expense of the minority alone, which thenceforth, shall not be called upon to contribute to the support of the schools of the majority.

4. That the division of the public moneys voted by the legislature for the support of the schools, as well as the division of the moneys taken from the fund created by the sale of lands reserved for the purpose of education, must be equally and proportionately made between the schools for the majority and those of the minority.

The Bill, as introduced, consequently demanded that :

(a) The majority have schools according to choice.

(b) The minority have separate schools.

(c) And both have proportionate shares in the moneys intended for educational purposes.

Before going any further, I desire, in a special manner, to draw the attention of this House to the nature and extent of the rights created by the provisionary Northwest Territories Act, 1875, as to matters of education, and which the Bill, as introduced by the Prime Minister, intended to perpetuate.

The majority in each school district, according to that law of 1875, which still is in force and will so remain until repealed, has a right to demand whatever kind of schools it selects.

Let us suppose a school district the majority in which is Catholic and French—for there are districts of this category—such majority, according to the terms of the present law may select to have confessional and French schools, the schools they think fit, says the law.

In accordance with the provisions of the Northwest Territories Act and within the limitations defined for them, the Lieutenant Governor, in the first place, and the legislative assembly of the Territories afterwards, from time to time issued ordinances that gave to the majorities and minorities precisely the schools to which they were entitled.

As a sample of those constitutional ordinances established in good faith and in conformity with the law allow me to cite for you the ordinances of 1884 and 1885.

Passed on the 6th August, 1884, the ordinances No. 5, of 1884, created a council of public instruction composed of twelve members, of whom six were to be Catholics and six Protestants (clause 1.)

That council was divided into two sections—one Protestant the other Catholic—and the duty of each was :

1. To have under its control and direction the schools of its denomination and to pass any regulations that it might deem useful for the government and discipline of such schools as well as the enforcing of the provisions of the ordinances ;

2. To see to the examination and classification of the teachers, the granting of their licenses, the accepting of outside certificates and the annulling—for sufficient cause—of all licenses;

3. To select the books to be used in the schools ; all books concerning morals and religious instruction—in as far as the Catholic section was concerned—to be submitted for the approval of the competent religious authority ;

4. To approve of the plans submitted for the erection of school-houses;

5. To appoint inspectors who remain in office during the pleasure of the section that appointed them (clause 5.)

In no case could a Catholic be obliged to pay taxes for the support of Protestant schools (clause 131.)

All schools received their proportionate shares of the general fund of revenue in the Territories according to the average attendance of pupils in each school (clause 91).

By an amendment adopted the following year (clause 78 of ordinances No. 31, of 1885) separate schools were left perfectly free to have their own religious instruction.

Do you wish to be fully convinced of the scope of the rights accorded to the minority by the federal laws of 1875 and by those first territorial ordinances and what were their immediate and legitimate application ? Listen, then, to what the ex-Minister of the Interior, Hon. Mr. Sifton, declared in the House of Commons on the 24th March last. I quote verbatim :

What followed the passage of this law? There was established in the Northwest Territories a complete dual system of schools; a system of schools under which the denomination regulated the text-books and the conduct of the schools, and by which everything that appertained to the Roman Catholic schools was directly under the control of a Roman Catholic board of education. We had in the Northwest Territories at that time, under that Act, to all intents and purposes, what are generally known as church schools or clerically controlled schools. That was the system that was built up under this Act of 1875. It went on for some time. It was exactly the same system—I do not know as to the efficiency, for I am not familiar with that—but in principle it was the same system we had in Manitoba up to the year 1890, when it was abolished by the Public School Act of that year.

This testimony of the ex-Minister of the Interior is most conclusive. It is moreover corroborated by that of Mr. Forget, at present Lieutenant Governor of those Territories, and at that time a member of the Catholic Board of Public Instruction. Mr. Forget says :

Until the date of the ordinance of 1892 we had never been denied the right to administer our schools, to regulate the programme of studies, to choose the text-books, to control the religious instruction and to authorize the use of the French language whenever thought convenient. These rights were exercised by the Catholic section of the board of education, and strictly speaking they were sufficient to preserve to our schools their distinctive character of Catholic schools.

The law of 1875, which is still in force, gave consequently to the majority schools of its own choice and to the minority separate schools.

The first ordinances of the Northwest respected those rights of the majority and the minority, by keeping within the limits traced out by the law itself. And the separate schools that were then granted to the people of the Northwest were really separate schools in the full acceptation of the term.

What then, after all, is a separate school and wherefore does it exist ? Let the leader of the government speak. He it was who in introducing the Bill on the 21st February last, said :

Before I proceed further, before I pass the threshold of this question, I put at once this inquiry to the House: What are separate schools? What is the meaning of the term? Whence does it come, what was its origin and what was its object? Perhaps somebody will say: What is the use of discussing such a question ? The term separate schools ought to be familiar to every one. Sir, if any one were to make such an observation and to interpose such an objection, I would tell him that never was objection taken with less ground. Mankind is ever the same. New problems and new complications will always arise, but new problems and complications, when they do arise, always revolve within the same well beaten circle of man's passions, man's prejudices and man's selfishness. History therefore should be a safe guide, and it is generally by appealing to the past, by investigating the problems with which our fathers had to deal, that we may find the solutions of the complications that face us. If we look back to the history of our own country, if we find what is the origin of the separate schools, perhaps history may be the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night to show us the way and give us the light.

After relating in full the history of the separate schools in the olden days of the Upper and Lower Canadian legislature, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier thus continued :

I need not say that the Christian religion is not only a religion founded on moral laws, prescribing moral duties, but it is also a religion of dogmas. Dogmas from the earliest times have occupied just as strong and commanding a position in the faith of all Christians as morals themselves. The reformation created a cleavage between Christians. The old section remained Roman Catholics; the new called themselves Protestants. Between the Roman Catholics and Protestants there is a deep divergence of dogmas. Between the various Protestant denominations there are but small differences in dogmas; the differences are more matters of discipline than of dogma. Therefore, the old legislature of Canada, finding a population of Catholics and different denominations of Protestants all mixed together, finding only one cause of cleavage between them in Christian faith, that is dogmas, allowed religious teaching to be had in all the schools of our country, so that every man could give to his own child the religious tenets which he held sometimes dearer than life. That is the whole meaning of separate schools.

The hon. the Prime Minister was not the only one to define the separate school as it should be.

In a petition presented to the government in 1894, and signed by thirty-one archbishops and bishops of Canada, we read :

Catholics believe in the necessity of religious instruction in the schools. This conviction imposes upon them conscientious obligations, and these obligations give them rights of which they cannot be deprived. They cannot be satisfied by the saying: Others do not believe as you do, therefore you must change your convictions ; others are satisfied and even wish that their children should be brought up and educated in such a way, therefore, you Catholics you cannot stand aside, or if you do, do so at your own expense. Such an argument is neither fair nor just.

The undersigned, pastors of souls, are at one with their flocks in insisting on the rights they claim, and they are fully determined to preserve them in their integrity. There is in this a question of justice, of natural equity, of prudence and of social economy, closely connected with the fundamental interests of the country.

The Catholics being under the obligation of educating their children according to their faith and religous principles they profess, have, in our free country, the right of establishing their separate schools, and that right they must be allowed to exercise without being forced to the burden of double school taxes.

For his part, the immortal Leo XIII., that Sovereign Pontiff whose glorious reign hath shed such lustre upon the Catholic Church, when, one day, addressing in a special manner, the church in Canada, traced clearly—in his Encyclical Affari vos—the pathway to be followed, when with authoritative pronouncement, he defined the nature of the education that parents must, in conscience, procure for their children. Here is that doctrine conveyed in a manner that cannot be misunderstood :

Justice and reason then demand that the school shall supply our scholars not only with a scientific system of instruction but also a body of moral teaching which, as we have said, is in harmony with the principles of their religion, without which, far from being of use, education can be nothing but harmful. From this comes the necessity of having Catholic masters and reading books and text-books approved by the bishops, of being free to regulate the school in a manner which shall be in full accord with the profession of the Catholic faith as well as with all the duties which flow from it. Furthermore, it is the inherent right of a father's position to see in what institution his children shall be educated, and what masters shall teach them moral precepts. When, therefore, Catholics demand, as it is their duty to demand and work, that the teaching given by school masters shall be in harmony with the religion of their children, they are contending justly. And nothing could be more unjust than to compel them to choose an alternative, or to allow their children to grow up in ignorance or to throw them amid an environment which constitutes a manifest danger for the supreme interests of their souls. These principles of judgment and action which are based upon truth and justice, and which form the safeguards of public as well as private interests, it is unlawful to call in question or in any way to abandon. And so, when the new legislation came to strike Catholic education in the province of Manitoba, it was your duty, venerable brethren, publicly to protest against injustice and the blow that had been dealt; and the way in which you fulfilled this duty has furnished a striking proof of your individual vigilance and of your true episcopal zeal. Although upon this point each of you finds sufficient approbation in the witness of his own conscience, know nevertheless that we also join with it our assent and approval. For the things that you have sought and still seek to preserve and defend are most holy.

This extract from the Encyclical addressed by Leo XIII., directly to the Canadian hierarchy sheds a bright light upon the question that at present occupies our attention and brings out in grand relief the obligation imposed on the Catholic to control the teaching to be given in the school.

When the Manitoba school question was decided by the highest tribunal of the British empire in the upper judicial sphere in England this matter was perfectly well understood. Over there, far better than here did they comprehend what a Catholic school should be, when that court—composed entirely of Protestants—set forth, in the very differences between confessional and neutral schools, the true character of the Catholic separate school.

They understood it to be the intention of the legislatures, in granting separate schools to accord something tangible and appreciable to the minority.

Allow me to cite for you the following remarkable passage in the judgment rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the case of the Manitoba schools:

Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Act of 1890 ? Schools of their own denomination conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which the state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of the Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

And further on the judges of the Privy Council added the following important words, to which, hon. gentlemen, I cannot too strongly claim your attention, conclusive as they are in regard to the position I maintain :

As a matter of fact, the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890, is conscientious and deeply rooted. If this had not been so, if there had been a system of public education acceptable to Catholics and Protestants alike, the elaborate enactments which have been the subject of so much controversy and consideration would have been unnecessary. It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the education question prior to 1870. This is recognized and is emphasized in almost every line of those enactments. There is no doubt either what the points of differences were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

The quotation may be a little lengthy, but is it not conclusive ? It applies, if you will to the Manitoba question ; but a separate school is still a separate school, be it situated on the banks of the Red river or on the banks of the Saskatchewan.

And such separate school, be it where it may, must ever remain distinct from the common school by the character of its teaching, the selection of its books, and the distinctive authority that controls and directs it.

Such the opinion of the highest tribunal of the empire ; such the opinion of the leader of the government, such the opinion of the church to which every Catholic in the country adheres.

And now, is not the following question timely? Have the Catholics of this country in general and of the Northwest Territories in particular a right to denominational schools ?

Let the law and the treaties make reply,

The circumstances under which the present confederation took the place of the former union of Upper and Lower Canada and the special conditions that brought about its inception are all well known. The union of the two Canadas could no longer survive the countless differences that daily tore it and that made a successful administration of the affairs of these two old provinces thenceforth impossible. Necessity demanded the discovery of some other political system whereby each one of the provinces might be allowed to settle for itself, according to its own will and for its own immediate benefit those thousand and one questions of special interest, the solution of which, for over twenty years, had been left to an administration that repeated political crisises had weakened and spasmodic political convulsions were killing.

A confederation, with a federal parliament where great questions of general interest would be discussed, and with local legislatures wherein the more domestic problems of special interest to the different provinces would be regulated, was proposed. And that confederation was accepted.

The provinces that, then, decided to form part of that confederation only consented to become members thereof after protracted deliberations in which some of the most distinguished men of Upper and Lower Canadas, of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had taken part. It was they who discussed the project of confederation and who settled, by common agreement, the basis on which the new political structure was to be raised. We had a written agreement, sanctioned by England, and to which the imperial power gave a legal existence by means of an enactment—an enactment that we cannot touch, that is the ark of our liberty, wherein our most sacred interests have been deposited, safe from all attack, from the breath of hatred, the turmoil of racial and religious contentions, under the protecting folds of the British flag.

What, then, is this Canadian confederation and what is its grand characteristic ?

It is the assemblage of all the heterogeneous elements, of divers races, different creeds varied tastes, aspirations and tendencies ; who under one sky, from the fringes of the Atlantic to the mirror expanse of the Pacific, live beneath one flag, in a union of hearts and minds, and growing up with a common desire to raise their common country to the rank of a nation respected abroad and prosperous at home.

The Canadian confederation is a union of diversities, and those very diversities render still more admirable the union that blends them together.

But if that union of divers elements has constituted a confederation we may say, without giving umbrage, that their harmonizing will be the source of the country's greatness and prosperity .

It was in order to secure that harmony that, from the outset, the fathers of confederation established a division of powers between the federal parliament, on the one hand, and the provincial legislatures, on the other.

The British North America Act consecrates that division and enumerates the powers that belong to the federal parliament and those conferred on the legislatures.

There is also another principle which equally consecrates—and with like force—our constituting enactment.

It is the preservation to the minority—in each of the provinces—in matters educational—of all the privileges and of all the rights which that minority might have acquired before the entry of such province into the confederation. And it is in this way that the rights to denominational schools were for ever secured in the provinces where they were then found in existence.

The British North America Act says so:

93. In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:

(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

The question as to whether Catholics in general have a right to denominational schools is answered by our charter, the imperial enactment, in these words: 'Yes, at all events in the provinces where such schools exist according to law, at the time of their entry into the confederation.'

And this accords with the consecrated principle of the preservation of a right already acquired.

If we apply this general principle to the Territories that come into the confederation, without having had any prior provincial existence and without having had consequently any opportunity as provinces to legislate on educational matters, we are led infallibly to the same conclusion.

This is easy of demonstration.

The Territories are under the immediate control and government of the federal power.

The only laws that govern them are federal laws. The ordinances after all are merely regulations authorized by the federal law, repealable at will, annullable at any time.

Not being provinces, no provincial laws could they have, nor could the Territories acquire such rights as provinces create for themselves.

Yet those Territories are none the less subject to laws, and if those federal laws, the only laws possible in the case, give to a particular class of people, in these Territories, denominational schools, the same principle of the preservation of acquired rights which applies to provinces on their entry into the confederation, applies equally and with the same force to those same Territories when they, in turn, enter the confederation.

Now, as a matter of fact, the Northwest Territories are subject to that legislation of 1875, passed by this parliament and which, fully thirty years ago, accorded them separate and denominational schools.

That law has never been repealed.

It still exists, and in as far as concerns separate and denominational schools, it exists, just as it was passed in 1875, without ever having undergone any modification.

Therefore the Territories come into confederation with rights and privileges recognized and given by law.

The Catholics of the Northwest, therefore, as the Catholics in all provinces, wherein separate and denominational schools exist, have an inalienable right to their denominational and separate schools.

In no other sense can the British North America Act be interpreted.

It was so interpreted in 1875 by the late George Brown when he said (I quote from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech):

I repeat again that Mr. Brown, on the floor of the Senate, did not want this clause providing for separate schools to be introduced in the Act. He stated that it would be a mistake to introduce separate schools, he said that he was opposed to separate schools, but he said that if at any time separate schools were introduced they came under the Act of Union, and they were there for all time.

In 1891 the same conclusion was arrived at by Colonel O'Brien and the late Dalton McCarthy during the discussion that then took place in the House of Commons on a proposition to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Speaking of the separate schools, Colonel O'Brien said:

The subject, of course, is one that is comparatively new, for all our dealings with the Northwest Territories have been so far tentative, and experimental rather than absolute. We are now, however, going a step further. We are now giving to this assembly powers which it has not hitherto possessed; and there is one thing which may be taken for granted, that with the acquisition of the new powers given under this Act, the people of these territories will inquire why they should be restricted in this great and important particular. It is because I think such is the case, and because I do not wish on a future occasion, when this subject comes again before the House for further legislation, that those who think as I do on this system of education should be met with the objection that so many years ago this system was established by law and that, therefore, a vested right is created which the legislature should not now interfere with. Why, Sir, it would be almost fair to argue that this would come within the provisions of the British North America Act. If not in reality it would by analogy, because the British North America Act secured to the provinces which came into confederation whatever rights were enjoyed by the supporters of separate schools at the time of confederation, and if we create new provinces out of these territories it may be fairly argued that the analogy of the British North America Act will apply, and that in creating new provinces and bringing them into confederation there will be something like the same rights guaranteed to the provinces having separate schools before coming in under the British North America Act.

And last but not least, the present Minister of Justice after a most careful study of the whole subject and with the full knowledge of the grave responsibility assumed by him in giving a legal opinion on that question of the rights of the minority, did affirm to the House of Commons, in the most solemn way, on the 10th of May last, that in the absence of any special enactment on matters educational, clause 93 of the British North America Act would certainly apply automatically, and such application would bring in and protect all the rights and privileges set forth by the Northwest Territories Act.

Here are the words spoken by the Minister of Justice :

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It will be my duty, when the amendment is moved, to explain the differences which exist between the amended clause and clause 16 in the original Bill. In the meantime I might point out my views of the constitutional question because in my judgment this is to a very large extent a constitutional question and has to be considered from that standpoint. Section 2 would bring into effect section 93 of the British North America Act, if section 16 were not in this Bill at all. If section 16 were omitted, section 93 of the British North America Act would be applicable; but then we would meet this difficulty, a doubt arises as to whether section 93 can be considered as applicable to the Northwest Territories in view of the fact that in the first provision of that section the words used are 'the rights and privileges in force in the province at the union.' Technically while these Territories may have practically all the legislative powers of a province, they are not a province; now within the meaning of section 93 of the British North America Act, and it was to avoid the difficulty that I substituted in section 16 in the first paragraph the word 'territory' for 'province.' Then the other difficulty that would have arisen is what is meant by the words 'at the date of the union.' In my opinion there can be no doubt that the date of the union is the date at which the Territories came into the Dominion as a province and not the date at which these Indian territories were brought into the Dominion as territories. It was to make that point clear also that I amended the first clause in the way I did.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my hon friend regard section 16 as exercising upon section 2 the restrictive effect which hon. gentlemen on the other side have contended it does ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My argument now is that section 16, read in the light of these words in section 2, 'except in so far as varied by this Act'—is to be substituted for section 93; and section 93 is not applicable to the new province at all, because that section is varied by section 16.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understand that perfectly whether we agree with it or not. But assuming that there was no doubt about the effect of section 2, assuming that there was not that doubt which the hon. gentleman now explained, would it bring into effect the Act of 1875 ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It would bring into effect section 93 of the British North America Act which would include the Act of 1875.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is just it, I was taking the short line. Section 93 would have the effect of perpetuating the Act of 1875, in so far as it embodies what we call the restrictive principle. Does the hon. minister regard section 16 (which is substituted for section 2), in its amended form or in its original form as having the same effect ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In my judgment section 93 as amended would bring in all the rights and privileges which exists in favour of denominational schools in the Territories at the present time or at the 1st of July coming. Those rights and privileges would include all those rights which are covered by section 11 of the Act of 1875 and any subsequent legislation up to the present time, and, in my opinion—and I must say I have given this matter most careful consideration, and it is my settled opinion —it would cover all the privileges conferred by the Act of 1875, notwithstanding the provision of any ordinances that may have been passed by virtue of that Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Exactly my own view.

Before the present Minister of Justice, whose legal authority nobody can dispute, had given his opinion which I have just cited, another Minister of Justice, who has left the widest reputation of a first class jurist, the late Sir John Thompson, reporting one day on the character of the school ordinances of the Northwest legislature, said :

The ordinance respecting schools does not contain the provisions that the statute requires it to contain, but merely contains the provision that the minority may establish a separate school in an organized public school district, thus placing the minority at the mercy of the majority, and only giving the minority the right to establish a separate school, if the majority think proper to organize a public school. It is necessary to point out that the provisions of the Northwest Territories Act, before cited, cannot be abridged by the ordinance and must be considered as still in force, notwithstanding the restrictive terms of the ordinance. In so far as it is attempted by the ordinance to declare the meaning of the Northwest Territories Act, the ordinance fails of that purpose, and is objectionable as being an interpretation by an inferior legislative body of the Acts of its superior.

But this is not all.

There are sacred obligations that no country can ignore without compromising its honour.

We are to-day, face to face with one of those solemn engagements which, with a full comprehension of its circumstances, our country has contracted and which it cannot, without injury to its reputation, ignore.

After having purchased from the powerful Hudson's Bay Company the rights and privileges that the latter held in those vast regions known as Rupert's Land, and the Northwest Territories, when Canada wished to take possession of its new domain and exercise its authority over the same, an insurrection broke out and the people flew to arms.

But in this, let the one who was most intimately connected with those stirring events, and who was commissioned by the Crown to re-establish peace in that new land, speak.

An official document laid before the House of Commons on the 17th June, 1891 (No. 51 of the session of 1891), gives us the authentic story of the negotiations between the government of Canada and the delegates chosen by the people of the Northwest. In a letter written by Monseigneur Taché, and addressed to the Governor General, we read :

Previous to the transfer of the Northwest Territories to the Dominion of Canada, there prevailed a great uneasiness amongst the inhabitants of the said Territories, with regard to the consequences of the transfer. The Catholic population especially, mostly of French origin, thought they had reason to foresee grievances on account of their language and their religion, if there were no special guarantee given as to what they considered their rights and privileges. Their apprehensions gave rise to such an excitement that they resorted to arms ; not through a want of loyalty to the Crown, but only through mere distrust towards Canadian authorities, which were considered as trespassing in the country, previous to their acquisition of the same. Misguided men joined together to prevent the entry of the would-be Lieutenant Governor.

The news of such an outburst was received with surprise and regret both in England and Canada.

All this took place in the autumn of 1870.

I was in Rome at the time, and at the request of the Canadian authorities I left the Œcumenical Council to come and help in the pacification of the country. On my way home, I spent a few days in Ottawa. I had the honour of several interviews with Sir John Young, then Governor General, and with his ministers. I was repeatedly assured that the rights of the people of Red river would be fully guarded under the new regime ; that both imperial and federal authorities would never permit the newcomers in the country to encroach on the liberties of the old settlers; that on the banks of the Red river, as well as on the banks of the St. Lawrence, the people would be at liberty to use their mother tongue to practice their religion and have their children brought up according to their views.

On the day of my departure from Ottawa His Excellency handed me a letter, a copy of which I attach to this, appendix A, and in which are repeated some of the assurances given verbally. 'The people,' says the letter, 'may rely that respect and attention will be extended to the different religious persuasions.'

The Governor General, after mentioning the desire of Lord Granville 'to avail of my assistance from the outset,' gave me a telegram he had received from the Most Honourable the Secretary of the Colonies, which I attach to this as Appendix B, and in which His Lordship expressed the desire that the Governor General would take 'every care to explain where there is a misunderstanding, and to ascertain the wants and conciliate the good-will of all the settlers of the Red river.'

I was, moreover, furnished with a copy of the proclamation issued by His Excellency on the 6th of December, 1869, which I attach to this as Appendix C. In this proclamation we read: 'Her Majesty commands me to state to you that she will be always ready, through me as her representative, to redress all well-founded grievances, and any complaints that may be made, or desires that may be expressed to me as Governor General.

'By Her Majesty's authority I do therefore assure you that on your union with Canada, all your civil and religious rights and privileges will be respected.'

A delegation from Red river had been proposed as a good means of giving and receiving explanations conducive to the pacification of the country. The desirablity of this step was urged upon me as of the greatest importance, and the premier of Canada, in a letter I attach to this as Appendix D, wrote to me : 'In case a delegation is appointed to proceed to Ottawa, you can assure them that they will be kindly received and their suggestions fully considered. Their expenses coming here and returning and while staying in Ottawa will be defrayed by us.'

I left after having received the above mentioned instructions, and reached St. Boniface on March 9, 1870.

I communicated to the dissatisfied the assurances I had received, showing them the documents above cited. This largely contributed to dispel fears and to restore confidence. The delegation which had been delayed was definitely decided upon. The delegates appointed several weeks before, received their commission afresh. They proceeded to Ottawa, opened negotiations with the federal authorities, and with such result that on May 3, 1870, Sir John Young telegraphed to Lord Granville : Negotiations with delegates closed satisfactorily.

The negotiations provided that the denominational or separate schools would be guaranteed to the minority of the new province of Manitoba. The French language received such recognition that it was decided it would be used officially both in Parliament and in the courts of Manitoba.

The Manitoba Act was then passed by the House of Commons and Senate of Canada, and sanctioned by the Governor General.

I may add that since these pages were written, the highest judicial tribunal of England, in a celebrated judgment, recognized in that legislation the character of a solemn pledge when it said :

There is no doubt either what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

The interpretation given by the Privy Council to the Manitoba Act, does not merely apply to that province alone, for the good reason that the agreement (pacte) in question was not entered into with the inhabitants of Manitoba only—Manitoba did not exist when that agreement was made—but with all the inhabitants of Rupert's Land, and of the Northwest Territories. This is made clear and indisputable by the letters from the Governor General and the Prime Minister of Canada to Monsigneur Taché, of the 16th February, 1870, by the proclamation of the Governor General under date the 6th December previous, by the Bill of Rights and by the preamble of the Manitoba Act of 1870 (33 Vic., chap. 3.)

I feel that I have proven that in the Northwest, the minority has an undeniable right to separate schools, and that our co-religionists have a right to lay claim to the privilege of enjoying their denominational schools.

Does the measure now submitted to us recognize that right and respect those privileges ?

You have but to read the new educational clause, that which the government has substituted for the original one, and which imparts a totally different aspect to the present measure. It reads thus :

17. Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province, with the substitution for paragraph (1) of the said section 93, of the following paragraph:—

' (1.) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.'

(2.) In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with the said chapter 29 or any Act passed in amendment thereof, or in substitution therefor, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in the said chapter 29.

(3.) Where the expression ' by law ' is employed in subsection 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said chapters 29 and 30, and where the expression ' at the union,' is employed in the said subsection 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

The first clause 16, which is replaced by the present clause 17, reproduced the federal enactment of 1875, and took it as the basis of those rights and privileges that should be perpetuated for the benefit of the Catholics of the Northwest. The present clause breaks completely away from the federal law to cling to the school ordinances of 1901.

It is those ordinances that must determine the nature and the scope of the rights at present enjoyed by the Catholics in the Northwest Territories and the Bill which we are asked to pass preserves nothing more than what is accorded by the ordinances.

The question, therefore, to be solved, is this : What are the rights and privileges that the ordinances of 1901 recognize as belonging to our fellow-countrymen and co-religionists in the Northwest ?

Here is all they give the Catholics :

1st. Two out of the five members who constitute the Council of Public Instruction, which is a purely consulting board that can do absolutely nothing of itself and the sole functions of which are to advise the commissioner on certain subjects—an advice which the minister is in no way bound to follow (chap. 29, clause 8).

2nd. The right of the minority to apply to the system of so-called separate schools—which are not separate schools in reality—the school taxes imposed upon them and the exemption of the minority from taxation for the benefit of the schools of the majority (chap. 29, clause 41).

3rd. The right accorded the school commissioners to allow, if they think well, a primary instruction in French—after three o'clock in the afternoon, according to the regulations (chap. 29, clause 136).

4th. The right to impart religious instruction for half an hour, after class, from half-past three until four o'clock in the afternoon.

This is all that the ordinances of 1901 give. It is the crumbs that the stingy hand of an intolerant majority casts grudgingly to those whom it seeks to starve out. it is the miserable and humiliating pittance that the narrow-minded conquerors fling to an abandoned population. Once again force crushes right, and if we are the disgusted witnesses of the injustices that it engenders and the persecutions to which it gives birth, our sorrow and our shame are in no way lessened by the sad spectacle afforded us, in the very midst of people whom those incapable defenders of a cause they abuse, should protect, and in the midst of a parliament that should be the born guardian of the rights of minorities, by those scared and distracted men for whom the tranquil enjoyment of power constitutes their supreme rule of action.

On the one side they declare themselves satisfied with the present condition of affairs, and instead of raising indignant protests and proudly asserting their rights. they cringe in a criminal inactivity and, under I know not what false pretext, they refuse to defend the rights of their own people—national and religious rights—and to the astonishment of the true friends of liberty they ground arms and lay down their baggage in the enemy's camp. All of which is but black treason.

On the other hand, those whose mission it is and whose duty likewise to respect in parliament the solemn treaties entered into between the Dominion and the people of the Northwest, and to give the minority the full measure of its rights, having before their eyes the example of so cowardly a desertion, make answer to-day by pointing to those eleventh hour deserters who proclaim their inexplicable satisfaction and who now fight in the front ranks of their powerful phalanx.

And yet we all know that 'one swallow does not make a summer,' and that that lost and isolated voice which cries out to us in the desert, is not for us, French Canadians and Catholics, a voice calculated to rally the combatants of a noble cause. Satisfaction with humiliation is worth nothing to us, and we to-day raise our voices in protest both against the brigand law that is sought to be imposed on our brethren of that region and against those who are willing to accept a stone in place of the bread that is due them.

And truly it is only a stone that is offered our fellow-countrymen by the Bill that is now submitted for the approval of this House.

It is based on the ordinances of 1901.

We know what those ordinances give the minority, and under that heading the present Bill is one of spoliation, even as were the ordinances which it confirms.

The spoliation is still greater. The present Bill so amends the British North America Act as to restrict the rights, powers and privileges which that Act accords to a certain class of persons in all the other provinces of the Dominion.

That which is granted to that minority of all the provinces in general is refused in this case, to the minority of the two provinces which we are now organizing.

The demonstration of this will be brief but positive.

Clause 93 of the British North America Act reads thus :

93. In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—

(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union,

In virture of this clause, a province which comes into the confederation with an established system of denominational schools, recognized by its own laws, has the undeniable right to preserve that system and any enactment that might subsequently prejudice in any way whatsoever that right must be unconstitutional and worthless.

So much for the general law affecting the provinces.

Why then did the leader of the government deem it well, in this instance, to depart therefrom by imposing a totally different law upon the new provinces ? That exceptional enactment is by the new clause 17 proposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier formally consecrated. Here is the first paragraph of that new clause :

17. Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province, with the substitution for paragraph (1) of the said section 93, of the following paragraph:—

'(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right of privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.'

This amendment upsets the entire spirit of clause 93 of the British North America Act, when it substitutes in the first paragraph of the imperial enactment the words separate schools for the words denominational schools, restricting it thereby to those separate schools only that conform to the ordinances of 1901, a protection which heretofore guaranteed the existence of the denominational schools that the law recognized.

In order to understand the nature of this exceptional legislation which is sought to be imposed on the new provinces and to seize the full scope of the crying injustice which is to be perpetrated upon the Catholic and the French minority of the Northwest, we need but ask ourselves the meaning of a denominational school and that of a neutral school and then to make evident the vast difference that exists between the two.

In regard to the instruction given therein the denominational school exists when that instruction is impregnated with the religious spirit of the denominaton to which it belongs. Thus we have Catholic, Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian, &c., schools, according as the teaching therein is impregnated with a Catholic, Anglican, Methodist or Presbyterian spirit. If the instruction given in a school is entirely divorced from all religious influence, if that instruction can be indiscriminately given to all the pupils frequenting the school, be their differences of religious belief what it may, if that instruction, from its very nature, cannot grate upon any religious belief, that school is a neutral one, in contradiction to the denominational school.

And again, a very different thing is the separate school.

Its name tells what it is: A school detached from an already existing school, a school separated from the ordinary school of the district in which it is established ; it is the school of a minority that will not or cannot accept the instruction given to the majority.

The separate school is that which faces the public school.

It need not necessarily be a denominational school.

For example, in a school district where the Catholic majority has a Catholic public school, consequently a denominational one, the school of the Protestant minority becomes a separate school which might perfectly well be, and very likely would be, a neutral school.

This is a fact that none will dispute and which the school system of the province of Quebec, moreover, most clearly illustrates. For its part, the law confirms the doctrine that I propound when, in clause 93 of the British North America Act, it mentions the powers, rights and privileges of the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant subjects in the province of Quebec (paragraph 2), and the rights and privileges of the Protestant minority in every province in which a separate school system obtains (paragraph 3).

In fine, the Northwest ordinances of 1901, upon which rests the present proposed enactment, ordain—(clause 14)—that the minority, Protestant or Catholic, of the ratepayers of every district (clause 45) may establish therein a separate school that will be subject to all the obligations imposed on public schools.

It is, therefore, more than abundantly proven that a separate is not necessarily a denominational school, and that, in the Northwest Territories, such a school cannot even be a denominational school.

The iniquity of the amendment, moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to his own legislative drafting, is now apparent in all its ugliness to eyes that will not lose sight of the distinction which has just been established between the denominational and the separate school.

The constitution guarantees the preservation of denominational schools in all provinces wherein such schools have had already a legal existence at the time of the entry of any of them into the confederation.

In 1875, by a special enactment, the federal parliament granted denominational schools to the Northwest Territories.

In fact the law of 1875 gave to the majority in each school district the right to have whatever school it thought fit, consequently the right to denominational schools. Consequently this right given by law was safeguarded by paragraph 1 of clause 93 of the British North America Act, and the Catholic majority, wherever there was one in the school districts of the Northwest Territories, retained, guaranteed by the constitution itself, the privilege already obtained.

What does Sir Wilfrid Laurier do?

With a stroke of his pen he blots out from the British North America Act the words denominational schools and substitutes therefor the words separate schools.

By that one stroke the Catholics of the Northwest Territories, in the districts in which they are the majority, lose their right to denominational schools.

The minority alone, and only in the districts in which such minority exists, can henceforth have separate schools, but separate schools such as they are constituted by the ordinances of 1901, that is to say, separate schools from which religious instruction is banished.

This is what the Laurier-Sifton amendment gives to the Catholics of the Northwest.

That which our constitution guarantees in general terms to all the other provinces of the Dominion, Sir Wilfrid Laurier after a month of study and reflection, snatches violently from our charter and deliberately refuses it to the Catholics of the new provinces.

And Catholics are found who proclaim themselves satisfied with this guilty deed of spoliation and who, in dust and humiliation, ask that we join freely in the sacrifice of their rights and in the ignominious perpetration of their dark treason.

We have no part in it. We wish to defend our rights, despite the unqualified blindness of those who have eyes and who will not see. Despoiled of their right to denominational schools by the culpable substitution of the words separate schools for the words denominational schools in the British North America Act, the Catholics are reduced to only what the ordinances of 1901 can give them. So ordains the Laurier-Sifton amendment. And what do those despoiling ordinances give them? We will learn it from the very lips of those who claim to have made a serious study of the question.

Mr. Sifton referring to the enactment of 1875, the Northwest Territories Act, has already told us—and I cited his testimony in the first part of my speech—that the federal law had given a double system of education to the people of the Northwest and that the control of the Catholics over their schools had been freely exercised down to 1892.

Here is the declaration of the late Minister of the Interior:

> In the year 1892, what was known as the dual system was entirely swept away and that system which we have in the Northwest Territories, substantially as we have it at present, was established. I am not going to trouble the House with any lengthy quotations, but I desire to point out what was conceived by the people of the Northwest Territories connected with these schools, to be the effect of the legislation of 1892. . . . . .
> We have one normal school with uniform normal training for all teachers, and when I say all teachers, I mean teachers of all schools, separate and public; uniform curricula and grade; uniform text-books for all schools; uniform qualification of teachers for all schools; complete and absolute control of all schools as to their government and conduct, by the central school authority set up by the legislature under the ordinances; complete secularization of all schools between 9 o'clock in the morning and 3.30 in the afternoon, except that any school, if the trustees so desire, may be opened with the Lord's prayer; distribution of the legislative grant to all schools according to educational efficiency on principles set out in chapter 29.
> Then, where there is a public school, the minority, Protestant or Roman Catholic, may organize a separate school; but every separate school is subject absolutely to all the foregoing provisions, and is in every sense of the term a public school.
>
> If this legislation is carried into effect it preserves just the two privileges which I spoke of, the privilege of the Roman Catholic or Protestant minority to have a separate schoolhouse, and the privilege of having religious instruction between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon. But there cannot be under this system any control of the school by any clerical or sectarian body. There cannot be any sectarian teaching between nine o'clock in the morning and half-past three in the afternoon. So that, so far as we have objections to separate schools based upon the idea of church control, clerical control, or ecclestiasticism in any form, this system of schools is certainly not open to that objection.

Another minister of the Crown, Mr. Paterson, expresses himself in the following way on this subject of separate schools :

It must be borne in mind that those separate schools are formed precisely as every school district is formed. Although the name separate school appears to convey to the minds of some people the impression that they are separate in the sense in which they are established in some other province, there is no distinction between these schools and the other public schools as regards organization, or the qualification of teachers, or the text-books, or the right of state inspection, or in the reports they have to make. In every respect they are under the commissioner of education in absolutely the same manner as is every other public school in the Territories.

Precisely the same course of study that is followed in the public schools is to be followed in these schools; but when the hour of 3.30 p.m. arrives, if the trustees of the separate school desire, religious instruction may then be given to the youth therein. Is that a concession made particularly to our Roman Catholic brethren ? Why, the same clauses apply to every school, Protestant, public and every other. No special right, no special permission is given the separate schools which is withheld from the other.

Mr. Crawford, the member for Portage la Prairie, belongs to the Orange order. He is at the same time one of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's most devoted followers.

Let us open our ears to what he uttered on the 14th of April last :

Hon. members opposite have taken the position that there is no difference between the original school clauses of the Bill and the clauses as they now stand amended. I think there is a good deal of difference. The original clauses of the Bill were very indefinite. Under those clauses it was open to the people to have such school laws as they had in Manitoba, or they could have the old school laws that were in existence in the Territories previous to 1890. There was just that doubt about it, but the amended clauses make it more definite, the law can now be clearly understood, and there can be no question as to what law the people in the Northwest Territories will have in the future.

Now these school laws as they are in the Northwest Territories and as they are intended to be continued by this legislation are not at all the kind of school laws that the people particularly of Ontario have in their minds.

The idea which has taken hold of the minds of the people of Ontario is an exaggerated one. They have the idea that it is the intention of the government to establish in the Northwest Territories schools of the character that we had in the province of Manitoba before 1890; that is to say, schools entirely under the control of the church.

The idea that the people of Ontario have to-day is that it is the government's intention to establish Roman Catholic church-controlled schools entirely free and independent of the state. That is the idea that the people of Ontario have in their minds, but the fact is that the conditions which have been reported to them do not really exist. It is hardly necessary for me to repeat what this school law really is. If this Bill goes through it will establish not what I claim are separate schools. In fact, the name 'separate' should hardly have been used in connection with them. We propose to continue in the Northwest Territories what they have already got—Catholic public schools and Protestant public schools, no matter whether they are Catholic or Protestant, which are public schools and which are free to all classes of children, having the same text-books, the same qualified teachers, under the same control, and that control entirely in the hands of the government, and not in any way connected with the church. I feel as strongly on this question, I think, as any person in Canada at the present time. I think that possibly my Orange feelings or proclivities are just as strong as those of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). And if there was anything in the nature of a prejudice in connection with it, I should have it, being an Orangeman. If I thought there was being established in the Northwest Territories what the people of Ontario have in their minds to-day, that is Roman Catholic church controlled schools, I would oppose it as strenuously as any one. I would not stand it for a mintue. But we have nothing of that kind. The very opposite is the condition.

The Hon. Mr. Fielding is no less explicit, when he says :

What is this law which we are going to confirm and to continue in the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan ? We are told that this provides for a system of separate schools. Well, a system of separate schools may mean one thing in one quarter and another thing in another quarter. Whatever may be said as respects other countries, or other provinces, it would be utterly mistaken to say that we are giving to the Northwest provinces separate schools in that sense of the word. I submit to this House that the system of schools which we have to-day in the Northwest Territories is a national school system, and if it has all the elements of a national school system then I say there is no principle involved in this discussion which would justify us in having a quarrel over it. What is this system ? The system of schools which prevails to-day in the Northwest Territories exists by virtue of chapters 29, 30 and 31 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories. So far as the principle of separate schools is concerned, of course that principle was to be found in the Act of 1875 and the ordinances adapted themselves to it. But if you read these three ordinances of the Northwest Territories you will rise from the perusal of them with the conviction that in that country they have a system of national schools which may well challenge the admiration of the people in other portions of this country. What then are the essential elements of national schools ? I take it for granted that if you have a school which is established by the public authorities, if the management of the school derives all its authority and privileges from a regulation of the government of the state, if you have a system of schools under which the proper authorities of the state, or the province, or territory as the case may be, themselves specify the school books, establish the course of study, provide for the inspection of the schools and for the distribution of the money, if you have all those elements, then, I say you have a system of state-created, state-managed and state-supported public schools. Every one of these conditions exists to-day in the public school system of the Northwest Territories.

From the hour at which these schools open in the morning up to half-past three in the afternoon they are absolutely alike; there is no difference; the teachers have the same duties, the same qualifications; the same examinations, the same course of study, the same books are prescribed by the government, the regulations are made by the government. I repeat that from the hour of opening in the morning up to half-past three in the afternoon there is no shade of difference in all these schools in the North-west Territories.

But why seek elsewhere, either amongst his ministers or amongst his partisans, that which Sir Wilfrid Laurier, himself, explained in such clear terms in the now historic letter which the leader of the government gave to the public and in which he said to one of his friends who had consulted him on the subject :—

The impression prevails that separate schools such as they are intended by the Bill will be ecclesiastical schools. This is quite an error. What you call separate schools in this instance is practically national schools. Here is the law of the Northwest Territories at the present moment: All the teachers have to pass an examination and be certified by the Board of Public Instruction; all the schools have to be examined by inspectors appointed by the Board of Public Instruction ; all books in use at the schools have to be approved by the Board of Public Instruction; all secular matters are under the control of the Board of Public Instruction, all tuition has to be given in the English language ; at 3.30 children can be given religious instructions according to rules made by the trustees of the schools, but attendance at this is not even compulsory.

Do you find fault with this last clause? Do you not believe that what you call 'separate schools' in this instance is really 'national schools'?

The great objection to separate schools is that it would divide our people, but if the same education is given in what is called 'separate schools,' as in all other schools, I fail to see what objection there is to such a system.

The Minister of Justice, two months after the creation of the famous Laurier-Sifton amendment, when requested by the House to make known its tenor and define its meaning, gave in writing, on the 15th May, last, in an official document which is destined to live, his opinion, as the legal adviser of the Crown, and as such settled the true interpretation of clause 16 as amended. He said :—

The effect of section 16 of the Autonomy Bill would be no greater than the effect of the introduction of section 93 of the British North America Act by section 2 of the Territorial Bill, and clause 16 was only deemed necessary to remove doubt which had been expressed as to the meaning of the words 'province' and 'at the union,' and to secure to the schools, whether public or separate, of the minority, the government aid which in practice they have always received, and which is necessary to place those schools 'in a position to play their necessary part in the scheme of national education.'

Section 16, as originally drafted, was intended to confirm the minority in the rights they now enjoy and makes:

First. Section 93 of the British North America Act applicable to the new province as if it were a regularly organized province coming into the union at the date of the passing of this Act;

Second. Re-enacts section 11 of the Northwest Territories Act of 1875;

Third. Makes provision for the continuation of the schools of the minority of the grant now made in aid of education by or through the territorial government.

The effect of the section which it is proposed to substitute for the original section 16 is to limit the rights and privileges of the minority to those secured to them by chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances, to the exclusion of the rights and privileges guaranteed either by section 11 of the Northwest Territories Act, 1875, or any other legislation in force in the territories with regard to any class of schools.

The differences in the rights and privileges under section 11 of the Northwest Territories Act, 1875, and those under the ordinances, chapters 29 and 30, are as follows:

1. Section 11, Act 1875, empowering the 'majority of the ratepayers of any . . . . portion of the Northwest Territories . . . to establish such schools therein as they may think fit, and the minority of the ratepayers in any . . . portion of the Territories to establish 'Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools.'

The meaning of this section was expressed in the earlier school ordinances.

Under the present ordinances, chapters 29 and 30, the public schools are the schools of all the ratepayers; so that under the present ordinances only three classes of schools are authorized, viz.:—

(a) Public (undenominational) schools ;

(b) Protestant separate;

(c) Roman Catholic separate;

And a separate school district can be established only in an existing public school district.

2. Under the ordinances no rights or privileges exist with respect to separate schools as contrasted with public schools, except the initial right of effecting the separation, which right carries with it resulting advantages hereinafter set out in detail.

Under the regulations there is one difference only:

'Authorized text-books, standards 1—iv, approved, August, 1903; the Dominion (Catholic) Readers, first (part 1, part 2) and second. These are optional for Roman Catholic separate schools.'

The rights and privileges which result from the right of effecting the separation, and which the proposed substituted clause 16 preserves to the minority, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, in a public school district, appear to be these:—

(1) Right of separation—by the ordinance—common to Protestants and Roman Catholics alike;

(2) Half-hour religious instruction—by ordinance—to Protestants and Roman Catholics alike; common to public and separate schools;

(3) First and second Catholic readers—by regulation.

(4) Right to elect trustees, who choose the teacher—by ordinance; common to all schools.

The testimony given by all the ministers whose opinions I have just cited, the explanations furnished by the Minister of Justice, after his careful study of the question, are confirmed, beyond all possible dispute, by the decisive avowal of the premier himself, who, on the 8th June last, admitted that his legislation, that which is now before us, sacrifices the rights of the minority.

Here is this most important admission :

Now, we are asked, what is the difference between clause 16, No. 1, and clause 16, No. 2 ? The difference is simply this, that in clause 16, No. 1, the law of 1875 was enacted, giving to the minority—I suppose the Roman Catholic minority—the control over secular education as well as the control over religious education whereas the new clause brings into force the existing law of the territories, the ordinance of 1901, by which the state has absolute control over the secular part of education, and the people have control simply of the religious part of education from half-past three in the afternoon. This is the absolute difference which exists between the old clause and the new clause. I have for my part agreed to the new clause. 16, and in so doing I know that I have restricted my fellow-religionists in regard to some of the rights which they think they have at this moment. I shall explain in due time why I agreed to do so.

This strange declaration of the Prime Minister, this painful admission that he had to knowingly sacrifice a part of the rights of his co-religionists, naturally provoked a lively discussion and set forth the desire to know why it was he consented to thus coldly immolate, with such premeditation, those sacred rights which his position of Prime Minister, which his title of Catholic and French Canadian, made it his imperative duty to defend.

The reply was discouraging.

He gave it during that same sitting of the 8th June last. He repeated it a few days later, on the 28th of the same month.

On the 8th June, he said :

The position of the government is this: that the minority claim that under the Act of 1875 they had the right to select their own textbooks. They claim also, as the correspondence of record will show, that they have a right to separate school boards. They have that or they have not, and in order to make it absolutely sure, we have abandoned that clause and taken the other.

That is to say, in order to dispel all doubt, the Prime Minister declares by enactment that the claims of the minority are henceforth things of the past

It is clear, but singularly cruel !

Instead of leaving to the judicial authorities the duty of interpreting the law, the Prime Minister, playing the part of an autocrat, decrees that to make things clear, the federal law must be set aside and be replaced by the ordinances of 1901, which make hash of the rights of his fellow-countrymen.

In fact it was the Prime Minister who used the following language :—

We should not legislate here in order to convey to men the impression that they are given bread when they are given a stone. If the minority for the last fourteen years have thought that they had been deprived of their right, but in order to have peace and harmony they abandoned that right and agreed to live under a system which has given satisfaction to everybody, it is, I think, a good reason why we should have no equivocation about it; why we should know where we are, and legislate accordingly.

Again, it was the Prime Minister, who, on the 28th June last, gave by way of explanation of his back-down, the following reasons which it is my duty to bring to your notice and that of the entire country.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I rise to a point of order. I think it is a well settled rule that no allusion can be made to the debates in the other House, and I am surprised to hear my hon. friend, who is such a stickler for the rules, reading page after page from the Commons 'Hansard.' Mr. Bourinot says :

It is a part of an unwritten law of parliament that no allusion should be made in one House to the debates of the other chamber, a rule always enforced by the Speaker with the utmost strictness.'

It seems to me the hon. gentleman is not in order. If no allusion can be made to the discussion in 'Hansard,' then the hon. gentleman cannot read these extracts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman took his objection too late. I have finished with the quotations.

Mr. SPEAKER—I would not be ready to give a decision at the present moment, because another part of the paragraph states that it is perfectly regular to refer to the printed records of the other chamber. It would seem to me that this means the record and not the debate, but for the information of the House, I will look up the question. The hon. gentleman says he has finished with the extract and it will not be necessary for me to render a decision just now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have just one or two quotations to add and I suppose the hon. gentleman would allow me to read them, as they will not be long. My hon. friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier said on the 28th June last :

My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) a moment ago put to me one or two questions to which he wanted an immediate reply. I said at that moment I did not choose to reply. I am sure my hon. friend and the House generally will agree that when a question is put to an hon. member it is for him to select the manner in which he will answer.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I thought the moment was not convenient for me to give an answer because I could not give such an answer as my hon. friend wanted to have, simply yes or no. The question was asked: Why do you not apply the provisions of section 93 at once without anything more?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If you intend to adhere exactly to the constitution.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very well; if you intend to adhere exactly to the constitution. I said we wanted to adhere exactly to the constitution, and the reason why I did not think it would be advisable at this moment to apply section 93, without any qualification, simply to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend which he has just put in the hands of the chairman, and which is as follows:

'The provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said provinces in so far as the same are applicable under the terms thereof.'

Was, Sir, because that is absolutely meaningless because you do not mean anything, that there is nothing certain as to what is really the law under such circumstances. You do not know what kind of school system you would have in the Territories if you were to apply that. I call the attention of my hon. friend and the House to this fact that the law of 1875 put in certain prescriptions which were binding on the legislative powers. These prescriptions were that the minority or the majority in any school district would have the power to establish such a school system as they thought fit. Now, Sir, let me call the attention of the House to this, that no less an authority than Sir John Thompson gave his opinion and put it on record that one part of the law passed by the Northwest Territories, the part regarding the organization of school districts, was ultra vires and had no existence in law. Let me again quote Sir John Thompson:

'The ordinance respecting schools does not contain the provisions that the statute requires it to contain, but merely contains the provision that the minority may establish a separate school in an organized public school district, thus placing the minority at the mercy of the majority, and only giving the minority the right to establish a separate school, if the majority think proper to organize a public school. It is necessary to point out that the provisions of the Northwest Territories Act, before cited, cannot be abridged by the ordinance and must be considered as still in force, notwithstanding the restrictive terms of the ordinance. In so far as it is attempted by the ordinance to declare the meaning of the Northwest Territories Act, the ordinance fails of that purpose, and is objectionable, as being an interpretation by an inferior legislative body of the Acts of its superior.

'The undersigned only refrains from recommending the disallowance of this ordinance, in consequence of its being merely a re-enactment of an earlier ordinance, which disallowance would not affect, and which was allowed to go into operation, probably because attention was not called to this provision. The undersigned has the honour to recommend that the ordinance bringing these revised ordinances into effect, be allowed to go into operation.'

Here you have the opinion of Sir John Thompson that a part of the law which was passed in 1888 with regard to the organization of school districts and which is still the law in force in the Territories was unconstitutional, was ultra vires, was null. He did not recommend the disallowance of it, and it was not disallowed; but it was null at that time, it remains null to this day. Therefore what would be the law to-day? If you say that section 93 of the British North America Act should apply, to what would it apply? To the law as it was in the Act of 1875? This is a serious question and it is a question we ought to settle. We do not want it left unsettled to be a bone of contention, with all that that implies. My hon. friend's amendment would settle nothing at all, but would simply throw a bone of contention into these new provinces. My hon. friend says, let the British North America Act apply, whatever it may be. When he is asked what that Act means, he says that it is for the courts to determine. Is that satisfactory ? Is that the manner in which we should legislate? Is that the way to build up this country? Sir, it is not the way. The only way is to find what the law is at the present time, and then apply it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I ask my hon. friend what tribunal will determine what his amendment means?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The courts must of course determine what our legislation means; but as was said by the hon. Minister of Justice, we want to do all we can to prevent litigation, not do all we can to facilitate litigation.

Just previous to this declaration of the Prime Minister, his Minister of Justice had made one of his own and a most important one indeed.

Here it stands :

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. McCarthy and George Brown both contended that as a result of the passing of this legislation by this parliament, that is to say of the Act of 1875, with respect to schools, if that legislation was allowed to continue in force until the present moment had arrived, that is until the time came to give provincial autonomy, the result would be that we would be obliged to continue on that system that would create rights and privileges which might have to be accepted:

That was the opinion of Brown and McCarthy and of a greater lawyer than either, Sir John Thompson.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it your opinion?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is my opinion.

The conclusion arrived at by the Prime Minister consecrates the monstrous doctrine that to frustrate the hopes of our co-religionists of the Northwest and to raise against their legitimate aspirations the insurmountable barrier of a legislation without appeal, it becomes necessary to manipulate the British North America Act by introducing therein new clauses and special provisions that bring within the constitutional domain ordinances that were not constitutional and which close for a persecuted minority all access to the courts of the country.

Was there ever anything heard of more discouraging, more cynically unjust?

The Prime Minister with his minister of Justice admits that a part of the ordinances of 1901 is unconstitutional, ultra vires, and null.

He equally admits that the law of 1875 is still in force.

And in the fear that the automatic application of the British North America Act might give our co-religionists the schools assumed to them by the legislation of 1875, he so amends the British North America Act as to ignore completely both the law of the land and the rights of the minority, and substitutes for that law of 1875 the robber ordinances of 1901.

All this, he says—he has the sad courage to say so—to prevent all possible revendication on the part of the cheated minority.

Catholics and Frenchmen of the Northwest, you pay dearly for the honour of having a French-Canadian Premier. You pay dearly to furnish Sir Wilfrid Laurier with the simple pretext of keeping out of his cabinet that minister of ill-repute who cannot even return thereto, although his leader has ostensibly given way to Mr. Sifton on all points and that he has thus facilitated his return to the crib.

A majority of the House of Commons can cloak with his vote this scandalous immolation of the rights of a weak and abandoned minority, abandoned on all sides, and by those who have the holy mission of defending it against the encroachments of every error, and by those whose political positions oblige them to fight in front ranks; but when history will be written, it will denounce in bitter terms those guilty compromisers, those criminal deserters, that disastrous non-intervention which consecrated the robbery of most sacred rights and the violation of a sworn faith; to whatever party they may belong, and whatever social rank they may hold, they who shall have perpetrated or allowed to be perpetrated the iniquity will carry, in the eyes of their fellow-countrymen and before the entire country, the responsibility of a course that nothing can justify.

To us, hon. gentlemen, belong another mission and other duties.

Guardians of the constitution, protectors of the minority and of their most sacred rights, our mission is to respect the constitution and to protect the rights of the minority. In this House where the claims of political parties have no place, whence the cares of office are entirely banished, but where sentiments of impartial justice should hold sway, as well as respect for obligations and for good faith, faithful to the noble traditions that are the ornaments of this assembly, let us silence the discordant cries of the different races and creeds heard in the more noisy arena of active politics, and if this Bill is read for a second time and committed to a committee of the whole, let us calmly correct, as is our duty, the imperfections of the enactment now submitted to us, and let it come forth from our hands purified and improved to become a law of justice and peace restoring, giving to the Catholic or Protestant minority the fullness of its rights and to the country as a whole that peace and tranquillity so necessary to its progress and future greatness.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 69) an Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta—Hon. Mr. David.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I think I must commence my speech by congratulating the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) on the well prepared speech which he delivered yesterday. I must especially congratulate him on the fine citations which he made. In view of the dryness of his speech at certain times the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which he cited so properly had the effect of a refreshing breeze, and I am sure that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was entitled to a good share of the applause with which the speech of the hon. gentleman was greeted. In the remarks which I had the honour to address to this House in the beginning of the session, I expressed the opinion that our constitution contained elements of friction and contradiction, and that our statesmen required a great deal of wisdom to avoid serious conflicts. I also expressed the opinion that the winds which came from the Northwest were violent, and that they were the messengers of dangerous storms at certain times, especially in view of the fact that they were obliged to pass through or over Ontario. They would be less dangerous if they were coming directly to the province of Quebec. On the introduction into parliament of the Bill creating the Territories of the Northwest into provinces, the country has been struck by a wave of national and religious excitement and the wonder is that there is any longer any inclination to deal temperately and wisely with any question of religious or national feeling. It seems that this measure is charged with dynamite, and threatens to explode. It is very easy to understand that, national feelings being the principal motive power of the world politically, men are sometimes inclined to make use of them through interest, partisanship, or excess of zeal.

I am glad to say there have always been, and I know there always will be, wise men who are able to reconcile their national and religious feelings and their peculiar views with the principles of justice, fair play and tolerance; and I am happy to say that such men are numerous. There are many of them in this House especially. Those men understand that in a country like ours they must take into consideration the views and feelings of other people, and respect their national and religious feelings. Such men recognize that if they had been born and brought up under the same circumstances and conditions, in the midst of the same surroundings, they would think and feel in the same way as their neighbours do. They are consequently prepared to allow their fellow-citizens to retain their religious and national traditions. In times of excitement like those through which we have been passing, the duty rests upon those men of speaking the language of reason, of quieting public opinion, of stilling the waves of the political sea. Their only aim and object in all the questions which arise under our system of government is to see where truth and justice are to be found, and then act in accordance with justice and fair play. I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill which is now before this House is based upon principles of justice, toleration, and fair play, and upon the general interests of the country. No doubt it is not perfect ; it cannot meet the views of everybody. There are in the Bill certain defects, but taken as a whole I think the Bill is a good one which renders justice to those to whom justice is due. I have no intention of going into all the details of the measure; it is sufficient to deal with its general provisions. From all the Acts which have been cited in the newspapers and in this House, from the Federal Act of 1867, from the Act of 1875, from the declarations which have been made at certain times, from the interpretations which have been given to these Acts by all our leading statesmen; whether Conservative or Liberal, I have come to the conclusion that the aim of those great statesmen was to give to all the provinces a system of schools, based on the acquired rights of the minority, whether Catholic or Protestant, with a patriotic wish to give satisfaction to all creeds and nationalities. I have no doubt that the provisions of section 93 of the Federal Act and the Act of 1875, apply to the schools of the Northwest, but even supposing that there was a doubt on that point, I think the majority of this country should be tolerant and generous and make what concessions it can without going contrary to its conscience and principles. It is different with the Catholics; for them it is not only a question of principle but it is a question of duty towards God and towards their children. It is a question of conscience. Is there anything more sacred than the conscience of a man or a nation? You may remember the commotion which was produced in the old world when the great Newman in his discussion with Gladstone, and Cardinal Manning exclaimed, in connection with the relations of church and state: 'Conscience above all.' At first sight it seems that it should be possible to have our children, Catholic and Protestant, brought up in the same schools and receiving the same education. At one time I was pretty nearly of the opinion of many of our English countrymen, but I have modified my views. I thought it was possible to give all children an education which would put them on the same footing and prepare them to succeed in the different careers of this world. I was inclined to say that after all we worship the same God and the same Christ, that we cherish the same doctrines and the same Christian principles. But there are essential differences which you must take into consideration. If I speak frankly, I hope you will forgive me, but Catholics believe that the Catholic church alone has received the mission of interpreting the teachings of Christ; and one principle of the church is that Catholic children must be educated in schools where they receive a religious education in order to make them good Christians and good citizens. Naturally these are not the views of the majority of Protestants, but you must admit that they are none the less to be respected. There was a time when people who were divided in religion were necessarily bitter enemies. There was a time when Catholics and Protestants burned one another in the name of the religion of love and charity, but those dark days have passed away I hope for ever. The fires of the funeral pyre are extinguished for ever, I hope. Blood does not flow any more on the altars of the true God. Protestants and Catholics have learned to respect each other mutually, to love each other and to work together for the common interest of the country in which they are called to live.

We have a notable example every day of that religious fraternity. The president of our chamber each day addresses to God the prayer which was brought to us by Christ himself, and in which we ask Him to forgive our sins as we forgive those who sin against us. If we are to be good Christians and bound to forgive every insult and injury, I think the Catholics of this country have a right to be forgiven for holding a special religious and national feeling, for believing that they must follow the teachings of their churches, and for claiming the right which they possess in virtue of the constitution and in virtue of the laws of the country. I will not go over the whole Bill, but will consider two of the reasons which have been urged against the Bill. Firstly, the question of Autonomy. Having always been, as hon. gentlemen know, a very strong advocate of provincial rights, I admit that if it were shown that the Bill interferes with the rights of the provinces, I should be inclined to give a good deal of consideration to the arguments of the adversaries of the Bill on that question of autonomy. I am one of those who believe that we must protect provincial rights, and that those who represent the province of Quebec especially must take a very strong position on that question in favour of provincial rights. But in what way is provincial autonomy affected by this Bill? The only object of the Bill is to confirm to the new provinces exactly what has been done by the council of the Northwest and by the legislature in accordance with the laws and with the constitution. Let me frankly make an admission which perhaps will be turned against me, but which I am ready to make nevertheless. It is that if any persons have a right to complain of the Bill it is not the Protestants. It is the Catholics.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am ready to admit that they do not get the very thing which they would be entitled to get in virtue of the constitution and of the Act of 1875. But whose fault was it? There were ordinances passed by the council of the Northwest which were not disallowed as they should have been, because that was the only way to prevent the evil which they might produce and which they have produced. Those resolutions and ordinances, not having been abrogated, are still in force ; and the government was bound to consider them as forming part of the whole system of schools which existed at the time of the organization of the new provinces.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Were they constitutional ?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That is another question. Perhaps they were not ; but they have been treated as if they were constitutional. The Conservative government, which the hon. gentleman supported for so many years, refused to disallow those ordinances. They have not been tested before the courts, and consequently they are in force and you could not now abolish those ordinances without interfering with the question of provincial rights.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If they were unconstitutional they do not require to be disallowed.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It was the only means which was at the disposal of the government. The time has passed now, but it was the only means to do away with those ordinances. I will recall to the hon. gentleman who says they were unconstitutional——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They were unconstitutional.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Sir John Thompson did not give that reason for refusing to disallow them. That was not the reason given by him at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He did not disallow them because they were not a provincial law.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That is a fine distinction. I do not want to enter into all the details of the question and to take into consideration all the subtle distinctions which can be drawn. For the last six months those subtle distinctions have been made, and nobody knows where they are any more than they did before. Let us consider the question broadly and drop those subtleties. If I discussed the matter for six hours, I would not convince the hon. gentleman from Stadacona and the hon. gentleman would not know any more about those subtle distinctions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I admit he would not know more.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I did not catch the last remark made by the hon. gentleman, but it must be good, like everything else he has said. Take the question of general interests. It is said those Bills are against the general interests of the country. I will make another admission for the moment. If it were demonstrated that the education which has been given, and which is given now, in separate schools, in schools which are under the control of our bishops and priests ; if it were demonstrated that the education given there to our children is contrary to the laws and to the constitution, to the principles of religion and morals, and that the children are taught disloyal doctrines, that they are taught to be disloyal to the constitution and to the king, and to despise religion, I should be inclined to say : 'The argument is strong,' and I think I should be on the side of those who employed the argument ; but who is the man who is able to make that assertion ? I will say that the contrary is true, and that our bishops and priests have been blamed very often for being extreme in their teaching of loyalty, in their feelings of loyalty ; and I am ready to admit that I blamed them very strongly for having been, in 1837, on the side of the government, for having been extreme in arraying themselves against their countrymen fighting for political liberty. They have been blamed very often for having, in the first years of the last century in the great wars which took place between England and France, been too sympathetic towards England, for having sung Te Deums in the Catholic churches on the occasion of British victories, and for having contributed toward a monument to Lord Admiral Nelson to commemorate the great victory of Trafalgar. They were also blamed for having allowed themselves to be charmed by the Conservative party, and for having assisted our Orange fellow-countrymen to establish confederation. No ; the teaching of disloyal doctrine and pernicious theories will never come from those schools, and I think the time is near when all those who govern the different countries of this world will appreciate the teaching which is given in our religious schools. Socialists, anarchists and all those people, who threaten to cover the world with blood and ruin, will not emanate from those schools. They will come from the clubs where the teachings of Christ are replaced by the doctrines of demagogues. Religion will become more and more necessary for the government of this world. Especially, I say, it is essential when men are young that the principles of religion, of morality, should be infused into their souls. I am inclined to believe in the teaching of Protestant religion in Protestant schools, and in the teaching of Catholicism in Catholic schools. I think that the teaching of Christian principles and doctrines will give to the children of this country the strength which they require to struggle against pernicious doctrines and against depressing influences, equally fatal to society as to man individually. The teaching in separate schools, instead of being detrimental, will be beneficial to the country, will give to our children principles of justice and fair-play, which are absolutely necessary for the government of this country and the working of confederation. But the situation of the government was very difficult. They were placed between two extremes ; on one side they were condemned and stigmatized, and the Prime Minister especially was referred to as a fanatic by the Conservative newspapers of the province of Ontario, and denounced in the province of Quebec as a traitor to his race and to his religion. But, fortunately, the Prime Minister of Canada is above all accusation, and nothing can prevent him from doing what he thinks is in the interest of his country. He did what he thought proper. He thought, in this matter, as in all the matters that have arisen since confederation has been established—all national and religious questions especially—that there is only one way to settle such questions, which was the means adopted by the Conservative party while they were in power. It was to come to some agreement, to have recourse to compromise and to mutual concession. But compromise, which was a virtue at the time of the splendour of the Conservative party, is now a crime. It does not become those who established confederation on the foundation of tolerance and compromise, those who have governed the country in the name of conciliation, and who, so many times, have put forward the plea of political necessity, saying that this country could not be governed otherwise than by mutual concessions—it does not become them to abolish the pedestal of their policy and to tear to pieces the flag of their party. I may be allowed to say that it does not become their friends of the province of Ontario, and especially those who belong to the Orange lodges, because I have a right to assert that all the agitation came from those quarters. I do not say so with any feeling of hatred ; I have a right to mention it as a fact. It does not become them to denounce the policy which has made them so strong for so many years, because there is no doubt that the Orange Order was the bone and sinew of the Conservative party and enjoyed a great deal of advantage on account of the Conservative party remaining in power. I say it does not become them now to be so violent against those bishops and priests with whom they were so happy to co-operate in former days in fighting the Liberal party.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Did not Laurier join the Orange party in 1896 in opposing the Remedial Bill?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—These are questions of fact which we cannot ignore. I know a little of the history of Canada and when occasion requires I have the right to state what I have learned in studying the history of our country. Speaking of the events of 1896, on what side were the Orangemen at that time?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They voted with Sir Wilfrid.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—On what side were they in the election of 1896, when Laurier was struggling for provincial autonomy and political liberty? They were not on the side of Laurier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They were.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—They were co-operating at the time with the bishops and priests, whom they now denounce as dangerous. That is the fact.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sorry to say that is not the fact.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Mr. Sifton is not an Orangeman.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—The clergy were against Laurier.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—In 1896 the great majority of the Orangemen supported the Conservative candidates. There may have been some who took the other view, but that was what the majority did. We saw so many strange things at that time——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That nothing can surprise us. I have a right to say that in 1896, as in all former times when the Conservative party were in power, the Orangemen were the bulwark of that party.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who fought the Remedial Bill?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who defeated it?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That is another question. I have a right to say that the Orange order which was so fierce and violent against our Catholic priests and bishops did not denounce their Conservative chiefs in 1896 or at any time for thirty years before that for being the friends of those who fought for the success of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. It was not a crime at that time to be allied with the Catholic priests and bishops. That is a new doctrine which has come into force since the Conservative party and the Orangemen have been in opposition. I mention these matters without passion and simply to bring to the remembrance of the opponents of the Bill and of the government what they have done themselves in the past, in order that they may be more charitable to their opponents. That is my only object; because the hon. member for Stadacona and his friends should remember the events of the past and take into consideration that if the premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whom he attacked yesterday with so much energy, is placed in such a situation that he cannot do more than he has done for his countrymen and co-religionists, it is because of the Ordinances passed by the legislative council of the Northwest, and that to do entire and complete justice he would have been obliged to repeal those ordinances. Who is the man who will say in good faith that any government or any party would have been able at the present time to repeal the ordinances adopted by the Northwest council? Who is the statesman who would have taken such a position, which might have become so dangerous for the minority in this country, and especially in Quebec? Who is the statesman who would undertake to establish a precedent which might be so detrimental to the best interests of the country, and especially to Quebec?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Sir Wilfrid Laurier took that position himself on the 21st February last, and what changed his mind is not the conduct of the Conservatives, but the conduct of Mr. Sifton.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Laurier did——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What Sifton wanted.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Did what any statesman in this country would have been obliged to do. When Mr. McCarthy moved a resolution to abolish the use of the French language in the Northwest Territories, and Sir John Thompson moved to refer the question to the council of the Northwest after the elections which were to take place—when the resolution was voted upon authorizing the people of the Northwest, if they thought proper, to abolish the use of the French language in the Northwest, how is it the hon. gentleman from Stadacona voted for that resolution?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I defy the hon. gentleman to show that I voted for that resolution. I was not in the chamber at that time.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Was there another Landry?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes, from New Brunswick.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That Landry is a judge in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I withdraw the statement. Seeing the name and knowing the hon. gentleman from Stadacona better than the other Landry—because he is better known, I thought it must be the hon. gentleman. It is said that it was the principle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the commencement to repeal the Northwest ordinance. No doubt it is the only chance that the hon. members have to attack the premier. Yes, it is true that he was obliged to modify his Bill: it is true that the present Bill is not in my opinion and in the opinion of many, as good as the first one, but it is a large question. What were the hon. gentleman's friends the leaders of the Conservative party saying everywhere in the recent elections and in the House of Commons—I have myself heard Mr. Borden, Mr. Sproule, and other chiefs of the Conservative party taking the same position—how is it that everywhere and especially on the hustings of North Oxford and London, they have stated that the original clause was not more favourable to the Catholics than the amended clause? I must suppose when such men speak that they mean what they say and that what they think is worth something. I am of opinion consequently that it is open to doubt whether the amended clause is not as good as the original clause.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not for us.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Naturally not for you, never.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am able to read the clauses.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am ready to admit that there are exaggerations everywhere and repeat the words of the Holy Scripture, 'Let him that is without sin cast the first stone.' But there are times when such exaggerations and appeals to religious and national prejudices are especially dangerous. It is particularly so in circumstances like the present, when the object is to prevent justice being done to a certain class of the population who are entitled to certain rights under the constitution and laws, because, then unfortunately one has the right to think that the apparent motives of public interest which are alleged are connected with other motives, dangerous motives which generally are not avowed. In this case I have a right to say what I think since it was proclaimed on the hustings, in the papers and especially in certain papers, that the object of the violent opposition to the Bill was because they wanted to have a Protestant and English Northwest. I do not consider it a crime for a nationality to endeavour to secure its predominance, provided it is done without violating the constitution and the laws of justice. It is a natural feeling. I am not surprised that after the cession of the country to England, there were a certain number of English people in the province who endeavoured to unite Canada and make it an English and even a Protestant country. That is natural. It is natural for people having strong convictions and strong feelings of pariotism to wish the prosperity of their nationality. Patriotism is as much to be respected in the heart of an Englishman as in the heart of a Frenchman. The older I grow the more I come to the conclusion that it is dangerous to despise a man on account of his religion, or nationality because I say if I had been born under the same circumstances, of the same origin, of the same father and mother and brought up under the same circumstances, I would think the same way as does my fellow-countryman of another race. Unification is not immoral, but as I have said those who want to unify a people must do so by just and proper means. Look at what unification accomplished under other circumstances has produced in the world. At a certain time in the history of France one of the best and most industrious portions of the French nation was obliged to leave the country and go elsewhere, taking with them to the country of their adoption all the advantages of their industry, talent and ability, and thus France lost for ever the high position which she had occupied in this world, in material progress especially. That was because some of the kings of France wanted to unify the population and thought any means were permissible to attain their object. It was to unify the population in the different parts of Spain that Philip II, burned thousands of people and thus destroyed, as had been done in France, the prosperity of his empire. I have no hesitation in saying of Philip II that he was a tyrant, and that he forced a great many of his subjects to leave the kingdom in order to avoid his cruelty and escape the scaffold and the funeral pyre. It is to unify the Northwest—because they know now very well that it is impossible to unify the province of Quebec—to make the Northwest a Protestant and English country, that this agitation has been fomented.

In conclusion, let me say it must have been a disappointment to those who brought about confederation and their successors who have endeavoured to complete their work of pacification to find this outburst of fanaticism. If such a thing is possible, when there was so little reason for agitation, what would happen if there was serious ground for excitement. Really, it is calculated to frighten those who are interested in the future of this country, and naturally it has frightened those who fear it will have the effect of checking the tide of immigration which is pouring into our country and enriching the Northwest. I hope I shall say nothing to offend any one, because that is not my intention, but if those who have fostered this agitation and have expressed their intentions, had the right to do what they say they intend to do, what would be the effect of their policy? It would be to close the Northwest to Catholic and French immigration. There is no doubt if they could do what they wished they would cover the whole Northwest with inscriptions upon which you read those fatal words, 'Abandon hope all ye who enter here.' It would close the Northwest to the descendants of those immortal pioneers, adventurers and warriors who discovered that vast region and shed their blood to conquer it, and gave their names to its rivers, its mountains, and to places where to-day there are thriving towns and cities. As reasonable men you must understand that the French Canadians have listened to what has been said and done in the last six months, and they would be less than human if they had not felt and resented it; but you must admit that the province of Quebec has shown a patience which must be acknowledged and admired by all citizens of this country and especially by our Protestant fellow-countrymen. Like all other people, they are sensitive especially on questions of nationality and religion, and you must be surprised that they have shown so much patience throughout this agitation. They have given an example to all other parts of the country and to all other nationalities. As a matter of fact, the people of Canada generally, whether of Ontario or Quebec, have been wiser and more prudent than those who pretended to be their leaders.

The electors of Levis, of North Oxford and of London have shown that it is useless to make appeals to their national and religious prejudices, and that they wanted fair-play and justice. One of the questions which embarrassed the most of our French and Catholic population is that they cannot reconcile the words and doings of their English fellow-countrymen with the words and doings of those great English statesmen who do so much honour to England. They cannot help remembering what has been said in the country by those who are sent from England to preside over the destinies of Canada. How many times have those great men admitted that the diversity of nationalities in this country was an element of progress, an element of welfare, of happiness and of prosperity—the great element of civilization—and how many times have the newspapers in England said that there is only one country in the world, where so many nations speaking different languages, having different beliefs, are living under the same flag. At the time of the glorious jubilee of Queen Victoria, the great satisfaction of Englishmen was expressed in the newspapers, and by the mouth of their public men, to see marching through the streets of London men of all nationalities, all origins, all creeds, and even all colours. There was no discrimination in the sympathy of the people for the visitors—yes there was a discrimination. Who was the most honoured man in that great galaxy of national celebrities that appeared before the Throne of England ? It was a French Canadian, the Prime Minister of Canada, and I have no hesitation in saying that if those great statesmen of England were consulted they would repeat what they have said so many times, that it is an advantage that there are so many nationalities working together for the welfare and prosperity of that country, and if they were consulted on this question of the schools I am sure, in view of what they declared not long ago, that the Catholics have the right to give their children religious education in the English schools, that they would say the present Bill is founded on principles of justice and fair-play, and that all Canadians should support that Bill. In conclusion I would say without hesitation that the agitators in this country, whether they are French, Irish or English are not acting——

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Don't leave out the Scotch.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—And Scotch. They are not acting in accordance with the true principles of religion and patriotism when they arouse the national and religious prejudices of their fellow-countrymen, because it may be disastrous for the future and prosperity of this country, and it is not true religion. It is not true Christianity, because Christianity is based upon charity. It is not true patriotism, because true patriotism does not arouse prejudices which may endanger the future welfare of the country. I will go further and say that they are not truly loyal because they shake the confidence of the people in the working of the constitution. The French Canadians are proud of the English constitution. They consider that it is one of the most admirable masterpieces of wisdom that the world has ever produced. They consider that it is the compass which guides the ship of the nation towards the shores of liberty. The French Canadians know that that constitution deserves their gratitude, because it has been constructed for them, and it has protected their rights and their national religious feelings. The hon. gentleman concluded his energetic speech by speaking of what would be said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier who has deserted the cause of the Catholics and the French people in this country. He did not finish. He omitted certain things in that part of his speech. I will put in what he has omitted. I will continue as if it were his speech, and I say that history will show that of all the statesmen who have governed the country, none has done more for the welfare, for the happiness and prosperity and the honour of his country than Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not assent to that.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—History will show that his wisdom and his spirit of conciliation saved the country from troubles which threatened to destroy its foundation and precipitate it into the horrors of racial and religious war. History will show that he sought to reconcile his duty towards England with his duty toward Canada and towards his native province and that he sought to convince his countrymen of the province of Quebec that the best means of protecting minorities in this country is not to be aggressive but to be fair and just, just as he treats all creeds and nationalities, that the province of Quebec ought to be prudent in its demands, and stand always upon the constitution and the law. History will add that the province of Quebec remained faithful to her chief up to the end of his career, which I hope will last for some years yet; that she has been deaf to the appeals made to her feelings and to her sentiments by people who tried to lead her astray; that she has been deaf to the seducing voice of the sirens, and has placed implicit confidence and implicit faith in the great pilot who is guiding so surely and so patriotically the bark which carries the destinies of Canada and of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I must congratulate my hon. friend who has taken his seat upon his very great and (to his own opinion) good oration on everything but that which is before the House. I have come to the conclusion from the tenor and trend of the speeches which have been delivered on the government side that they want to talk on everything but the question before the House, and I must say that they do it most successfully. They are successful as far as entertaining the House is concerned. They are doing it well so far as delivery is concerned, and demonstrate their knowledge of history and of the circumstances connected with everything, as I said before, but the question of separate schools. I am more convinced than ever that it is necessary for those who take the stand which I am obliged to take on this question to put themselves on record and give good, sound and logical reasons for the faith that is in them. My hon. friend talked about the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, and then attempted to lay the blame upon the late lamented Sir John Thompson for not providing for the relief or the protection of the minority in the Northwest, because Sir John Thompson had not disallowed the ordinances passed in 1892. I am sure my hon. friend knows better than that. He knows that Sir John Thompson had said that the ordinances of the Territories were entirely different from an Act of a provincial parliament, that there was a limitation to the powers of the provincial parliament, while the ordinances of the Territories could be changed and could be repudiated or disallowed at any time, the Territories being immediately under the federal authorities. I go further than that. As a proof of this fact and as a proof of what I have stated, it was not necessary for Sir Wilfrid Laurier to base his Act upon the ordinances of 1901 or upon any other ordinance in the Northwest. His Bill as introduced the first time goes beyond the ordinances and repudiates them entirely, he bases his action upon the British North America Act of 1867. What does Sir John Thompson say ? I wish to place his remarks on record, because my hon. friend referred to that. He said :

Let me call attention especially to the differences which exist, as to the disallowance, between an ordinance of the Northwest Territories and the statute of a province. If a year is allowed to elapse without the disallowance of the statute of a province, that statute being within the provincial powers—and that is practically admitted here, except for the statement of Mr. Justice Rouleau, which I shall not discuss —that statute becomes law and is beyond the reach of any power but the legislature which enacted it. But, as regards an ordinance of the Northwest Territories, it must be remembered that this parliament has control of the Territories in a fuller and more absolute sense than it has control of the provinces.

It is a great fallacy—the word is none too strong, I can use stronger words than that—it is drawing a red herring across the trail to try to excuse Sir Wilfrid Laurier for not being able, by reason of these ordinances, to bring in any other Bill than the Bill which is before us now.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Does the hon. member think that he is justified in saying that clause 16, No. 1, had the effect of abrogating and abolishing the ordinances ?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do most distinctly. It paid no attention to the ordinances.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the Minister of Justice said so also.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That disposes of that point. Now, my hon. friend, with all his liberality, and with all the toleration that characterized his speech, was a little bitter on some things. He wanted to associate the Orange party, whom he does not like, with the Conservative party, and he claimed that everything wrong that had been done by the Conservative party was done through the influence of Orangeism. I remember the day, in the united parliament of Canada, when the French Canadians, led by Sir George Cartier, brought up the separate school question, that out of fifteen Orange members thirteen or fourteen supported the schools.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And that his friends, Hon. George Brown, Oliver Mowat and their followers, were the opponents of the separate schools. I will go further than that, and perhaps show my hon. friend a little more. When Dalton McCarthy joined the Reform party, the Radical party, the Laurier party, the first thing he set about doing was to destroy the French language and separate schools in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How many Liberals voted with him ?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I will tell you how many Liberals and how many Orangemen voted with him. The Orangemen who were the helpers of Dalton McCarthy in the endeavour to destroy the French language, are the ones he accuses of being in our ranks now, Mr. Sproule and Mr. Maclean. What did Sir John Macdonald do when Mr. McCarthy brought up the question ?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Dalton McCarthy was not a Liberal.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—To all intents and purposes he was a Liberal. He left us and supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The hon. gentleman's party got the benefit of all he did for them. Sir John Macdonald came to the rescue of the French Canadians and the people of the Northwest on that occasion. And what did he say ?

I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other. I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is 'à propos de rien.' Whether it was conquered or ceded, we have a constitution now under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having equal rights of every kind—of language, of religion, of property and of person. There is no paramount race in this country ; there is no conquered race in this country.

He went further in another extract which I could quote, and said nothing was more dear to a French Canadian—and I can well understand that—' nothing was more dear to a French Canadian than to be able to speak the language he learned at his mother's knee,' and to know that it would be respected and given a place. My hon. friend has stated that he is not satisfied with the present Bill. He spoke in the same way as my hon. friend the Secretary of State did. Both made what I would call first-class separate school speeches, yet they are willing to accept this Bill, this gold brick, instead of separate schools. It does not provide for separate schools any more than they have separate schools in Russia. There is perhaps no man in this chamber who is a greater supporter of separate schools than myself. We have, since 1865, in our town and in our county separate schools that are second to none in the province of Ontario. I state that publicly. My children were educated there, and I know whereof I speak; and I am so much impressed with the idea of teaching religion in schools, that if there were two schools by my door, one of them a public school and the other a Protestant school, I would prefer to send my children to a Protestant school.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—We are of the same opinion.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But I am not willing to take from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government what my hon. friend is willing to take. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the first Bill he introduced in the House of Commons, inserted clause 16 which gave to the people of the Northwest separate schools. He knows best the reason why he expunged that clause granting separate schools. I understand that Hon. Mr. Sifton withdrew from the cabinet because he could not get clause 16 altered, and Mr. Fielding threatened to withdraw from the cabinet because clause 16 was not according to his ideas. Both of these gentlemen were absent at the time clause 16 was framed. The clause was, however, changed to the present one, and the only thing I regret is that my hon. friend the Secretary of State did not threaten to withdraw if it were amended as it has been amended. But he did not, and that is a question he has to settle with his own conscience. As I read both clauses, clause 17 in the measure before us gives us nothing in the way of separate schools—gives us nothing, I repeat; and if there is any hon. gentleman in this House who can show me that we have the first iota of what can be considered separate schools under the control of the Catholic board or any other governing board of that description I am willing to concede that I am wrong. I have looked over the Bill carefully, and have compared it with clause 16 in the Bill as originally introduced, and while clause 16 as introduced in the first place by Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave us separate schools, clause 17 in the present Bill gives us nothing. Perhaps it would be well to go into the history of these things to a certain extent. What prompted the proclamation and every letter which was sent to the people of the Northwest during the troubles there in 1869. What was the great inducement which was inserted in all the proclamations? It was that their religious rights and religious practices would not be interfered with in any respect. When the troubles arose in 1869, on the authority of a telegram received from Her Majesty the Queen by Sir John Young, who was then Governor General of Canada, a proclamation was issued by him to the people of the Northwest which reads as follows:

By His Excellency the Right Hon. Sir John Young, Baronet, a member of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross, of the most honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the most distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, Governor General of Canada.

To all and every the loyal subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, and to all whom these presents may come, greeting:

The Queen has charged me as her representative to inform you that certain misguided persons in her settlement on the Red river have banded themselves together to oppose by force the entry into her Northwest Territories of the officers selected to administer in her name the government when the Territories are united to the Dominion of Canada under the authority of the late Act of parliament of the United Kingdom, that those persons have also forcibly and with violence prevented other of her loyal subjects from ingress into the country.

Her Majesty feels assured that she may rely upon the loyalty of her subjects in the Northwest and believes those men who have illegally joined together have done so from some misrepresentation.

Her Majesty is convinced that in sanctioning the union of the Northwest Territories with Canada she is promoting the best interests of the residents, and at the same time strengthening and consolidating her North American possessions as part of the British empire. You may judge then, of the sorrow and displeasure with which the Queen views the unreasonable and lawless proceedings which have occurred.

Her Majesty commands me to state to you that she will always be ready through me as her representative, to redress all well founded grievances, and that she has instructed me to hear and consider any complaints that may be made or desires that may be expressed to me as Governor General.

At the same time she has charged me to exercise all the power and authority with which she has entrusted me in the support of order and the suppression of unlawful disturbance.

By Her Majesty's authority, I do therefore assure you that on the union with Canada all your civil and religious rights and privileges will be respected, your property secured to you, and that your country will be governed as in the past under British laws and in the spirit of British justice.

I do further under her authority entreat and command those of you who are still assembled and banded together in defiance of law, peacefully to disperse and return to your homes under the penalties of the law in case of disobedience.

I do lastly inform you that in case of your immediate and peaceable obedience and dispersion I shall order that no legal proceedings be taken against any parties implicated in those unfortunate breaches of the law.

Given under my hand and seal at arms at Ottawa this sixth day of November in the year of our Lord, 1869, and in the thirty-third year of Her Majesty's reign.

(Sgd.) JOHN YOUNG.

A similar letter was addressed by Sir John Young to Governor McTavish at the same time, in which he says :

Government House, Ottawa.

W. McTavish, Esq., Governor of Assiniboia.

Sir,—I have the honour to address you in my capacity as representative of the Queen and Governor General of Her Majesty's British North America possessions, and inclose for your information a copy of a message received from Earl Grenville in respect to the account I sent officially of the events occurring in Red River settlement. The message conveys the mature opinion of the imperial cabinet, the proclamation I have issued is based upon it, and you will observe that it requests all who have desires to express or complaints to make to refer to me as invested with authority on behalf of the British government and the inhabitants of Rupert's Land and all classes and persuasions may rest assured that Her Majesty's government has no intention of interfering with or setting aside, or allowing others to interfere with the religion, the rights or the franchises hitherto enjoyed or to which they may prove themselves equal. Make what use you think best of this communication and of the inclosed.

A letter, dated the 6th December, was sent to Donald A. Smith, now Lord Strathcona, which was as follows :

You may state with the utmost confidence that the Imperial government has no intention of acting otherwise or permitting others to act otherwise than in perfect good faith towards the inhabitants of the Red river district of the Northwest.

The letter to Mr. Smith further says :

'The people may rely upon it that respect and protection will be extended to the different religious persuasions.'

All the correspondence that was sent to leading persons in that district at that time contained the promise that the religious convictions of the people, including their schools, would not be interfered with. Now what class of schools had they ? In Ruperts Land and the Northwest Territories the schools were denominational and had been such for I might almost say centuries. The Roman Catholics, the Anglicans and I believe the Presbyterians and Methodists had denominational schools, supported by the people, prior to the union, and were always liberally aided, I believe, by the Hudson Bay Company. This is the meaning of the expression used in all the letters to these important men stating that they need not fear that their religious rights and convictions and all the liberties that they had enjoyed with their denominational schools would be interfered with. To carry out that promise, when Manitoba became a part of the union, Sir John Macdonald at once looked after the fulfilment of the promises made by His Excellency the Governor General, Sir John Young, and gave them separate schools. To carry out that promise, when the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie introduced the Northwest Territories Act in 1875, he amended the Bill after it had been before the House some time, in order to give separate schools to the people of the Northwest Territories. This he did when reminded of it by Sir John Macdonald. The clause which was then added to the Bill was as follows :

When and so soon as any system of taxation shall be adopted in any district or portion of the Northwest Territories, the Lieutenant Governor, by and with the consent of the council or assembly, as the case may be, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education ; but it shall therein be always provided, that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the Northwest Territories, or any lesser portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same may be known, may establish such schools therein as they may think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor, and further that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and that, in such latter case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they may impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that that clause was inserted in the Bill of 1875 on motion of Sir John Macdonald ?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—No, I did not say that. I said it was done at the suggestion of Sir John Macdonald, who reminded Mr. Mackenzie that he had omitted the provision. The Hon. Alexander Mackenzie gave Sir John Macdonald credit for it, and said he was reminded by his right hon. friend that he had omitted it. The law was so amended as to give Roman Catholic or Protestant separate schools to the people of the Northwest Territories. We had the opinion of Hon. Mr. Miller, of the hon. Secretary of State, of Sir Alexander Campbell and a number of hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in this House, that the intention was to give the people of the Northwest separate schools in order that those who might be going to that land would know exactly the conditions existing there with respect to education. I have here a pamphlet containing extracts from the speeches on that occasion. Sir Alexander Campbell, a most eminent man and leader of this House for many years, said :

> The object of the Bill was to establish and perpetuate in the Northwest Territories the same system as prevailed in Ontario and Quebec, and which had worked so well in the interest of peace and harmony with the different populations of those provinces. He thought the fairer course, and the better one, for all races and creeds, was to adopt the suggestion of the government, and enable people to establish separate schools in that Territory and thus prevent the introduction of the evils from which Ontario and Quebec had suffered, but had judiciously rid themselves.

Mr. Ryan of Montreal, and Hon. Letellier St. Just and Hon. Mr. Miller all spoke in the same line. Now it is said that it would not be necessary, if they adhered strictly to provincial rights to perpetuate the existence of the schools that were granted in those days. I believe it would not. I believe that the federal government would have a perfect right to ignore everything of that kind, and were entitled to credit for trying to carry out the promises and establish separate schools in the Northwest. When the present government introduced the Bill in the first place they showed the same disposition ; they showed a disposition to try to carry out these promises, but I am sorry to say by the amended clause they have not done so. The present ordinances give you nothing. Clause 8, on page 6 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, is as follows .

> There shall be an educational council consisting of five persons, at least two of whom shall be Roman Catholics, to be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council who shall receive such remuneration as the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall determine.

These are a mere advisory board. They have not even a vote ; they have no control over anything. Then it goes on in clause 10 to provide :

> All regulations respecting the inspection of schools, the examination, training, licensing and grading of teachers, courses of study, teachers' institutes and text and reference books shall before being adopted or amended be referred to the council for its discussion and report.

Under the separate school system in Quebec there are two boards, a Protestant board which has control of the Protestant or dissentient schools, and a Roman Catholic board which has control of what they call public schools in that province. In Ontario we have it in a little different form ; we have a Minister of Education, but under him there is an inspector who has control over and inspects all separate schools in the province, so that there is direct control over the separate schools of Ontario, over the selection of books, the curriculum generally, the teachers, their qualifications, and everything else. In the province of Alberta, under this much-vaunted Bill, they have control of nothing. They cannot even select the books for the separate schools, and to demonstrate that, let me go to clause 137. That clause provides :

> No religious instruction except as hereinafter provided shall be permitted in the school of any district from the opening of such school until one-half hour previous to its closing in the afternoon after which time any such instruction permitted or desired by the board may be given.
> 2. It shall, however, be permissible for the board of any district to direct that the school be opened by the recitation of the Lord's prayer.

Then it goes on in another clause to provide that they shall have permission from half-past three to four, if the parents desire, to teach religion in the schools. Those who wish can go home, and leave the boys and girls who remain to receive their religious education. From whom will the Catholics receive their religious education ? From a Protestant teacher? From whom will the Protestants receive their religious education? From a Catholic teacher?

Hon. Mr. FROST—My hon. friend is mistaken. I think the child will receive religious instruction from the clergyman of his church.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Permission no doubt will be given to the clergyman to visit the school at half-past three, dismiss those children who do not wish to remain, and impart religious instruction, but that clergyman might live fifteen, twenty or twenty-five miles away and I should like to know how often he could visit those schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that a privilege ?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not consider it much of a privilege.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Have you anything better to offer from your friends?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—If you go through the history of the country you will find that our friends never gave you a stone when you asked for bread. They gave you separate schools when you wanted them, and always protected the minority.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They have changed their base lately.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They have not changed their base. Since my hon. friend provokes discussion on that point, I will give him some ancient history on the separate school question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have had enough of that.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We will get a little more of it. In the confederation debates, Sir John Macdonald said :

> We will enjoy here that which is the great test of constitutional freedom, we will have the rights of the minority respected ; in all countries the rights of majorities take care of themselves.

Sir George Cartier said :

> Of course the difficulty it would be said, would be to deal fairly by the minority. In Upper Canada the Roman Catholics would find themselves in the minority—in Lower Canada the Protestants would be in a minority, while the lower provinces were divided. Under such circumstances would any one pretend that either local or general government would sanction any injustice ? What would be the consequence . . . it would be censured everywhere . . . any attempt to deprive the minority of their rights would at once be thwarted.

D'Arcy McGee said:

> All that the Protestant minority in Lower Canada can require by way of security to their educational system will be cheerfully granted by this House. I, for one, as a Roman Catholic, will second and support such amendments.

Now that is the history of the Conservative party. And I should like my hon. friend to point out in the history of this country where any attempt was made to interfere with the rights of the minority by that party. It is true that a few scattering supporters of the Conservative party in the past, as now, may have gone over to the Liberals to oppose us when we were trying to do justice to the minority. A few have perhaps supported those who are in opposition to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this supposed grant of separate schools to the Catholics, but their action does not bind the Conservative party. The party has never gone back on the rights of the minority. They have carried out their promises in every instance. At the time of confederation the Protestants of Lower Canada felt that they were not protected, and as the schools in that province were more of a religious than of a public character, they wanted to be protected, and I think they were right. Who came to their rescue ? Sir George Cartier resigned his seat and went into the local legislature in order to see a Bill passed giving them their rights in Lower Canada. Sir John Macdonald stood by them in that instance; D'Arcy McGee stood by them, every Conservative leader stood by them and saw that their rights were protected. Go with me to Manitoba and you will find their history is equally good there. The minority were protected until they were deprived of their rights by my hon. friend's friends in the province of Manitoba, who were then on the treasury benches—I have reference to the Greenway government, in which Mr. Sifton occupied a prominent position, who was one of the first men from the Northwest that Sir Wilfrid Laurier took into his cabinet when he came into power. The same history and the same record holds good in the Territories. Alexander Mackenzie had forgotten to provide protection for the minority until reminded of it by Sir John Macdonald. The Conservative party have carried out in every instance the promise made in 1763 of toleration towards the Roman Catholic religion in Canada. Lord North, one of the greatest Tories of his day, supported the Quebec Act, and therefore it ill becomes my hon. friend to charge the Conservative party with intolerance and opposition to the Roman Catholic religion, or the establishment of separate schools. Those who are in glass houses should not throw stones, because they will find their house broken over their heads. It ill becomes the hon. gentleman to talk about the Conservative party being intolerant. What has his leader done on this occasion? I am not going to beat around the bush and go to France, Spain and other countries; I will stay at home. The 16th clause of the first Bill provides:

16. The provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province as if, at the date upon which this Act comes into force the territory comprised therein were already a province, the expression 'the union' in the said section being taken to mean the said date.

2. Subject to the provisions of the said section 93, and in continuance of the principle heretofore sanctioned under the Northwest Territories Act, it is enacted that the legislature of the said province shall pass all necessary laws in respect of education, and that it shall therein always be provided (a) that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the said province, or of any less portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name it is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessments and collection of rates therefor, and (b) that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor, and (c) that in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessment of such rates as they impose upon themselves with respect thereto.

3. In the appropriation of public moneys by the legislature in aid of education, and in the distribution of any moneys paid to the government of the said province arising from the school fund established by the Dominion Lands Act, there shall be no discrimination between the public schools and the separate schools, and such moneys shall be applied to the support of public and separate schools in equitable shares or proportions.

That gives separate schools. Mackenzie's law gave us separate schools, but the ordinances passed from time to time obstructed the carrying out of that law. In fact the aim was evidently, especially from 1885 onward, to cripple the separate schools. Under the ordinance of 1885 there was to be a board composed of 5 members, two Catholics and three Protestants, and each of those bodies had control over its own schools. From that day forward the Separate School Act given by Mr. Mackenzie was crippled, until 1901, when the whole thing was taken away. It is on the Ordinances of 1901 that this Bill is based; and to-day we have not a shadow of separate schools in the Northwest The clause in this Bill as amended reads:

17. Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province, with the substitution for paragraph (1) of the said section 93, of the following paragraph:

(1.) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.

These are the Ordinances No. 29 and 30, of 1901, of which I have spoken. If my hon. friend can extract separate schools out of that clause, he can extract sunbeams from cucumbers.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am not an extractor.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—No, but my hon. friend is very good at delivering orations which have nothing to do with the subject—interesting orations—but he was quite right in saying that he did not offend anybody, Such orations could not give offence to any one.

What stand do I take on this question? My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, has moved the six months' hoist, and I have no hesitation in defining my position, that I shall support that motion.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Why?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Because we are not getting separate schools. For bread we are given a stone; we are getting a gold brick for the genuine article. We are not beggars; we are entitled to our rights. We are a respectable minority in that country to-day; those rights were promised us, but since the hon. gentleman's friends have got into power, the minority in the Northwest have been robbed as the people of Manitoba were robbed of their separate schools. They have robbed us in the Northwest though they have done it in a different way. I for one would not accept such a law. I want reasonable separate schools, separate schools under which the children either Roman Catholic or Protestant of that district can be educated in a respectable manner by teachers holding certificates that will be inferior to no other class of schools in that district.

That is the kind of school I desire. If I do not get that I am not going to accept anything else. We are getting nothing; the hon. gentlemen talk about getting a little concession, a compromise forsooth. We cannot have compromises on a matter of that kind. Religion is too important. It is a right that we hold too dear to have any compromise upon it. For that reason I will vote heartily and cordially for the motion to give the six months' hoist to this Bill. Perhaps at the end of six months, if we are successful in defeating it in this House, as I hope we will be, my hon. friend's leaders will come to understand that the people of this country want no such compliment, no such stone for bread. We want bread where we are entitled to it.

Hon. Mr. COX—I should like to say that if the hon. gentleman who has just spoken had been leader of the opposition in the House of Commons and had delivered that speech there and had assisted in the carrying through of the Bill as it was originally submitted to the House, the chances are that the Bill would have been law two months ago.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have no intention at this stage of the debate of taking up the time of the House on this important question, but I think it is my duty to express my views with regard to the Bill now before the House. We all have a pretty fair recollection of the history of separate schools in this Dominion. We have had them in Ontario for a great many years, and we have not suffered any serious interference. In some places in the rural districts perhaps our people thought it would be better if we had not had them. But after all our Roman Catholic and Protestant friends have got along nicely together and we have a separate school system and an educational system which are a credit to Ontario. That educational system with separate schools intermixed, took the first prize at the Worlds Exposition in Chicago, as the best educational system in the world. Now with regard to this exceedingly important question—because it is an important question—I desire to point out a few facts. While hon. gentlemen opposite can all get under the shadow of a resolution for a six months' hoist, we know perfectly that a great many of them, as well as their friends in the House of Commons, entertain the view that these new provinces should be clothed with full powers of self-government as provided by the 93rd section of the British North America Act, that they should receive full power to deal with every question within the range of property and civil rights as laid down in the constitution, and that they should get the right to deal with matters of education just the same as they did in Manitoba. When we erected Manitoba into a province we gave them full powers of autonomy, we reserved nothing. We gave everything that the constitution provided for, and what is the result in Manitoba? The people of Manitoba were quite aware that this Dominion had entered into a covenant with the Canadian Pacific Railway that no charters would be granted for twenty years for lines of railway running southward from the main line. That contract was in existence when Manitoba was erected into a province. After they got their full powers of self-government, in open violation of the covenant with the Canadian Pacific Railway they granted charters for roads running south-west of the main line. At that time the government of Sir John Macdonald controlled the affairs of this Dominion, and that government disallowed the Act. It was re-enacted and disallowed several times. At last they came to a decision that they would submit to the Privy Council the question of the powers granted to Manitoba under the Provincial Autonomy Act as to how far she had a right to grant those charters. The question was submitted and the answer of the Privy Council was that Manitoba had the right and had the power to grant those charters if she chose. We then paid the Canadian Pacific Railway ten millions in cash to abrogate that clause in the covenant with them in order to allow Manitoba to do as she pleased. The next thing Manitoba did was to establish separate schools. The attention of the House has been drawn to the fact that it was under Messrs. Greenway and Sifton that that Act was passed. After the Act was passed advantage was immediately taken of a provision in the constitution regarding remedial legislation. The government was appealed to, whether under my esteemed friend opposite or not I do not very well remember, but it makes no difference. They were appealed to under the provisions of the constitution to introduce a remedial Bill and to reinstate the people of the province of Manitoba in the rights of which they had been deprived under the law that had been passed. That Bill was introduced in the closing hours or days of parliament. The opposition took objection to the utilization of that particular provision, or its application to the case of Manitoba, fearing the result of a measure passed to reinstate in the province of Manitoba a matter which the province had themselves done away with under the powers vested in them. The opposition, led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, kept the question before the House until parliament expired. I think it was a most fortunate thing that parliament was as near the closing hours of its existence as it was when that measure was brought in. Had parliament been in such a position that the consideration of that question could have been forced upon the House and had it become law, I do not know where the trouble might have ended, and no man can point out what the result might have been. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce stated last night that we had two wars in the Northwest at a cost of some $12,000,000. If the government had succeeded in passing the Remedial Bill we might have had another war. We cannot tell what it might have caused. While provision is made in the constitution for remedial legislation, it is a remarkable thing that there is no indication in that provision of how it is to be carried out or enforced. It simply says that the central authority at Ottawa shall have the right to introduce remedial legislation in the interests of the minority deprived of their right. But how are you going to carry it out? In what way is the remedial legislation to be enforced? How are you going to re-establish the separate schools and restore to the minority their rights? I contend it is an utter and absolute impossibility.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If the provincial government set their neck determinedly to resist the re-establishment of separate schools on an equitable financial basis, it is an impossibility by a statute of this Dominion to fetter the province so that she cannot after all frustrate the object parliament may have had in view. For my part I earnestly hope that where there is a Protestant majority in any province in this Dominion, they will so exercise themselves regarding the rights of Catholics as to concede every reasonable request that they can ask. Catholics do hold it as a conscientious conviction that it is their duty to teach their religion to their children together with secular education. My hon. friend declares that it is one of the fixed principles of Catholicism to do that. As a Protestant I am not going to stand in the way of the Catholic when he declares that that is a part of his religion, I am not going by act or otherwise to interfere with the exercise of this right. No man should do that. I hold that we should exercise that spirit of toleration, forbearance and respect one towards the other, that we should concede to them the right to enjoy those privileges where they are in the minority, and that the same should be done where the Protestants are in the minority. Suppose that we give the Territories which we are now erecting into provinces the same power we conferred on Manitoba, supposing we give them full powers, give them a full right to legislate with regard to education and with regard to everything else. Start them out on the road with full autonomy. What is to be the result?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But under the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Under the British North America Act, certainly. Give them the full powers there provided. We know perfectly well that the Conservative party made a covenant with the Canadian Pacific Railway that for all time to come their track, rolling stock and machinery was to be free from taxation. I do not find fault with them for it, but is not that the condition of affairs to-day? When you give these provinces full powers of autonomy they will have the right in violation of that law to impose taxation on the Canadian Pacific Railway. But you say, 'Don't curtail them, give them full powers of autonomy. Let them legislate for themselves as they please. You have no right to withhold any power from them.' In that case the first thing they may do—and they will have the right and power to do it—is to tax the Canadian Pacific Railway for its rolling stock, for its machinery, for its roadbed, for its track, and for everything else and then you will have the Canadian Pacific Railway coming to us again. We had to settle with them before and give them ten millions to dispose of their claims with regard to Manitoba, and now we will have them coming back to us again with regard to these two provinces and they will say 'The province is violating the law; they are imposing taxes upon us. You covenanted with us that we would not be subjected to taxation. Now we want you to do the same as you did in Manitoba and recoup us for the injustice to which we are now subjected under the full powers of autonomy which you have given to the provinces.' Is it in the interests of the Dominion that we should be placed in that position by the powers conferred upon the new provinces, if no restraint is to be imposed. Now this Act provides for that. No doubt the government were actuated by a desire to avoid the difficulties which were met with in the case of Manitoba. The payment of $10,000,000 taught them a lesson and is teaching us a lesson for I observe that there is a clause in the Act which restricts their power of taxation, a clause which covers this particular point. Let us now take the other case. Supposing we give them full power to legislate as they please and that ten or fifteen years from now some government comes into power in the province which thinks it would be a popular thing to abolish separate schools, and they do it as they did in Manitoba, what is to be the result of that? Back comes the minority to Ottawa, and they say, 'We want you now to bring into play the provisions of the constitution and grant us remedial legislation to reinstate us in our rights.' I should like to see the government backed by the full force of the province of Quebec—and I do not blame them—advocating the rights of the minority, with also the support of the scattered population of Catholics throughout other provinces that would naturally and justly demand that under the provisions of the constitution the minority shall get relief. There you are; remedial legislation again. Another Remedial Bill—it may not come in at the close of parliament. It may come in at a time when the House has to face it. They have to pass the law. Now, how are you going to enforce it? Where are the provisions by which you will reinstate that minority in the rights of which they have been deprived as they have been in the case of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—All that is coming.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—You have no provision whatever, it is not outlined how or by what method or means you are to reinstate the separate schools. The result would be you would be likely to have another clash with the two provinces. There are a great many people in the country who are saying that we are getting a great many United States people in the Territories, a mixed population from all parts of creation into that country, and some of our friends have gone so far as to say that if it gets largely filled up with a United States population there might be an agitation for annexation after a while. It is becoming a danger of late, so many people are flowing in there from the United States. I would ask this House, what is more likely to cause an excitement for annexation,—an insurrection in those provinces—than attempting to reimpose upon them something that they themselves had abandoned and resented by their law. If they had the power to abolish separate schools and they abolished them and the central authority endeavoured under the constitution to reimpose them, what would be more likely to create dissension and a feeling for annexation to the United States than an act of that kind. I know of nothing. The government have looked over the whole ground seriously and have come to the conclusion that the best time to settle that question is the present. They have given a very mild type of separate school, but the people are satisfied with it. Notwithstanding the fact that the measure has been before parliament for several months there has not been any large volume of petitions presented against it. There has been no appeal. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out last night the Minister of the Interior went up there and appealed to the people and was returned by acclamation. There is no feeling there against the system of schools which they have at present. They are perfectly satisfied with it, and in view of the experiences we have had with Manitoba and in view of the experiences all over the Dominion, in view of the provision in the constitution providing for remedial legislation, in view of the fact that there is no provision by which the relief can be provided, the government have come to the conclusion that it is best here and now to settle this question for ever, and have peace for all time to come. No more prudent or statesmanlike conclusion can be imagined than that which has been arrived at on this question. It is the best settlement that could be made of the whole matter, and I contend that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his associates deserve credit not merely from their followers, but from every sober sensible individual in this Dominion in placing the charter of the new provinces upon a firm ground that will secure peace and harmony and will for ever set at rest the question that caused so much trouble and so much excitement in Manitoba and in other provinces. Under all the circumstances we are glad to be able to say that the government has acted prudently, and I do not think that the government could have acted more wisely than they have done in this case.

Hon. Sir W. HINGSTON—I was about to ask the hon. gentleman, if he considers it a settlement made for the people when 40 per cent of the people cannot avail themselves of its provisions, when their consciences prevent them from availing themselves of that settlement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until eight o'clock this evening.

Second Sitting.

The SPEAKER took the chair at 8 p.m.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 151) an Act respecting L'Union Saint-Joseph de la cité d'Ottawa, and to change its name to L'Union Saint-Joseph du Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Edwards.)

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 192) An Act respecting the powers of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal—(Hon. Mr. Templeman.)

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

The Order of the Day being called—

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the motion for the second reading Bill (69) An Act to establish and provide for the Government of the Province of Alberta.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said: I would claim your indulgence while I make a few observations on the Bill before us and perhaps enter upon a short discussion of two or three of its features which up to the present time have not received attention from hon. gentlemen who have discussed it. I might say that the educational clause has very largely overshadowed every other question which has arisen, and owing to that fact very little attention has been given to many questions which certainly are of great importance, if not of vital importance, to those new provinces. It would be somewhat interesting probably if one had time, and the thermometer were not at 80 degrees, to review historically the evolution of those territories from the time of their acquisition by the federal government through the various stages of government that have been granted to them by the central power up to the present time; but that is largely a matter of record and it is therefore unnecessary for me to direct attention to those facts. Permit me, however, to say this, on the threshold of the observations I have to make, that for some years the people of those territories have been very properly looking forward to the time when provincial autonomy would be given them. For some years they have memorialized the federal authorities through the territorial government for that measure of self-government, viz., provincial autonomy, which their position and their interests demanded. They had a right to expect that when the time arrived for the Dominion government to give consideration to this question—a question which in my judgment transcends every other question which has been before this parliament for many years—the fullest consideration would be given to this measure and that they would be placed upon an equality with the other provinces of our confederation. For various reasons they had a right to expect that this position of advantage would be accorded them as a matter of right by the federal power. It is almost unnecessary for me to point out that when the Act of Confederation was passed, the framers of that Act certainly had in view a uniform system of provincial government so far as it would be possible to adopt uniformity with reference to the different provinces of the Dominion. It was never contemplated for a moment, I venture to say, that there should be imperfect or incomplete provinces or forms of government not provided for in the Confederation Act. I venture further to say that there has not been placed on the statute-books of the Dominion or even Great Britain a measure which was more fully considered, more carefully prepared, or so far reaching in its results as the British North America Act. It possessed practically all the elasticity necessary to include within the confederation not only the then existing colonies which had not entered into the union, but those territories known as Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories and which the federal government anticipated acquiring through treaty with the Hudson Bay Company and the imperial government; it cannot be said that at the time, not only of the passage of the Confederation Act, but at the time it was discussed, these territories were not fully in contemplation of the framers of the British North America Act. Any hon. gentleman who has studied the confederation debates cannot fail to come to the conclusion that the fathers of confederation fully foresaw the day on which these Bills would be introduced in the parliament of Canada, and the discussion that must necessarily take place thereon, and every provision was made in that Act for the entry of those territories into confederation. Prefatory to what I have to say with reference to other features of the Bill, permit me to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that section 146 of the British North America Act provided for the entry of those territories into the union. That section provided the manner in which they would be admitted, namely, upon an address by the Houses of parliament to the Queen. The section is as follows:—

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, on addresses from the Houses of parliament in Canada, and from the Houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces or any of them into the union, and on address from the Houses of parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land, and the Northwest Territories, or either of them, into the union on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act; and the provisions of any Order in Council in that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The Dominion parliament prepared an address with reference to the entry into the union of those territories, and I will take the liberty of reading a clause of the address in question to show what was in contemplation at that time. This is an address to Her Majesty the Queen from the Senate and House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, passed by this body on December 17th, 1867, and the clause to which I refer and which is peculiarly applicable to this discussion reads as follows:—

> That the welfare of a sparse and widely scattered population of British subjects of European origin, already inhabiting these remote and unorganized Territoiries would be materially enhanced by the formation therein of political institutions.

I call attention particularly to these words:—

> Bearing analogy, as far as circumstances will admit, to those which exist in the several provinces of this Dominion.

In view of this fact will any hon. gentleman say that the language embodied in that address and presented to the Queen in Council could bear two meanings, when the Senate and House of Commons in 1867 prayed the imperial parliament to grant them power over these Territories so that they might establish institutions analogous to those which existed in the several provinces of this Dominion. What other conclusion can we possibly arrive at, than that those institutions were to be the same as those provided for in the British North America Act?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did that address refer to what are now Manitoba and the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This address had reference to the Northwest Territories, not Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. POWER—At the time those Territories were not part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Manitoba was carved out of Rupert's Land, and there was an address for that which my hon. friend will find in the statutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am simply asking for information. It was only in 1869 that we got possession of those Territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The address I am speaking of had particular reference to the Northwest Territories. There was an address also presented practically at the same time having relation to the province of Manitoba which was about entering the union.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In 1867 ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This was passed on the 17th December, 1867, by the Senate and House of Commons, and is signed by Joseph Cauchon, Speaker of the Senate and James Cockburn, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That address was sent to the Queen in Council in order to supply defects supposed to exist as to the power of Canada to take in the territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Probably what the hon. gentleman has reference to is the Act of 1871, which dealt with an infirmity which was thought to exist as to the creation of provinces out of those territories.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Perhaps it was.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I should like to call my hon. friend's attention and ask his opinion with reference to section 146 of the British North America Act, as to whether under the last part of it provision was made merely for taking into the union the Northwest Territories and Rupert's Land, or whether it empowered the parliament, by address as mentioned there, to erect them into provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am of opinion that when section 146 was passed by the imperial parliament, it was thought sufficiently broad to give authority for the admission of those Territories as provinces into the Dominion; but afterwards it was thought better to specifically declare the fact, and consequently the passage of the Act of 1871.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Which superseded the Act of 1867 ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will come to that presently. In pursuance of the address to which I have directed the attention of hon. gentlemen, those Territories became part of the Dominion, and the admission into the union will be found in an imperial Order in Council dated 23rd June, 1870, the part of which relating to the admission of those Territories into the union being as follows:—

> It is hereby ordered and declared by Her Majesty, by and with the advice of the Privy Council, in pursuance and exercise of the power vested in Her Majesty by the said Acts of parliament, that from and after the 15th day of July, 1870, the said Northwestern Territory shall be admitted into and become part of the Dominion of Canada upon the terms and conditions set forth in the first hereinbefore recited address, and that the parliament of Canada shall from the day aforesaid have full power and authority to legislate for the future welfare and good government of the said territory.

I have cited this authority simply for the purpose of pointing out to the House what the territorial government had a right to expect at the time they memorialized this government to have a province or provinces established in that Northwest country. Therefore, I say that in view not only of the legislation which had been passed by this parliament, but in view of imperial legislation, they had a right to anticipate that the fullest measure of responsible government would be given them, and that they would be placed on a parity with the other provinces of this Dominion. That leads me to point out to hon. gentlemen some of the advantages of which we have been deprived, and which are enjoyed by the other provinces. The leader of the government in this House, when introducing this Bill the other evening, pointed out with considerable force and great eloquence the probable future of those provinces and the very important part they are calculated to play within this confederation, and I think I may safely say that my hon. friend in no way portrayed beyond the actualities of the situation the possibilities of those two provinces. I have no hesitation in saying from my place here this evening that the time will come within the observation of many hon. gentlemen present, when those provinces will occupy a more important position numerically, commercially, and in many other respects than any other of the provinces of Canada. Their natural resources and the various possibilities which are to be found within the boundaries of those provinces are calculated to make them more important in the various respects which I have pointed out than any of the older provinces. Consequently, my hon. friends would not have been mistaken in at the same time pointing out that they were entitled to as full a measure of government as the other provinces which now constitute the federation. In the first place, we have been deprived of our land, and I have yet heard no good reason advanced by the government why those lands should not have been given to those provinces. I might say that the Conservative party through its leader declared, previous to last election, that if that party came into power they would be prepared to hand the public domain over to the new governments. There is no reason to suppose that those local governments would not be able to administer those lands to very much greater advantage than the representatives of the Dominion government. When you take into consideration that the area of those two provinces will represent over 300,000,000 acres of land, and that those lands are to be administered from two to three thousand miles distant from where they lie, one can easily appreciate the almost impossible task which the federal government has taken upon itself. Now I venture to make the statement that not only the fathers of confederation, but the early leaders in the Dominion parliament immediately after confederation contemplated that when the time would arrive for the erection of those territories into provinces, the administration of their lands would be handed over to them, and I take the liberty of citing to hon. gentlemen opinions which were expressed upon that point, not only at the time of confederation but after confederation became a fact, and when the giants, I might say, amongst the Liberal leaders expressed themselves along the lines which I have indicated. Permit me to direct your attention to a statement made by Sir John Macdonald in the confederation debates as to what was contemplated to be given over to the provinces :—

> It will be seen that the local legislature have the control of all the local works; and it is a matter of great importance, and one of the chief advantages of the federal union and of local legislatures, that each province will have the power and means of developing its own resources and aiding its own progress after its own fashion and in its own way.

I need scarcely state to hon. gentlemen that it would be utterly impossible for a province to develop its resources except it were vested with the control of the lands. If anything is calculated to make those western provinces great, it must necessarily be the power to develop the natural resources lying within their boundaries. But coming down later, when the Newfoundland question was being discussed in the House of Commons in 1869, the late Alexander Mackenzie gave expression to what was in the minds of the framers of confederation when they drafted the powers relating to the local legislatures as to the lands, not only within their boundaries but as to the lands within the boundaries of that North-west Territory. Mr. Blake, in discussing the question of paying $150,000 for the Crown lands in Newfoundland, said :

> He was very strongly opposed to the Dominion acquiring the Crown lands of Newfoundland, and he has as strongly objected to Newfoundland being deprived of its Crown lands ; he commended the policy of the framers of the constitution in leaving to each of the provinces the control of their own public lands. This was from the Canadian point of view, then as to Newfoundland the arrangement was equally objectionable : (1) Its distance from the seat of government (2) and its small representation in parliament would lead to an unsatisfactory management.
> The local government would be deprived of the control of these lands, which might by it be rendered valuable for the future development of the colony.
>
> The development of mineral wealth could not be effected by raising a revenue, but by encouraging local enterprise. If the proposition was between giving Newfoundland $150,000 a year and taking her lands, and giving $150,000 a year and leaving her her lands, he would willingly vote for the latter (hear, hear). These lands under the local management of the government would contribute much more largely to the prosperity of Newfoundland than if they were in the hands of the government of Canada.

And he closed with an amendment to the resolution to this effect :

> That the public lands can be managed more efficiently, economically and satisfactorily by the provinces in which these lands are situated than by Canada, and that there is no good reason for a departure from the principle of the Union Act.

The Minister of Public Works having spoken on the subject, Mr. Mackenzie, in reply to what Mr. Blake had stated, said :

The Minister of Public Works, and the premier said they were surprised that the member for West Durham should object to our acquiring the public lands of Newfoundland after voting for the acquisition of lands in the Northwest Territories.

There was a difference between the two cases, in the Northwest Territories there were at present no constituted authorities as there were in Newfoundland, and it would not be pretended that after a government was established in the Northwest Territories we would administer its lands from Ottawa.

I ask hon. gentlemen if any better authority can be cited for the intention which was in the minds of the framers of confederation than the remark which was made by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie as long ago as 1869 ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Your friends did not adopt that system.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Two wrongs do not make a right. Why do your friends not adopt it ? This brings me down to another feature of the case. This Bill provides for compensation for the lands. I apprehend that when the present government concluded to give compensation to the two new provinces for the lands of which they have been deprived, it was tantamount to the admission that those provinces are entitled to their lands. Why talk of compensation ? Why talk of deprivation of lands ? Why fix a sum running into the millions, and designate the payment of that sum as compensation for those lands, if those provinces are not entitled to their lands ? I desire further to say that this is not really a compensation for their lands not being handed over. I should like to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the financial terms which largely have to do with this question of the lands. I know that on a hot evening like this a financial criticism is anything but entertaining, but we have this duty before us and consequently have to discharge it. It has been said in many quarters, not only by the government but by many who are opposed to this Bill, that the financial terms seem fairly generous. I venture to say that no one making a close analysis of those terms would conclude, in view of the surrounding circumstances, that they can be said to be generous. In round terms each province starts out with a money grant of one million dollars, made up as follows :

For civil government..	$ 50,000
For capitation allowance... ..	200,000
Debt allowance..	405,375
Land compensation..	375,000

This would amount to $1,030,000. For the purpose of keeping the figures in our minds with greater facility, let us say that the two provinces are each receiving one million dollars a year, or two million dollars for the two. As has been pointed out by the leader of the government, when introducing this Bill, the estimates for last year in connection with those Territories as stated by the Prime Minister, exceeded the sum of $1,600,000. It was pointed out by the Prime Minister, when introducing his Bill, that this sum would have to be considerably augmented during the present year if provincial autonomy were not adopted; or to speak perhaps more correctly, he said the increasing expenses of the Territories were of such a character as to not only warrant, but to necessitate, the government increasing the estimates of $1,600,000 for last year. At the same time he very properly pointed out that the establishment of two provinces meant a duplication of administrative machinery which must necessarily add to the expenditure. I would point out to hon. gentlemen that the additional expense consequent upon the duplication of governmental machinery would possibly approximate $400,000, which, if provincial autonomy were not adopted and if two territorial governments were administering the affairs of the Territories, would necessitate an appropriation being made by the government of at least $2,000,000 for the purposes of those Territories during the present year. I will point out some of the items which will be duplicated or partly duplicated, and hon. gentlemen will see that they are very large items. For instance, last session $101,540 was granted for civil government, $21,375 for legislation, $29,000 for administration of justice, and $345,125 for education.

Now, the first three items must necessarily be duplicated on account of the creation of two governments. The item of $345,125 for education to a substantial extent must be increased, inasmuch as the educational machinery for these vast provinces will require to be duplicated hereafter. Then there were items such as agriculture and statistics, hospitals, charities and public health, miscellaneous, public works, justice and so on. Many of those items will have to be increased, so that the terms granted and which by the government have been claimed to be more than generous, are not so liberal as have been represented. Those claims of generous treatment are simply a phantasm placed before us to reconcile us to the deprivation of our lands. The grant for compensation for lands for the first year for each province will amount to $375,000. Now it would seem from what was said when this Bill was introduced by the Prime Minister, that this amount of $750,000 which is being paid over by the Dominion government to the new provinces, would be an entirely new item being peculiarly stated to be in the nature of compensation for lands, and that we would be that much ahead. Hon. gentlemen will appreciate the statement that subtracting this item of compensation for lands, $750,000, from the sum which was voted last year, namely, $1,600,000, would leave the Territories in debt to the extent of several hundred thousand dollars, so that it would be utterly impossible on the basis of last year's estimates to run the civil government of the provinces. I say therefore that the so-called financial terms are entirely inadequate to the requirements of the new provinces. Many hon. gentlemen have pointed out that they far exceed the terms given to the other provinces at confederation. Many hon. gentlemen, and particularly those in the other House, who advocated the Bill, seemed to think that if those new provinces received the same terms from the federal government that the old Canadas and the maritime provinces received, they would be getting all they were entitled to. Perhaps we are not always in sympathy with the demands which have been made by the older provinces for better terms, but when we take into consideration the fact that thirty odd years have passed since confederation, that the public expenditures have increased enormously from that time, that the demands made upon the provinces from time to time have been equally large in proportion with the demands which are made upon the central government, we must come to the conclusion that the standard of terms adopted at that time is entirely inadequate at the present day. Hon. gentlemen can appreciate that fact when they recall that the revenue of this country in 1868 was only about $12,000,000 and the expenditure about the same. To-day we have reached a revenue of about $80,000,000, and the expenditure considerably exceeds that, and yet we find the same terms given to the provinces on the statute-book at that day in the law of to-day. Therefore I say to have adopted those terms as the terms the new provinces should receive would be entirely inadequate to the requirements of the situation, and would not have permitted the machinery of government to be carried on in an efficient way. I further desire to point out to the House that these terms are not terms given in compensation for our lands, that they are entirely misleading, that those terms have been simply estimated on the basis of the appropriations made last year by the House of Commons, and which were not more than sufficient to carry on the ordinary services of the government in the Territories for last year. I would point out the disadvantages at which those provinces are placed owing to what will be our insufficient revenue. I am not familiar with the revenues enjoyed by many of the provinces from their lands but it is a well known fact that all the other provinces excepting Manitoba have the control of their lands. During the last 20 years the province of Ontario has collected through the Crown Lands Department on account of lands and timber sales the enormous sum of $28,500,000. Consider that for a moment; and how much of the public domain is exhausted by reason of that? Only 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those were timber lands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are Crown lands, and mines, and only 20 per cent of that domain has been exhausted. It means that Ontario is now in receipt of a revenue of at least $2,000,000 a year from its Crown lands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From its timber, not its Crown lands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend should know that the timber would go with the land.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Unfortunately you have not the timber in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the lands without the timber are more valuable. I therefore say by way of illustration that in Ontario where the taxes are high, where the expenditure is up to the revenue, the province has no more than it can get along with under the terms which it receives by the Act of Union, in addition to the $2,000,000 which it derives from its public lands. It might be said, and has been said, whenever this question has been discussed that Manitoba did not receive its public lands. I would point out to hon. gentlemen that when Manitoba entered the union somewhere like 1,500,000 acres of land was given within the narrow confines at that time of the province to its half-breed population. A very large grant of lands was given for university purposes, and in addition shortly after the Act of Union, under the 'Better Terms' Act, the province was given its swamp lands, a magnificent and valuable asset to-day. So that Manitoba, although it was not given all its lands, was at the time and has been since given such a quantity of lands as to establish a revenue which helps to augment to a surprising degree the other terms to which she is entitled. Under these circumstances you must agree with me that these new provinces should have been given their lands. Now, why were those lands not given? As pointed out by Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. Blake and Sir John Macdonald at the time and after confederation, and as must appeal to the mind of every hon. gentlemen to-day, those new provinces could administer their lands to infinitely greater advantage than they could be administered from the city of Ottawa. What would you hon. gentlemen who come from the maritime provinces think if you had to approach the authorities in Ottawa with reference to every transaction incident to your public lands—if you required a hay permit, or to cut a cord of wood—no matter how insignificant the service you wished to perform upon those lands—if you had to approach an officer of the federal government before being able to secure the right to do so? Would not the intelligence of the people of those provinces be equal to the administration of their lands? In the public interest, as well as in the interest of those provinces, I cannot conceive any reason why those lands should not have been handed over to the provinces, except it be to give that advantage to the central government which it is bound to enjoy, consisting chiefly of party patronage and all the prestige which accompanies that from being able to administer a public domain, approaching an area 320,000,000 acres. When hon. gentlemen consider this, that the school lands which have been sold since 1872 down to the present time have averaged no less than $10 an acre—and hon. gentlemen can verify this by the return which was yesterday laid on the table at my instance—one can readily perceive the injury which will accrue to this Dominion from the haphazard and reckless administration of public lands which for years has been going on and is being continued at the present time. When you consider that an average of $10 an acre has been realized for these school lands, and place that fact in contrast with the disclosures which have been made from time to time within the last couple of years that public lands have been alienated in those Territories for $1 an acre, that railway corporations, syndicates and aggregations of individuals are acquiring those lands for a song, one cannot fail to be alarmed at this reckless administration of the most magnificent public domain with which a people have ever been endowed.

Before touching upon some of the more important features of the Bill I should like to direct attention to the distribution of the electoral seats within the new provinces. While this possibly may not apply to the entire principle of the Bill, yet I must point out to the hon. gentleman that the grossest injustice has been done to the southern part of the Territories which is by very considerably the most populous part in the distribution of the electoral boundaries which has been embodied in this Bill. Now representation by population had long been the battle cry of the old Liberal party, and up to the time of their accession to power in 1896 the Liberal party had regarded representation by population as almost sacred. But when this Bill was being framed, when it was being passed in the House of Commons, there was stamped upon it the most infamous gerrymander that has ever been put upon a statute-book in Canada or anywhere else. When Manitoba was taken into confederation the Manitoba Act provided that the Lieutenant Governor shall . . . by proclamation under the Great Seal, divide the said province into twenty-four electoral divisions, due regard being had to existing local divisions and population. Had this been done in the present Bill it would have met the requirements of public opinion in those Territories. It was represented not only by those opposed to the Bill, but it was represented in the most vehement terms by the Liberal party, Liberal associations, the Liberal press and Liberal leaders, by the most influential parties in the southerly part of the Territories that the grossest and most serious injustice was being done to the most populous parts of the Territories at the instance of those who conceived and carried out this gerrymander. It was proposed to the government that this very serious question should be referred to a judicial commission; but the government turned it down. It was proposed that an equitable distribution should take place in each of the federal electoral districts, but that was turned down, although the Minister of Justice made no concealment of his view as to the injustice of the distribution; yet notwithstanding all that was done even by representative Liberals from that western country, this still remains in the Bill and apparently will become law. In the Territories a distribution of electoral seats for the territorial government took place as late as 1902. Fifteen seats were given to the proposed province of Alberta. I might point out to hon. gentlemen who are not acquainted with the geography of that country that half way between Edmonton and Calgary is the populous town of Red Deer. It is the dividing line practically between the north and the south. Under that distribution six members were given to the northerly part of Alberta and nine to the southerly part. That is two-fifths to the north and three-fifths to the south; and that represented, I might say, the difference in population between the north and the south—as six was to nine.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Did the nine include Red Deer?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Red Deer was partly in each of those two divisions. That was satisfactory to all parties; but what do we find in this case. I say without fear of contradiction—I may be contradicted as far as the statement is concerned, but I say without fear of successful contradiction—that the southerly part of the Territories has been growing faster than the north, as the returns to the government will show; when this matter is up in committee, when time will not hang perhaps so heavily on our hands as at present, my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) and myself will be able, if desired to establish this to the satisfaction of this body. Twenty-five members have been given to the province of Alberta, a majority of whom are to represent the northerly half, and why is that? Because the unpardonable crime was committed at the general election in November last, by the southerly half of Alberta, of electing two Conservative members, while the northerly part of the province elected two Liberal members. The public in that free country thought that no very serious results would befall them in sending to Ottawa a couple of representatives of the Conservative party. They were scarcely able to penetrate the designs of the Liberal party in the event of their being retained in power. But be that as it may, we find that by reason of a free people exercising their franchise in the very intelligent way that they did, they have been penalized to the extent of practically being deprived of the franchise, the administration, or absolute control as I might put it, of provincial affairs being placed in the hands of a majority of the representatives in the northern part of the country. I might say the same thing of Saskatchewan. It was not confined to the province of Alberta. The public of the province of Saskatchewan, a free and enlightened public, thought in exercising their franchise that they had the right to elect a Conservative. In the southerly part of Saskatchewan, a Conservative was elected and the consequence is, that the penalty is now being paid by a practical deprivation of representation in the new province of Saskatchewan. I would point out that in Saskatchewan, where a representation of 25 members is given, drawing a line betwen north and south, taking as the pivotal point the electoral district of Yorkton, ten members have been given north of that and 15 south. According to the voters on the list at the last general election, that gives an average of 1,617 votes in each southern constituency to an average of 733 votes in each constituency in the northern part of the district. I ask hon. gentlemen who belong to the party which, for so many years have been preaching representation by population, if that is fair-play, if that is their idea of justice ?,

In view of the figures which can be established beyond all peradventure to support the facts which I have stated I trust that they will not, when this Bill comes before the Committee of the Whole, permit gross injustice of that kind to be done to the people of those two new provinces, particularly when, in addition to that, you consider that a very large proportion of that northern country is composed of a foreign population, not able to speak the English language, not familiar with our institutions, a population that will not assimilate with our own people for many years to come. I ask you if your patriotism should not rise beyond your partyism and impel you to undo the injustice which is being done to those two new provinces. When this matter comes before committee I hope to be in a position to establish by figures and other data the facts to which I have already directed your attention. There is another feature of the Bill which I would take the liberty of discussing notwithstanding the hour being somewhat late, and that is the educational clause. I said a few moments ago that when the Territorial government memorialized this government for provincial powers, they had a right to expect that consideration which was due to them at the hands of the federal government. The expectations of the territorial government, particularly upon this question, were of such a character as to lead them with, I might say, the greatest confidence, to rely upon securing all the advantages which the British North America Act would give them with reference to the question of education. They could not overlook the fact that so recently as 1895 and 1896 the present leader of the Liberal party had conducted a campaign throughout the length and breadth of Canada, denouncing the government which had been led by my hon. friend to my left, who was succeeded by Sir Charles Tupper, with reference to the Manitoba Remedial Bill. There was scarcely a part of this Dominion where the denunciations not only of that right hon. gentleman but of the Liberal party generally were not heard with reference to the question of coercion of the provinces. Going back to the confederation debates, I need not direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that from that time down to the present around the educational question the battle of provincial rights has ever been fought. There is no question contained within the 91st, 92nd and 93rd sections over which there has been greater controversy, and over which provincial rights have been more bitterly fought and firmly established, than the educational question; and up to the time of the Manitoba school question I think I might say the Liberal party had been fairly consistent in according to each province the rights of the union upon the question of education. In fact, I think a perusal of the confederation debates would almost lead one to the conclusion that what led to the federal union which we enjoy to-day was the apprehension which existed in the minds of the public men of Quebec at that time that if they were to enjoy the privileges which had been accorded to them by treaty in view of the rapid growth which was being made by the province of Upper Canada, and by the other English-speaking provinces they must have a federal union by which those rights would be observed in all their integrity. We know that the representatives of the English-speaking provinces were more in favour of legislative union than of a federal union, that the Quebec leaders, Sir George Cartier and others, were in favour of federal union, because they concluded that it was only by a federal union that their rights could be best protected, and the rights which they had in view particularly were the rights of education. From that day down to the present, the people of Quebec have been extremely jealous as to provincial rights, and more particularly as to the right of education.

Now, I venture to say that it was a mistake to so accentuate education at the time of union, although I may stand unsupported. I think Sir Alexander Galt showed undue apprehension when he insisted upon special provisions being made for the recognition of the rights of the minority in Quebec as well as in Ontario. I think if the framers of confederation had relied upon the tolerance and the generosity of the majority in both those provinces, that the rights of the minority would have been enjoyed very much more quietly, comfortably and securely than under the statute which has been passed to protect them. I notice in looking over the confederation debates that John Sandfield Macdonald, a Roman Catholic himself, was in favour of relying in both Canadas upon the majority without the intervention of statutory safeguards.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He always opposed separate schools, just as George Brown did. He allowed my Bill to pass by a special agreement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He was not apparently opposed to separate schools.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I say Sandfield Macdonald was just as much opposed to separate schools as George Brown. That Bill was passed under his regime by a special agreement with myself.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I take no exception to the minority having their separate schools in the Northwest Territories, if the right be given them by the constitution. This right if given by the Confederation Act, which I dispute, should be given them in the fullest integrity, but nothing more nor less than the law provides in the constitution.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the British North America Act is interpreted by the Privy Council in their favour, they are entitled to separate schools of the fullest and widest character consistent with an efficient system of education. If they are entitled to separate schools by the constitution, then they are entitled to something more than a skeleton. They are entitled to something more than what my hon. friend described last night, as a mere symbol, or skeleton or the shadow of a substance.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—A sham.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Is the hon. gentleman in favour of separate schools being granted to them in their entirety ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not in favour of separate schools. But I say that all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of the Bill have not touched the question at issue at all, but they have dealt with a question entirely foreign to this Bill. The question of separate schools is not at issue in this discussion. The question at issue in this measure, and the question which the people of the Northwest Territories protest against, is that notwithstanding the provisions of the constitution, this government has invaded the rights of the province, has encroached upon the rights under the constitution to which we are entitled, and by a specific provision has said that notwithstanding the constitution we must recognize separate schools in all their entirety.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman state where the protest came from in the Northwest Territory ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is the occasion when his partner, Mr. Bennet, came up to Ontario and raised a rebellion at the elections.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The people of the Northwest Territories are sufficiently well aware that notwithstanding all they might have done after the introduction of this Bill, no matter what injustice might be contained within it, no remedy would be accorded them in response to their protests. But I will say to my hon. friend that this question immediately upon the organization of the Territories will become a burning question, that while my hon. friend opposite and his government fancy that this question is settled, it has only begun to receive attention in the Territories. For many years to come it will be a bone of contention between the different religions in those new provinces, and the strife engendered will be entirely due to the despotic and unwarranted manner in which it has ben introduced by the present government.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I wanted to know whether we are to understand that the hon. gentleman was advocating that separate schools should be granted in their entirety ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I said before, I say again that the question has nothing to do with separate schools. The question to be determined and which we are asked to determine now is whether the constitution permits those new provinces to deal exclusively—to use the terms of the British North America Act—to deal exclusively with education, or whether this government, notwithstanding the constitutional rights to which they are entitled have the power to impose upon those new provinces a restrictive provision, and obligation, which we say is unconstitutional.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is not quoting the constitution properly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say to my hon. friend when he tells me that I am not quoting the constitution properly, that I certainly will not take from him any view which he may entertain upon the question of the constitution because if I know of any hon. gentleman who is not capable of expressing a disinterested view upon a subject of this kind it is my hon. friend. I say there was never a more monstrous proposition placed upon the 'Hansard' than the statement made by my hon. friend on the introduction of this Bill, as to the constitutional authority exercised by this government with reference to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made no reference to it at all. I did not discuss it. I merely answered a number of questions with regard to it, and went on with the general Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend seemingly does not know what he has done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will take an opportunity later on to discuss the matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend does not seem to be responsible or aware of what he said. If my hon. friend says that he did not make any reference to the constitutional authorities upon which the introduction of this Bill was based, I certainly must differ with him. My hon. friend in introducing this Bill said that it was based upon the provisions contained in the Northwest Territories Act passed by the government in 1875, and my hon. friend went on to lay down the proposition that authority was given to this parliament in 1875 by the imperial government to pass the Northwest Territories Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I said that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And that that Act had all the authority of an imperial statute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman made use of an expression that I scarcely think he would characterize as parliamentary when he said the hon. gentleman was not responsible for what he said.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I certainly will retract anything of that kind because I know the hon. gentleman is responsible for what he said, but if I understood him rightly to say he quoted no constitutional authority on the introduction of the Bill, I must certainly differ with him. My hon. friend went into a lengthy discussion upon the effect of the Act of 1875. If my hon. friend says he did not, I shall very gladly withdraw the statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said briefly that the Act of 1875 was under the authority of the Imperial Act of 1871. I said that, and I say it now, the federal parliament had just the same power as the imperial parliament had when it passed the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say to my hon. friend with all due deference that the Imperial Act of 1871 had nothing to do with the Act of 1875. The Act of 1871 was passed for the purpose of removing a doubt which existed in the minds of the government of Canada as to its rights to create provinces out of these territories, and had in view the exercise of the very power which we are exercising on this occasion in the passage of these Bills. If my hon. friend will look at the Act of 1871 he will see it was also passed to remove certain doubts which had arisen with reference to the Manitoba Act.

In creating the province of Manitoba out of Rupert's Land the educational rights to which the province of Manitoba was entitled were invaded to the extent of placing a qualification in the Manitoba Act of union, and the question arose as every hon. gentleman should know, and I presume does know, as to whether the parliament of Canada had a right to impose that restriction upon the province of Manitoba with reference to education. So serious was the doubt as to their exercising that authority that they obtained the Act of 1871 to validate the Manitoba Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman looks at the English Act he will see it goes a great deal further than what he says.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It of course deals with other subjects. While they were about it they removed a doubt which they thought existed in regard to section 146 of the British North America Act and at the same time granted power to erect provinces out of those Territories. That was the Act of 1871. So that I will say to my hon. friend that it was not in pursuance of that Imperial Act that the Northwest Territories Act was passed. The Northwest Territories Act was passed in pursuance of the authority given to the Canadian parliament under the Imperial Order in Council to which I directed the attention of the House before my hon. friend came in, by which was delegated the power to pass laws for the peace, order and good government of those Territories. Consequently this Act was passed in 1875, for the purpose of giving to the territorial council authority to govern those Territories in a limited way. But that in no way changed the right which those Territories had when they should become established as provinces to an exclusive right to legislate as to education. I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to one of the drafts of the British North America Act. My hon. friend yesterday, in introducing the Bill referred, I think, to the original draft of the British North America Act, which can be found by any hon. gentleman in Mr. Pope's confederation papers. But one of the last drafts of the Act in providing that to each province a number of powers should be given, and among them education, omitted the word 'exclusive.' Now when the Act was submitted to the imperial authorities for the purpose of accentuating the right of the provinces to legislate upon the question of education, we find the word 'exclusive' introduced into it. It was introduced, I think, in the last draft which was passed by the fathers of confederation, but in the earlier draft of the British North America Act the word 'exclusive' was not inserted. If any hon. gentleman desires to look into this matter, he will find that in the earlier draft it was thought, in delegating to the local legislature the right to legislate on education, that the word 'exclusive' was not necessary but afterwards the exclusive right to legislate was given.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Subject to certain exceptions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to express the opinion that subsections 1, 3 and 4 were not intended to apply to all provinces, not only the four provinces which formed confederation but to all future provinces which might join the union ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For the purpose of discussing it a little more intelligently I will read the clause. It is as follows :—

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions.

I say that that applied to all the provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—And to these new provinces ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If there were conditions in that country answering to the case provided for I would for the purposes of this argument say yes. Then the second subsection reads as follows :—

2. All the powers, privileges and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

I say clause 2 only applied to old Canada. Then subsection 3 would of course apply to any province. It reads as follows:—

3. Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

That of course would apply to any province where a system of denominational or separate school education was adopted after the union.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Or that existed at the time of the union?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEEED—Yes, I think as far as the application of those sections are concerned, we are not very much apart, provided the conditions existed. What are the facts? We are asked to legislate here with reference to a fact which does not exist. The British North America Act provides in subsection 1 that nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the time of the union. The territories became part of the union on July 15, 1870. I read to hon. gentlemen a moment ago the Imperial Order in Council introducing those Territories into the union, and that Order in Council was to take effect on and after July 15, 1870.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman state that the union was complete at that time?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will approach that in a moment. On July 15, 1870, the Territories became part of the union, part of the confederation of Canada expressly under the Imperial Order in Council. It was not until 1875 that any system of education was introduced into these Territories, consequently there was at the time of the union no system of denominational schools within the boundaries of those Territories. Consequently subsection 1 could not possibly have any application to the peculiar conditions which then existed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman might answer the question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am going to answer it. The government was fully convinced of the fact that the union referred to in subsection 1 of section 93 was the union of July 15, 1870, otherwise they would not have introduced into this Bill subclause 3 of clause 17. Hon. gentlemen will see that this is a most remarkable statement to introduce into the statute. Is the British North America Act not sufficiently clear? Is it not for the courts of the realm to determine the meaning of those Acts without the parliament of Canada undertaking to interpret the meaning of a constitutional enactment. Hon. gentlemen will see that under subclause 3 of clause 17 we are asked to make a declaration as to what the meaning of that clause is. It is this arbitrary interference to which the people of those new provinces take exception, and demand that the proper courts interpret what their rights shall be.

Where the expression 'by law' is employed in paragraph 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said chapters 29 and 30.

Those chapters are the ordinances passed by the Northwest Territories in 1901; and will any hon. gentleman here say that when the British North America Act was passed, when the framers of confederation between 1860-67, gave their best thought and attention to the drafting of this clause, they had in view an ordinance to be passed by an assembly which then had not an existence, and an ordinance which was not passed for 30 years afterwards. We are asked to say that the law which was passed in 1867 looked ahead for 30 odd years, and contemplated as I say the existence of an assembly which then was unknown and the passage of the two ordinances which then could not possibly have been in anticipation. The imperial parliament, in passing section 93, had in view the law as it then stood within the boundaries of any part of the union of Canada. The Bill goes on:—

Where the expression 'at the union' is employed in the said subsection 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

Why, the Northwest Territories have been in the union for 30 odd years, since the 15th July, 1870, and yet we are asked coolly and deliberately by this parliament to enact a wilful misstatement, that what the law meant at that time was the legislation about to be passed at this time. What union?

There is no union to be consummated at this time. These territories are simply being erected into provinces. The territories at the present time are as much part of confederation as the old provinces of Canada, as the maritime provinces of the Dominion, as Manitoba or British Columbia ; and will any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, will my hon. friend who leads the government point out one jot or tittle of any constitutional authority or of any statutory enactment showing that these territories are not as much a part of the union as any of the provinces of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not yet.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then hon. gentlemen we are asked for the purpose of this legislation and for the purposes of changing the constitution and for the purposes of coercing the territories and for the purpose of imposing upon them an obligation which the constitution never contemplated, to enact what is absolutely a wilful misstatement, clothing those territories retroactively with all the attributes of a province and setting forward the hands of time from the 15th July, 1870, to the 1st July, 1905. I ask my hon. friend from de Salaberry, who is a very keen lawyer, if he for a moment thinks that if the constitutional rights for which the government contend, are to be found within the four corners of the British North America Act, they require legislation of this kind to bolster up a so-called constitutional case which they are endeavouring to make for the purpose of shackling and throttling those territories for all time to come. I do not wish to misconstrue what my hon. friend the Secretary of State said, but I did understand him to say that when the statute of 1875 was passed, giving separate schools to those territories with all the force and effect of an imperial statute, no attempt was ever made to repeal it, that no exception was ever taken to it, and that it remained there like the laws of the Medes and Persians, fixed and unalterable for all time to come. If my hon. friend had perused the parliamentary journals upon this question he could not fail to have acquainted himself with the fact that time and again the territorial government demanded the repeal of that statute, and that time and again members in the House of Commons directed the attention of the government to the fact that public opinion in the territories demanded its repeal, and that time and again it was represented to parliament by the leader of the government that the Act was but temporary, pending the erection of those territories into provinces. Sir John Thompson, in 1894, said :—

> What the constitution of the future provinces shall be, in view of the pledges which have been referred to, or in view of any other set of circumstances, will be for parliament to decide when it decides to create those provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend can get any comfort out of that he is entitled to it. I think I shall be able to point out to my hon. friend as I proceed, that the opinion of Sir John Thompson was that the legislation was but temporary and was simply placed upon the statute-book pending the erection of those Territories into provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understood the hon. gentleman to read a statement by Sir John Thompson that parliament could give any sort of constitution it pleased to a province when erected into a province.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Sir John Thompson was catechised by Mr. McCarthy at the time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then he would be careful as to what he said.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Mr. McCarthy asked this question and Sir John Thompson gave the answer as follows :—

> As I understood the First Minister in his answer to the hon. member for West Assiniboia—perhaps I was wrong, but I would like to be corrected if I was wrong—rather insisted upon the view I am putting which is that if separate schools are continued until the Northwest Territories are given provincial autonomy they will have the right of insisting upon that being continued when provincial autonomy is conferred upon them.
>
> Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say that.
>
> Mr. McCARTHY. Then I fail to understand the views which the First Minister holds. He seems to be on both sides of the question.
>
> Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not at all. If I spoke ambiguously before, I was not at all conscious of it ; but I cannot be said to be ambiguous after the explanation I made to the hon. member for Assiniboia. I appealed to the House to continue the present system while the territorial system continued, and I declared that in my opinion the whole subject would be open and free to parliament as to what constitution we would give to the provinces when provinces were created.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In view of what my hon. friend the leader of the House has said, that that statute was fixed and unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, I find it difficult to reconcile that statement with the statement of so great a constitutional lawyer as Sir John Thompson, so that, I hope, may confirm my hon. friend from Halifax in the faith which I hold. Let me cite a few authorities from the Liberal ranks, whose views upon this question were looked upon as oracular and worthy of the very best attention. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in discussing this question in 1896, said:—

It is impossible to admit for instance that the institutions of the Northwest are permanent. On the contrary they are exceptionally temporary; they deal with a state of things which is exceptional in itself; they were devised at a time when there was no population and they must be modified from time to time as the necessities of the case require. But at this moment to say they are permanent is a thing in which I cannot agree except so far as they must be permanent in every particular, so long as we are not ready to give these people a more extended form of authority.

The late Hon. David Mills, than whom in the composition of the Liberal party there was no greater constitutional authority in Canada, speaking in parliament in 1894, said:—

When you look at the subject of education prior to the union you will find not that any system was expressly imposed upon the province, not that the principle of separate schools was virtually established, but the rule was established that where separate schools were established and had been established before the union, they should remain, and where they were not established, the province should retain control over the subject to introduce them or prevent their introduction as seemed proper to the people. We have a practical illustration of this fact in the position of things in the maritime provinces and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. So far as the Territories were concerned—I do not at all admit that the introduction of separate schools there stands upon the same footing as the introduction of separate schools in the province of Ontario, or of dissentient schools in the province of Quebec. In these provinces they are protected under the constitution; they cannot be interfered with by the local legislature. But in the Northwest Territories, as the hon. minister has said, it has been a matter not of right, not of guarantee to any particular class of the population, but a matter of policy. They were introduced with the view of preventing conflict in this House upon the subject of separate schools and for the reason that they were introduced there they should be maintained as long as these Territories are under the control of this parliament. When this parliament has discharged its duties and the people of the Territories have received the population to entitle them to enter the union they must assume the responsibility for deciding for themselves under the British North America Act how far they should maintain the principle of separate schools or maintain the non-denominational system. Any attempt on our part, whatever our inclinations or feelings may be, to anticipate what ought to be done in that particular, by the province after its autonomy is established, instead of being a source of security to its institutions would be a source of great danger.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Does the hon. gentleman agree with his view?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is a view expressed by the Hon. Mr. Mills, and that is the only constitutional interpretation which I think can be placed upon the statutory enactment which we have before us.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is to this effect: that so long as the Northwest Territories are in the union as territories, but not as provinces, that section 93 of the constitutional Act does not apply I understand that the hon. gentleman concurs in this view?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My view is that this parliament should not interfere in the question of education; that the passage of an Act erecting those territories into provinces would have brought section 93 to play automatically, and whatever rights were included in section 93, the supporters of separate schools would have all the advantage thereof, or in other words, when this constitution was passed, provision was made in anticipation of those territories being created into provinces; and whatever the rights of the minority are under the Confederation Act, they are entitled to nothing more nor less.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman very frankly answered the previous question. He stated in answer to a question I took the liberty of putting that section 93, subsections 1, 3 and 4 was intended to apply to all the provinces joining the confederation as provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, if the conditions existed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—And now I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he does not admit that this subsection of section 93 did not apply to the Northwest Territories so long as they remained territories instead of being provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is what Mr. Mills contended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Section 93 did not apply while the Territories were in a state of tutelage, so to speak. But immediately those territories become erected into provinces section 93 comes into operation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then the hon. gentleman should admit that the words 'at the union' cannot be taken to mean at the time of the purchasing of those territories as territories, but it must necessarily mean at the union of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I answer that question by asking one, what does section 93 mean by 'the union'?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It means the provinces or territories coming into confederation as a union.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What date does the hon. gentleman fix for this Act coming into force? 1st September, 1905?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then my answer to my hon. friend is that if this section 93 means what he says, why legislate in this way as we are now being asked to do? Is it not an imperial statute? Is it not already a fundamental law of the Dominion; and if that be the case, and there is no doubt about it, why are we performing this work of supererogation, solemnly declaring what the law is to be?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is to avoid contention on this point, as to whether it shall apply the law as it stood in virtue of the Act of 1875, or as to whether it shall apply the law as embodied in the ordinances, and it is moreover for the purpose of removing questions of doubt, as the hon. gentleman has expressed it, and as was expressed by the hon. leader of the opposition in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Removing a doubt in favour of the Catholics or against them?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If the hon. gentleman takes his law from the hon. gentleman from Calgary or the hon. leader of the opposition, he will admit that there is a great deal in this Bill in favour of the minority and much more than we would be entitled to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The very best answer I can give to my hon. friend is this: if he and his friends are so confident of the rights of the minority having been already provided for under the British North America Act and of their wide and comprehensive character, then I think he is doing a very great injustice, not only to himself, but to his co-religionists, if he votes for the Bill and reduces the rights of the minority to the skeleton described by the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would the hon. gentleman have supported the Bill if we had relied on the British North America Act?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A good many of the hon. gentleman's friends did not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the hon. gentleman will withdraw clause 17 and rely on the educational clauses in the British North America Act, I will support the educational feature most heartily. Another hon. gentleman who stood high in the councils of the Liberal party, regarded as a constitutional authority, was Sir Louis Davies, and in 1891, in expressing an opinion on this point, he spoke as follows:—

My opinion is now and has been for years that when that time comes you cannot withhold from the provinces so erected the right to determine for themselves the question of education in one way or the other. I would be the last to favour this parliament imposing upon the people there any system of education, either free or separate. I only claim that when a Bill is introduced to erect those territories into provinces that Bill should contain a provision enabling the people of the different provinces so created to decide what system of education they shall have. I do not discuss that question now. I only express this view lest I might be supposed by my silence to give assent to some extreme doctrines which hon. gentlemen have propounded. In view of the remarks which have been made, I thought it necessary to disclaim that, in assenting to the passing of this Bill, I bound myself for all time on this question of education. I do not. Although we are giving powers almost equal to those conferred upon local legislatures, we are not erecting the territories into separate provinces. When that is done I suppose it will be done by the Queen in Council under the 146th section of the British North America Act, and I simply claim the right when that time comes to determine for myself. In accordance with the view I have always held and hold now, I have no hesitation in expressing, respectfully, that the people of those new provinces should have the right to determine what system of education they shall have.

Then at that time my hon. friend formed an alliance with the late Dalton McCarthy. They were very glad to accept the support of that hon. gentleman at that time. And what was his view? He was regarded as no mean authority upon a constitutional question. In 1890 Mr. McCarthy, in the Dominion parliament, contended that the Northwest assembly should have power to deal with this question of education in an unrestricted manner. In 1894 he said that he had tried for many years to have this change made. He referred to the assembly resolution, and said that since that time from session to session, whenever the Bill has been brought up petition after petition has been presented to this House. So far as I know, no petition has been presented against that power to deal with education being conferred.

Mr. McCarthy moved an amendment in these terms, and a long and important debate ensued. The ground taken against Mr. McCarthy was that the arrangement was only temporary, to last only until provincial rights were conferred. 'It is perfectly plain,' said Mr. Mills, 'that if we are not to make this House and this parliament the arena of religious contention, if we are not to raise religion against religion, and race against race in this parliament of Canada, we must abstain from undertaking to make this a battle ground for a decision of the question as to whether in the territories there shall be a question of wholly secular education or not. We leave that question under the restrictions imposed by the Act of 1875 to the territories; and when they have obtained the maturity entitling them to representation as a province, then the legislature of that province, subject to the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, must decide for themselves what system of education shall be established there,' and again, 'when the territories have a sufficient population to entitle them to become a province, they must decide for themselves whether they must have separate schools or not.' And I may quote to hon. gentlemen the opinion of Mr. Christopher Robinson, than whom there is not a more careful and weighty lawyer in the Dominion upon this question. Mr. Robinson stated emphatically that there was no obligation cast upon this government to legislate as to education.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I will not pretend for my part that there is any obligation except the spirit of the constitution.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then my hon. friend does not agree with Sir Wilfrid Laurier who contended strongly that there was an obligation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—He did not contend that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So much for what I might term the constitutional opinion of constitutional lawyers upon the question. As to the spirit of the enactment which has been referred to by my hon. friend, let me say—and I think every hon. gentleman must necessarily agree with me—that the only way in which the constitution can be interpreted must be according to the letter of the law. If we are to take into consideration my hon. friend's version of what the spirit of the constitution is—and we must set against that what the hon. leader of the opposition may regard as the spirit of the constitution—could we ever get an interpretation of the constitution? When hon. gentlemen talk about interpreting the constitution according to the rights and liberties and consciences of the people, they talk about an impossibility, and no man of common sense, once he gives deliberate consideration to that question, can come to any other conclusion than that it would be impossible to deal with such question other than according to the strict letter of the law. I ask if it will be possible in view of the different races, religions, and sentiments of the people of this Dominion, province against province, one section of the Dominion against another, if we are to consider the constitution as having to be interpreted according to its spirit, if a conclusion could ever be arrived at. All I have to do is to mention the fact to my hon. friend opposite, and I feel thoroughly satisfied he will agree with me. I listened to my hon. friend from Wellington with a considerable degree of pleasure this afternoon because I thought he was going to arrive at a different conclusion. It struck me that he presented one of the strongest arguments that could possibly be presented why the six months hoist should be carried, and the Bill should not become law. He went on to describe the various enactments passed by the federal authorities and imposed upon the provinces which had been against the sentiment and the local rights of the provinces, and he pointed out that every enactment which he referred to as having been imposed against the constitutional rights of the provinces had resulted disastrously for the Dominion.

I say to hon. gentlemen that you cannot, by passing a law of this kind, throttle and choke the people of any particular province with reference to a question upon which they have a strong feeling of resentment. You cannot say unto the people of those new provinces: 'We are interpreting for you the constitution according to its spirit, and we are going to force upon you educational restrictions and qualifications which are not warranted by the constitution.' You have to rely upon the moderation and toleration of the different peoples of this Dominion and their readiness to accord to the minority, those rights to which they are entitled. I was about to read to you a few moments ago a passage from the speech of the Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald towards the close of the confederation debates on this question, and so well has he expressed the sentiment which I would like to express, that it seems to me I cannot do better than read the remarks he made on that subject. He said:—

I rise, Sir, to propose another amendment. I assure the House that I never knew a measure of anything like this importance go through with so few attempts to amend it. Nor do I rise for the mere purpose of putting my amendment on record, for I do feel that the views I am about to express, and which I have ever held since I have been a member of this House, may not commend themselves to any considerable number of hon. members. I have no desire that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada shall be abridged, nor that the rights and privileges of any other denomination shall be interfered with in any respect. But I wish hon. members to bear in mind that the experience we have had in this country—not to allude to that of the neighbouring states, proves that a denial of the right of the majority to legislate on any given matter has always led to grave consequences. I need only mention the clergy reserve question. That it must be recollected, was forbidden to be legislated upon by the Union Act; yet it was the cause of fierce strife, and legislation for many years. The original constitution of the United States prohibited the question of slavery from being interfered with by Congress; yet an agitation for its suppression was early commenced, and at last terminated in civil war. (Hear). The agitation of the clergy reserve question produced a rebellion in Upper Canada. I say, Sir, that by making a constitutional restriction in respect to the schools of the minority, we are sowing the seeds from which will in the end arise a serious conflict, unless the constitution be amended. The minority will be quite safe on a question relating to their faith and their education in a colony under the sway of the British Crown; but if you expressly withdraw that question from the control of the majority, the rights of the minority will not be safe in either section of the province, if you distrust the action of the majority. It is our duty, Sir, to see that a question which affects us so dearly as the education of our children—a question which has before now created no little excitement in Upper Canada—shall not be withdrawn from the management of the local legislature. We ought not to deprive them of a power which they will want to exercise, just because they are deprived of it, and provoke a desire on their part to alter the system. You may rely upon it, other religious bodies will be sure to protest against any particular creed having special rights, or an exclusive monopoly of certain privileges, whatever they may be. I should be astonished if any one in this House would say, either to the Protestant minority in Lower Canada or to the Roman Catholic minority in Upper Canada 'You are not to trust to the justice of the majority." Have they ever known a country where the majority did not control affairs and where the minority had not to submit? Does not the majority rule and the minority submit in England and in France? I have never heard of any state where this was not the case. The minority is safe against undue encroachment on its rights, and I am willing to trust to the sense of justice of the majority in Upper Canada to preserve the religious and educational liberties of the Roman Catholics of Upper Canada. I am now getting somewhat advanced in years, and I am the more anxious to put my opinions on record, because before long I shall have the satisfaction of saying, though perhaps not on the floor of this House, that I protested against resolutions intended to prevent the free expression of opinion by the majority of the people of Upper Canada, and the exercise of a power which ought to be intrusted to them.

Now permit me to say that I regret very much indeed the observations which have been made by some hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the alleged prejudices and passions and fanaticism of certain sections of this Dominion, more particularly in the province of Ontario and especially the city of Toronto. I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite who are supporting this Bill that they cannot find in any of the observations which have been made by the opponents of the Bill any reflection upon the religious prejudices of the people of Quebec or of any minority.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I did not apply that to the members of this House. I took all the precautions necessary to enable hon. gentlemen to understand me. I did not apply any remarks to hon gentlemen in this House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Many hon. gentlemen take the liberty of making remarks of a very general character, which while made in a very general way are extremely inflammatory. My hon. friend is sufficiently intelligent to know that the remarks which he made with regard to the large and influential Orange order would be scattered broadcast throughout the Dominion, and the minds of these men must necessarily from what he has said be inflamed to a very great degree. I see nothing in the attitude of that order upon this question which warranted the reflection which he passed upon it. I cannot refrain from also pointing out that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as well as the hon. Secretary of State in introducing this Bill, could not make their remarks upon a question which was purely constitutional, which had in view the adjustment of differences between the religious bodies in the new provinces without casting the most serious reflections upon the people of Ontario. I cannot understand the spirit which actuates many hon. gentlemen who come from Ontario and express themselves in the most derogatory language with reference to the so-called religious bigotry and fanaticism of the people of their own province. Yet we find those hon. gentlemen participating in the extreme and inflammatory remarks which are often made in this House and elsewhere as to the people of their own province. I am bound to say, although I am not a resident of the province of Ontario, that there is no part of this great Dominion where there is more toleration, more generosity to the minority and a higher standard of morality, intelligence and culture than the province of Ontario. I know they give to the minority as broad and as generous treatment as that minority can receive in any part of Canada or in any part of the broad continent of America. To say that the seeds of dissension are being scattered broadcast in the city of Toronto and throughout the province, to say that the great press of the province of Ontario has ever sought to produce antagonism between the people of the different provinces is, I say, to cast an unwarranted aspersion on the people of Ontario and on a press which is a credit in every respect to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman cannot be reading the Toronto 'News,' or cannot have seen its cartoons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or 'Saturday Night.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who are the principal leaders with reference to the agitation which has been stirred up by reason of the many iniquitous features of this Bill ? They have been the very bulwarks of the Liberal party. Who was the pioneer in this agitation but the 'Globe' newspaper, as I shall show presently. Who is the editor of the Toronto 'News' upon which my hon. friend from Halifax casts an aspersion? Why the gentleman who presided over the editorial department of the 'Globe' for years, is the biographer of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the gentleman who deified him far beyond the glowing language of my hon. friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David). This is the gentleman on whom the hon. member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) casts aspersions, a gentleman who has ever been high in the councils of the party, and who for years had been looked upon as the Delphic oracle of the party in Ontario. Another journalist prominent in this agitation is Mr. Sheppard, of 'Saturday Night,' who has been writing some of the most trenchant articles that have appeared in the press on this subject. Who is Mr. Sheppard ? He was one of the Liberal fold from 1896 until the introduction of this Bill. This government was only too pleased to secure the robust services of Mr. Sheppard in 1896, and by seductive ways to establish him within the Liberal party. For many years he could not write too glowing panegyrics of that party and particularly its leader, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and in recognition of his services they invested him with the authority of a commercial mission to one of the South American republics.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All governments make mistakes.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Does the hon. gentleman say that Mr. Sheppard was purchased by a thing of that kind ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not say he was purchased. I made no such aspersion. I know him to be above approaches of such a character. I say as a small appreciation of his services to the Liberal party in helping to place them in power in 1896 practically on this very question the very first thing they did was to make him a kind of plenipotentiary and send him on a commercial mission to a South American republic.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Mexico ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The West Indies.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend's forgot to consider who the gentlemen are that have been conducting this agitation and those who have been the pioneers in this agitation in Toronto. Why they are some of the strongest Liberals we have in the ranks of the party in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—What of that ? It makes no difference.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It makes this difference: My hon friend must not overlook the fact that the agitation was started by friends of his own household. It was they who began to analyse, to criticise and to denounce this Bill, and I am satisfied that my hon. friend will be sufficiently candid—because I know his sense of honour will dictate that he do so—to accord to the Conservative party a consistent record upon the question of separate schools in seeking to secure to the minority the fullest possible rights to which they are entitled under the constitution. I am satisfied no hon. gentleman can say that I have cast the slightest aspersion upon the convictions or even the prejudices which any minority may entertain upon this subject. In this Canada of ours, made up of different races and religions, we must exercise toleration and respect for the opinions of all and agree to live together in unity and in a brotherly spirit. Nothing can possibly be gained in the discussion of this Bill by appealing to the religious passions, and hon. gentlemen must assuredly see that it is purely a question of constitutional law as to what those provinces are entitled to, and I am satisfied those gentlemen even who have made inflammatory remarks must come to the conclusion that if those provinces are entitled to legislate with reference to education to the same degree as the other provinces of the Dominion, that right should be accorded to them by their constitution, which constitution must be sacred in the minds of the public men of this Dominion. I do not know that I can do better than conclude my remarks by subscribing myself as a supporter of the position taken by the Toronto 'Globe,' on this ubject. On March 21, the 'Globe' made its confession of faith upon this subject, nailed its colours to the mast.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It did not keep them there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For the time being it made a declaration on this question, and from a constitutional standpoint, seeing it has ever been accepted as the oracle of the Liberal party, I think it should be accepted by the government as having greater weight than any of the other authorities I have cited. On March 21 last the 'Globe' valiantly declared as follows:—

1. The 'Globe' stands for the provincial rights of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Those rights are created and secured by and under the British North America Act. The 'terms and conditions' of their provincial autonomy must be 'subject to the provisions of this Act.' They can have no rights as provinces that are not expressed or implied in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1886. They can be deprived of no rights to which they are entitled under that constitution.

2. The 'Globe' holds as has been argued in these columns again and again, that the new provinces now to be created do not come under the separate school obligation of section 93, clause 1, of the British North America Act, and therefore they are free under the constitution exclusively to make laws in relation to education, to continue their present system, to modify it, or to substitute another for it, as their legislatures shall decide.

3. The 'Globe' is persuaded by its first hand knowledge of western conditions and by assurances of representative western men, that had the education question been left without direction or trammel to the legislatures, the present system would have been enacted and all privileges possible under any obligatory federal clause would have been secured to Catholic minorities without dispute or acrimonious debate.

CLAUSES ARE ULTRA VIRES.

4. The 'Globe' holds that the educational clauses in the first draft of the Autonomy Bills are ultra vires of the federal parliament, especially the third clause, which is held to contravene the Dominion Lands Act and to interfere with provincial control of details of school administration.

5. The 'Globe' as a logical consequence of the foregoing, holds to be ultra vires of parliament and an infringement, in theory, if not in practice, of the rights of provinces under the constitution and legislation based on the assumption that in the meaning of the British North America Act there is no difference between the creation of a province out of a territory, for thirty-five years part of Canada under federal supervision, and the union to the Canadian confederation of an independent self-governing autonomous province or colony such as British Columbia, was prior to 1871, or such as Newfoundland is to-day. A territory is not a province, and the constitutional obligations of a province cannot rest upon a territory until it becomes a province.

Now this statement of the 'Globe's' position is made without reservation. Obviously it is opposed, point for point, to the position of the government, and its principle is opposed to the principle of any suggested amendment. The only reason for any abandonment of this position would be the proof that it is constitutionally untenable. Such indubitable proof would be a judgment of the Privy Council. Party politics, anti-French demonstrations, and the irrelevance of sectarian clamour have nothing to do with it.

These sentiments and this constitutional opinion expressed by the 'Globe' represent, I think, the best constitutional thought that can be given to this subject, and I heartily urge its consideration upon my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House who for so many years have been loyal and faithful followers of that organ.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The 'Globe' recanted afterwards.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It did not do more than the Liberal party is always doing. If I were to take up the work of reviewing the recantations of the Liberal party on all great questions, not excluding this educational question, it certainly would require considerable time to review the whole of them. If there is any characteristic of the Liberal party it is their habit of recanting. Their consistency in their inconsistencies only accentuates that strange and perverse inconsistency which ever has characterized them in the past. In 1896 they were against coercion; in 1905 they are preaching coercion throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, and probably in another decade or less we will find them where they were in 1896.

In conclusion, allow me to express the hope that notwithstanding the very many differences of opinion which are entertained upon this question, the good sense of the people of Canada may come to a happy conclusion, so that in these new provinces no clamour or discord may arise to disturb the good feelings of a portion of this Dominion which in the near future will be populated by the millions of a free and prosperous community.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I understood the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat to argue that there is no constitutional obligation on the parliament of Canada to pass his Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say the parliament of Canada has a constitutional right to erect provinces out of those territories, but that it has no right to impose educational restrictions on the people of those provinces.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—Does the hon. gentleman risk his reputation as a constitutional lawyer in saying that the parliament of Canada has not the right to pass this Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To what part of this Bill does my hon. friend refer?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I am willing to limit it to the educational clauses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In my judgment this parliament has not that right.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I take issue with the hon. gentleman, and if he will take the question to the Supreme Court and it is decided in his favour, I will pay the costs.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am afraid the hon. gentleman would lose his money.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—At this time of night I do not purpose following my hon. friend in all his wanderings during the two hours he has held the attention of the Senate. He has been through the whole Northwest and part of the old country. I rather liked his peroration, when he made the statement that he hoped no matter what difference of opinion there might be in this House and country upon this question that good feeling would prevail in the Northwest Territories. But in another part of his speech half an hour before that, he told us and made the threat to this House and country that this would be a bone of contention for all time in the territories, and we would soon find out that it would become a source of trouble. I commenced to think there was not much reliance to be placed on the peroration when he appealed to the good feeling of the Dominion. He closed his speech by reading an article from the 'Globe' which he said conveyed his views with reference to the whole question, but I noticed that he did not take the trouble to quote from the Montreal 'Star.' One would expect that when he gave us the views of Liberal newspapers on this question he would also have given us the opinions of some of the Conservative papers. The Montreal 'Star' told these gentlemen that they had better close up and go home, that they were practically ruining the Conservative party, and the 'Gazette' has done practically the same thing. My hon. friend made a good speech, but it contained a great many 'ifs.' I am not a lawyer, and I do not intend to try to put up a legal argument. I do not take much stock in legal arguments. I fancy if my hon. friend were on the other side of the House, he would make just as strong and logical an argument on the other side of the question, because lawyers differ. I remember reading a speech made by Mr. Borden, the leader of the opposition in the other House, in which he said he stood on the constitution. The right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech also said he stood on the constitution. When gentlemen like these two leaders cannot agree, I am sure one of them must have been off the constitution. It put me in mind of the battle of Langside, when the King led on one side and the Queen on the other. The Queen's forces were calling out 'God and the Queen,' while the other side called, 'God and the King.' It appeared to me that the Lord could not very well be on both sides at once, and in the same way I do not think both these gentlemen can stand on the constitution. My hon. friend has dodged all around this question, but has not left it clear whether he is in favour of separate schools, or not. He skated all around the hole but he never went near the water. He was asked the question by some hon. members on the other side of the House, but dodged it very artfully, and has left the impression on my mind that he has not committed himself one way or the other upon that subject. I am not a lawyer, and I have judged this matter from my own common sense as a farmer and a man of business. This school question that my hon. friend has dealt with at such length is one that does not stir the people of the Northwest to any great extent. My hon. friend said there was going to be a protest from the west against this educational clause. He had an opportunity to protest in the west when the Minister of the Interior went back to his constituency for re-election. Why did not my hon. friend and those who share his views protest then?

When the legislature of the Northwest Territories was discussing this question, and when it was being discussed in the press and amongst the people for the last four years, when the Northwest assembly on different occasions presented memorials to the federal government asking for autonomy, there was no reference to the separate school question at all. They were quite willing to accept the provisions of the British North America Act at that time. Mr. Haultain and his colleagues, the Northwest government, drafted a Bill which was presented to the government of the day here with reference to this very question. They embodied in that exactly what they expected to get from the federal government. When these two Bills were brought down in the Honse of Commons and the Prime Minister explained them, if they were not satisfactory to the Northwest assembly, what was Mr. Haultain's duty? There were, I think, 5 vacant seats in the Northwest Territories at that time, caused by gentlemen resigning to run for the Dominion parliament. Some of the candidates were returned, others were defeated, but those vacancies existed. If these Bills were not satisfactory to Mr. Haultain, then it was his duty to go back to the Northwest Territories and hold elections in each of these 5 constituencies and test the feelings of the people with reference to this question. Did he do it? No, Mr. Haultain stayed down here in Ottawa talking very loudly. Then he went home to the Northwest Territories, and held interviews with representatives of the press. He came back again to the elections in London and North Oxford and made speeches there, but he never tried to test the feeling of the people of the Northwest Territories on these measures. I submit that the people of the territories that are to be formed into two provinces are the people most interested in this subject. They are more interested than the people of Toronto, of London, of North Oxford, or of any other part of this country, because under the provisions of these Bills they and their descendants will have to live for all time to come. These provisions have been published in the press of the Northwest Territories and the people are intelligent enough to know what they want. We do not have to ask for the opinion of the people of Ontario or any other part of the Dominion. If the provisions of the Bills were not satisfactory to the people of the Northwest Territories you would have heard such a roar from them that there would be no mistake about it; but when you find the members from the Northwest Territories with the exception of three, supporting the clauses of this Bill, I think it may be taken for granted that the people of the Northwest Territories are pretty well satisfied with this legislation as it has been submitted to us. I do not know that I am very enthusiastic over separate schools, not the class that we had at one time in the Northwest Territories; but I do believe that when this parliament dealt with the subject in 1875, when the subject was discussed in both Houses at Ottawa, and it was stated then by the leading statesmen of this country that it was only right that a settlement should be made and the people given to understand what privileges they would have in going into that country, and when an Act went through both Houses granting certain privileges to the Roman Catholics of the Northwest Territories, and people have been going into that country for the last 15 or 20 years and settling there on the strength of that legislation, it would be nothing short of highway robbery to take away those privileges from the minority in that country, even if we had the power to do so. We must live up to our contract. I know some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the other House take a different view on this subject, and talk about provincial rights. Mr. Borden, the leader of the opposition, spoke strongly about provincial rights. As the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other night, there is no question of provincial rights in this matter because these territories are coming in as territories, not as provinces, at the present time. Mr. Borden, discussing the land question, said what he was willing to do for provincial rights. He said it would be a good thing to hand over the homestead land to the local government, but that a clause might be inserted requiring the provincial authorities to give free homesteads to settlers. Was not that an infringement of provincial rights? What is far more important to the people of that country is the exemption of the Canadian Pacific Railway from taxation. That affects the people more than the educational question, and if Mr. Haultain were to test the feelings of the people of the Northwest Territories he would find there are twenty-five men interested in removing the Canadian Pacific Railway exemption to every one that is interested in the school question. I consider that an infraction of provincial rights. As to legal arguments, as I said before, I take no stock in them. I heard what my hon. friend said about the Territories coming into the union in 1870. After telling the House practically that he was willing to give the Roman Catholics all they were entitled to under the constitution, he then went on to tell us that the territories came into the confederation in 1870. It occurred to me on reading section 93 of the British North America Act that if these territories came into the union in 1870, since there were no separate schools by law or by practice in that region previous to that time, the Roman Catholics would be entitled to nothing at all, according to his argument. I was going to ask him, if they came into confederation in 1870, did section 93 of the British North America Act apply to them at that time, and if not why not. It is all nonsense to say that the territories affected by this Bill were brought into the confederation as provinces in 1870.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Not as provinces. As territories.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But they are coming in now as provinces. When they come in as provinces they come under the provisions of the British North America Act, if not what is the meaning of the preamble to the Act of 1871?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Dominion was given authority to erect them into provinces.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If they existed by law at the union, then practically they cannot be interfered with. If those territories came into the union in 1870 there being at that time no separate schools either by law or practice, I assume the Roman Catholics in that part of the country would have no rights at all. The preamble is as follows:

Whereas doubts have been entertained respecting the powers of the parliament of Canada to establish provinces in territories admitted, or which may hereafter be admitted into the Dominion of Canada, &c.

So I fancy there is just as good legal authority for saying these provinces did not come in in 1870, but are coming in now, as for taking the opposite view, and that they are entitled to the law which has been in force for years and of which the people have had advantage, up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why not leave it that way?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not believe in leaving it that way for the reason that Mr. Haultain and some of his friends have led the country to believe that if that were done there would be no separate schools at all. That is what they said in the late by-elections in Ontario, that if Mr. Borden's policy were carried out and the British North America Act left to work automatically, there would be no separate schools at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But you do not believe that.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not, but they tried to create that impression. If you left it that way, it would be open to every demagogue in the Northwest to stir up strife among the people. We have had an illustration of that to-night. My hon. friend from Calgary said this was going to be a bone of contention. Does my hon. friend think if it was to be left open as Mr. Borden desires to leave it, they would not attempt to stir up religious strife for the purpose of making political capital? We had a demonstration of it in London and North Oxford. One man speaking in North Oxford asked, how the people liked Sir Wilfrid Laurier's proposition to hand over 15,000,000 acres of school land to the Roman Catholic Hierarchy. Hon. gentlemen who have read the Bill know what foundation there was for such a statement, yet it was made by a leading politician who desired to make capital against the government. If such people had an opening they would stir up strife on this question in the Northwest Territories and we would never have it settled.

I shall discuss some questions which I consider, and the people of the Northwest consider more important than clause 17 of the Bill before us. I cannot understand the position that the hon. gentleman from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has taken with reference to this question in moving the six months' hoist. Mr. Haultain has been agitating for provincial autonomy for the last five or six years. The main thing the Liberal party in the Northwest has had to fight in the recent election is this question of provincial autonomy. They said, we must have autonomy. We cannot build bridges and carry on other works without money; and the Conservative party have condemned the government because they have not granted provincial autonomy sooner. A year ago the leader of the opposition in the other House moved a resolution about the end of the session, condemning the government in unmeasured terms for failing to grant autonomy, claiming that the people of the Northwest Territories were as capable of managing their own affairs as any other men under the British flag, and we had to fight it out in the last campaign in the Northwest Territories, because the whole campaign was conducted on this question of provincial autonomy. We took the ground that there was no haste, that the country was in a state of transition, and it would be better to let matters stand as they were for a few years until there was more population and the people were more settled, and we knew where we were; but our opponents would not hear of that. They pointed to the fact that Manitoba had entered the confederation with 12,000 people and had prospered. We had to contend against this thing in the elections and now what do we find?

After going all over the length and breadth of the country, making provincial autonomy an issue, we have the spectacle, when the government bring down a measure of autonomy which cannot be proved to be unsuitable to the Northwest or unacceptable to its people, of the leader of the opposition in this House moving the six months' hoist, which means, if carried, killing the Bill, and preventing the legislation for which Mr. Haultain has been fighting. But, hon. gentlemen, it is politics. I did think that politics was confined to the other side of this building. I did not know that it had entered the Senate, but I had my eyes opened this evening while listening to the speech of my hon. friend from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed.) He made a long argument on the land question. He tried to show that the lands in the Northwest were being given away. I assume when he advanced that argument he was satisfied in his own mind that those lands were the property of the people of the Northwest Territories and did not belong to the whole people of the Dominion. It occurred to me while he was speaking that the older provinces when they were under separate governments had made a bargain, had gone into partnership, each of them retaining its own lands, which was a proper thing to do. Afterwards the united provinces acquired another large tract of country for which they paid a certain amount of money and thus acquired the ownership of these rich lands. The hon. gentleman from Calgary told us to-night that they are worth many millions—hundreds of millions. If so how many millions of dollars did the Conservative party give away in the eighteen years they were in power, from 1878 to 1896, when the people turned them out? How many millions of dollars in value did the Conservative government give away to railway companies for which they receive no returns whatever? But if all those lands belonged to the people of the Northwest Territories, and if my hon. friend knows the law, he must know what he is speaking about, how much does the Dominion of Canada owe us for the lands exploited by the Conservative party from 1878 to 1896? Millions and millions of the broad acres of the Northwest Territories were given away to companies and to their political friends. Millions of acres were given away to colonization companies for which the country did not receive more than 25 to 50 cents an acre, tracts of land on which those companies never placed a settler. Speaking on this question the hon. gentleman alluded to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company. That company was given a tract of land which was a wilderness, for which nobody would have paid anything. The arrangement made by the government with the company was that they should receive a certain amount of land on settlement conditions on paying $1 per acre. The government said, if you put so many people in each township we will give you this land at $1 per acre, but you will get no land until our homestead inspector has seen that the people are there. Carrying that out, the inspection was made and the people were found on the land, but before the company got a deed for an acre of land they had to put the settlers there. They have colonized a tract of country where the gophers had been hopping around for the 18 years the Conservatives were in power. There are prosperous settlements now, mills, churches and schools where nobody lived before, and still the hon. gentleman who has lived for 25 years in that Northwest country, and knows something about the country, speaks about the value of the lands. They had not value before settlement. If they are as valuable as he says, it does not lie in the mouth of the Conservative party to speak about it, because they have given away enough lands, valued at $10 per acre, to build three transcontinental railways through the Northwest Territory.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Have you the railways now ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We will have the railways at the proper time, and there will be something for the railways to do. It will not be like the time when the Conservatives were in power, when the gophers had possession of the Northwest Territories with an occasional stray skunk hopping around, but there is settlement in the country now, wheat is grown there and thanks to the policy of the Liberal party the country is now being settled up, and my hon. friend will be able in a few days to get his indemnity raised from $1,500 to $2,500. I think he is entitled to the increase, and the country is able to pay it. When his party was in power the country was so poor that it could not afford to grant such an indemnity. In the interest of the people of this country the lands of the Northwest Territories should be left in the hands of the federal government ; they have all the machinery to colonize them. They have advertised that country from one end of the globe to another. They have their immigration machinery all over the world, and we have a stream of people flowing into that country who do not come in empty-handed. They are coming in at the rate of 150,000 a year. Does any one want to stop that progress. To promote such immigration you must have free lands. If the policy of my hon. friend was carried out and these lands were handed over to the provinces, would they be able to give free homesteads ? It is a well known fact to any one living in the Northwest Territories that all the odd-numbered sections in any district near a railroad or in any place that is easily reached, have been given away by our friends, the Conservatives, to railway corporations years and years ago.

Now you cannot run a province without money any more than you can run a car without putting grease on the wheels. If we were to hand over to the provinces the lands that we have at the present time, where are they going to get the money to run the affairs of the provinces ? They are getting the money from the lands at the present time. If they took the lands in lieu of the money what would they do. They have scarcely any odd-numbered sections that are available for sale, for which any one would give much. They have nothing but the even-numbered sections. It strikes any person that the first thing the local government would do if they got these sections would be to withdraw them from the market and rightfully so. That is all the revenue they have got. My hon. friend talks about twenty-eight millions made by Ontario out of their land. I suppose people think we should make money out of our land. If we made any money out of our land we would have to make it out of even-numbered sections, and we could not give them away if we did that. We have to give free homesteads to induce people to come into the country and we do not want to put the brake on the wheel at the present time. Now supposing Mr. Borden's ideas were adopted, if we placed a clause in the Bill which would be an infringement of provincial rights and compelled the provinces to give free homesteads to these people you would then have a Commissioner of Crown Lands in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, because you would have to treat Manitoba the same as the other two provinces. If you gave these lands to these two provinces you would have to do the same with Manitoba. If the immigration department desired to take some action with regard to settlement they would have to deal with three different Crown Land Commissioners, who would have three different policies. The House can see it would be an impossibility, that you could not carry on an immigration policy like that, and that if you handed over the lands to a local government it would mean that you would stop immigration into that country, and you would have the old state of affairs coming back to us. I do not think anybody in the country wants that ; and my hon. friend from Calgary is the only one in this House who holds the view that these lands are so valuable. I think the government have treated the new provinces very decently as far as the financial terms go. I do not know under what principle the public lands in this country have been dealt with since confederation. When the province my hon. friend (Mr. MacDonald, B.C.) comes from came into confederation, it came with its own lands. We had to build the Canadian Pacific Railway through that province to reach the Pacific coast, which will be admitted to be a great benefit to the people of British Columbia. For that purpose the Dominion bought a narrow strip of property through British Columbia, and now British Columbia receives one hundred thousand dollars a year for that property for all time to come, and they have the benefit of the railway running through the province as well. If the land belongs to us in the Northwest, how were we treated with reference to that question ? The government obtained a right of way in our country but we got no $100,000 for it. Instead of that they gave away 25,000,000 acres of our land for a railway through that country. There is one policy for British Columbia and another for the Territories. I am not claiming that we own the land, but my hon. friend says that we do, and if his argument is sound they gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway a right of way through the Territories for nothing, and they gave 25,000,000 acres of our land to them for building the railway. While in the case of British Columbia the province received $100,000 a year for granting a strip of rocks for a right of way for a railway which was a benefit to the province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What does that land yield every year?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am not talking about that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I will tell you about that later.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Prince Edward Island is given a large sum of money in payment every year because she has no lands at all. So that I have made up my mind that this question is one which has been arranged from time to time to meet the cases as they arise. There is no use of a province going into housekeeping without sufficient money to carry on its affairs. And I venture to say if our people did not get what they considered sufficient money to run the province, people would never go in for autonomy. We do not want to come in on any starvation arrangement like Manitoba. Since Manitoba was admitted they have been hammering on the federal door for better terms, and I venture to say they will have to come again. What did they do with Manitoba? They gave Manitoba $100,000 a year for all time to come in lieu of her lands and then they gave her the swamp lands. In selecting these lands I do not think it was all swamp lands that were given to the province of Manitoba; so that from start to finish there has been no principle laid down with reference to the lands, and I assume that in fixing the financial terms the government has taken into consideration the needs and requirements of that country, the vast amount of arable land in that territory, the possibilities of the country, and the population that will be found in those two provinces in the course of a few years. I assume that is what has been done. I am not altogether satisfied with some of the features of the measure. I do not always agree with my own leaders with reference to some of these matters. We were told last night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the east had made great sacrifices for the people of the west. I am willing to admit that the east have paid out a good deal of money for the people of the west, but I assume it was not paid out of current revenue or consolidated fund. A great deal of it was borrowed. Let us deal with this question shortly. Where did the money that went to build the Intercolonial Railway come from? It was borrowed, I suppose, and the people of Canada are paying the interest on it, and when the bonds mature they will have to be renewed or other bonds will be issued, and we will continue paying the interest for many years to come. I venture to say that the principal money which was paid for the building of the Intercolonial Railway will not be paid until there are three or four million people in these two new provinces which we are erecting now.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The Intercolonial Railway is quite a different subject, because it was built when we entered confederation.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I understand that. I was trying to show that if the east has been making sacrifices for the west in years gone by, the time is soon coming when the people of the west will have to be making sacrifices for the people of the east, and I think I will be able to show that. The money that built the Intercolonial Railway has been borrowed, and we are paying the interest on it. The people of the west are helping to pay that interest, and per capita we pay more into the Dominion than any other province, because we consume more goods per capita than any other portion of the Dominion. We are not grumbling, but we will have to pay the interest on that. The government has built eighty million dollars worth of canals. Who is paying the interest on that? Are we not paying our share of that? And when we get a million people in these provinces in the course of a few years I assume we will be paying a large proportion of the canal expenditure. There have been railway subsidies granted in Ontario and Quebec and every other portion of older Canada. How did you get them? In hard cash, dollars and cents—borrowed money. The people of the west in common with the people of the east have to help pay the interest, and as the population increases we will be paying the bulk of that interest. In dealing with our railway question, the government took a different policy. The Conservative party inaugurated the policy of giving away the lands. My hon. friend from Calgary says the lands belong to us, and the government has given to railways 6,400 acres of land per mile worth $15 an acre.

Let my hon. friend figure out how much Brother Osler and the Canadian Pacific Railway got out of the Calgary and Edmonton road at the valuation he has placed on the lands given away by the Conservative party to Brother Osler and his friends when they built that little tramway into Edmonton. If those lands are so valuable, it would be well for my hon. friend to go to work and show how much the railways cost. You have given our lands away to build railways in the west, and you have borrowed money to subsidize the railways in the east, and we not only paid for our railways in the west out of our lands, but we are helping to pay the interest on the money borrowed to subsidize your systems in the east, and I venture to say, in the course of events, taking into consideration the amount of arable lands we have in the west, that in years to come we will pay the larger portion of this money borrowed for the purpose of subsidizing railways, building bridges and canals and constructing the Intercolonial Railway. I claim we will have to make great sacrifice in the years to come for the people of older Canada. We are making great sacrifices now, paying a big tariff for the benefit of the people of the east. Until this year we have been choked off and allowed to build no railways to the other side of the boundary line. We were not allowed to have freedom of transportation until this year, and everything had to be kept for the people of the east. We are not grumbling, but I want to say that the 150,000 people who come into that country every year bring money into that country, and every dollar of that money finds its way to the east. You have your banks in the east, but we have not a single bank out west. However, charters have gone through and we will soon have banks of our own. The banks of the east have branches covering the whole country from the lakes westward, and what are they doing ? I venture to say—and some hon. gentlemen know something about banking business—that they are doing business principally on the deposits of the people of the country and those coming into that country. They are taking our money (and we do not grumble) because it gives us banking facilities, but the result is that loans are made to us out of our own money and the banks are making a profit out of it. And still we are told the east is making sacrifices for the west.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the Northwest not receiving annually a certain amount for an imaginary debt ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS. I am coming to that. I am glad the hon. gentleman touched on that, because if there is anything I feel a little aggrieved about in this legislation, it is the question of the imaginary debt. Let us consider this imaginary debt. When the old provinces were formed into confederation what do we find ? We find the beautiful old province of Quebec, where I was born—and I love it—owed how much ? If my hon. friend figures out the readjustment he will find it was about eighty millions. It was taken over as a debt—forty millions from Quebec and forty millions from Ontario. That is a debt to-day. It is not paid. Who is paying the interest on that debt ? The people of the Northwest Territories are helping to pay that interest, just the same as Quebec and Ontario. Are we supposed to pay interest on the debt that was incurred for the benefit of Quebec, Nova Scotia and Ontario, and that was spent for public improvements in those provinces before we came into existence ? Are we to pay that interest and receive nothing in return ? Is that the argument my hon. friend would advance ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What is the argument ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are the Territories paying interest on only seventy-five million or eighty million ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are they paying interest on the whole debt ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, our share, and I wish to point out further that to-day when we come into confederation, because we have no debt and because we are paying interest on the debt of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and the other provinces which had a debt, the government has placed to our credit $8,000,000 in round numbers for each province. That is what is usually done. When the provinces at the union took the census they figured up the debt and they calculated that every man, woman and child owed $32.46. When we came in we had to assume that debt and pay our share of the interest of it, and there is placed to our credit a like amount, I admit we have $32.46 on our 250,000 population in each of those provinces and we are going to draw interest on that. But I say this is an injustice. The province of Ontario has $40,000,000 of a debt, and the province of Quebec $40,000,000 and we are paying interest on that. We have $8,000,000 to our credit. When we have 2,000,000 people the same as Ontario and Quebec, what will we have? We will have 2,000,000 people in Saskatchewan and 2,000,000 in Alberta helping to pay the interest on $40,000,000 from Ontario and $40,000,000 for Quebec and the 2,000,000 people of Ontario and the 2,000,000 people of Quebec will only help to pay the interest on $8,000,000 for Saskatchewan and $8,000,000 for Alberta. I claim that that should be placed on a sliding scale, and that the census should be taken every ten years and a readjustment made ; and as our population goes up it should reach a maximum of $40,000,000, the same as in Quebec, and I think we are entitled to that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is going to vote against the Bill?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No. I understand my hon. friend is going to vote for the six months' hoist. I think there are many good features in this Bill which the Conservative party has been crying after for four years, and I would hate to see them lose any more sleep over it, and I should hate to see Mr. Borden appealing to the sentiment of Canada for the 500,000 subjects in the Northwest that were not allowed to govern themselves. For that reason I will vote for the Bill, and if my hon. friend thinks it over he will vote for the Bill and not go back on his leader here and his leader in the Northwest Territories. Now with reference to capitation grant, that is a grant that we receive of 80 cents per head. It has been arranged by this government—and I am not complaining about it—that that shall go on until our population reaches 800,000 souls. Ontario receives that grant on something over a million and Quebec receives it on something over a million.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not a capitation grant.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, (B.C.)—They get paid until it reaches 1,200,000 population.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, we get paid until it reaches 800,000, and then it ceases. I claim that the restriction should not be imposed on the people of the west or any other portion of the country. I say that this matter of 80 cents a head should be left an open question and rearranged every ten years. Supposing we take one province—I am not saying this is something which is likely to happen, but it may occur—take one province drawing 80 cents a head for 500,000 people, and something happened and half of them left, the remaining population would be drawing $1.60 a head while in other provinces you would have them drawing only 25 cents a head on the population. I claim it is not a fair proposition at all. I am speaking now about the 80 cents a head in lieu of the customs duty and I do not think my hon. friend from British Columbia has grasped what I was talking about. Quebec receives a certain amount paid on the population until it reaches the point of over a million and Ontario in the same way up to over a million ; but we are confined to 800,000. We start at 250,000, and we go up to 800,000, and that is as far as we can go.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, (B.C.)—If the hon. gentleman reads the clause he will see that it is quite clear.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The clause the hon. gentleman is referring to is dealing with the land. That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, (B.C.)—No, that is population.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I claim it should be left open and every ten years there should be a rearrangement. When the census is taken the noses should be counted, and if we are going to adopt this principle of giving 80 cents a head, it should be carried out in its entirety in a logical way, and the provinces should be paid according to their population. That is my idea, and that is what I think should be done. Now I come to another question in which I am interested, which was mentioned by the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is the question of representation in this House. The Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us last night that the representation in this House had been arranged in years gone by without reference to population. As I understood him, the country was divided into three divisions; that the maritime provinces were to have a representation of 24 members in this chamber, Ontario 24, Quebec 24, and that the west should have 24 members. I submit with regard to the representation in this House that the correct principle is that each of the smaller provinces in the Dominion should have as much representation as the larger ones. The leader of the opposition (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) maintained that we should have had only one province. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I venture to say that in 50 years from now there will be more representatives coming from those two provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta, than from all the rest of the Dominion put together, and if you were now to include it all in one province you would have a representation in the other chamber that would actually control the whole Dominion and the other provinces would have no show. Then the safeguard would be the Senate. Therefore in the Senate it is a good thing that a small community should have the same representation as a larger community. That is the principle in the United States. The great state of New York with a population of 7,500,000 has the same representation as Rhode Island with 350,000 souls. I am satisfied that the proper arrangement of representation would be to give Prince Edward Island, with a population of 100,000 just as much representation as Ontario or Quebec or Saskatchewan, which is destined to be the banner province of this country. I would give them the same representation, but I strongly object to the province of Saskatchewan being tied down to six members while Ontario has 24, Quebec 24, and the smaller provinces combined 24. We should make a basis, take all the provinces which have been brought into confederation, and all the provinces which may hereafter come into confederation—because I believe we will have another province erected in that northern country which many people imagine is of no use. I know something of that country and I think it will be found that there will be large mining districts in the northern part of the Territories. Start in with Prince Edward Island and give them a representation of 5, New Brunswick, 5; Nova Scotia, 5 ; Ontario, 5 ; Quebec, 5 ; Manitoba, 5 ; Saskatchewan, 5 ; Alberta, 5, and deal in the same way with the rest of the provinces and there will be no complaint about it. Nobody knows the prospects we have in the Northwest. We have more good arable land in the province of Saskatchewan than you have in Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces combined; what does that mean ? It means that the people are going to come there. There is very little free land in any other part of the world. We are going to get the people, and this country will be built up. History is going to repeat itself. What took place in the United States will take place here. The old New England states along the sea coast have spread out to the Pacific ocean and where is the wealth of the United States at the present time ? In the middle and western states. Where will the wealth in this country be in 50 years ? There is no doubt that it will be in the west, and we are going to have the population up there and if you are going to treat the question in a fair way it should be put upon this basis. The hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) spoke about the division of the Territories into electoral districts. He spoke of the gerrymander attempted on the people of the west. We have had a local government in the Northwest Territories for fifteen or twenty years. The main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway was built through the southern portion of the Territories, and that part of the country has had an opportunity of developing for twenty years. They had a transcontinental line of railway through that district and it did develop in spite of the lands being held by the railway company there. In the north the people, not having a railway, were not able to develop the country. The majority of the local assembly were from the southern part of the Territories. Big sums of money were voted, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce stated last night, for public works and so on. How much did the north receive of it? We scarcely got any and we never got cabinet representation. Sometimes they would spend a few dollars but it was the crumbs that fell from the table. When there was talk about forming a province, we said: 'We in the north have not been treated fairly and we do not want to go in with the south. We want a province of our own. We want to draw a line east and west and make a northern and southern province. We held out and fought for it, but it was pointed out that it would be unfair to do anything of the kind because the country was so deep that the division should be made the other way. We wanted a fair representation or we did not want to go into the province at all. With reference to the voters' lists, what does it amount to? When the voters' lists were made I do not suppose there were 100 people in Humboldt who were qualified to vote, while to-day I venture to say there are seven or eight hundred people. The settlers may not all be able to vote. Some of them are aliens and must reside there three years before they can take part in our affairs, but the moment they settle in the district are they not entitled to consideration ? It is absurd to talk about foreigners coming into the Territories and to cast reflections on them. The great bulk of the people coming from the United States are the finest settlers that could be found anywhere. They have come into the country and made it blossom like the rose. With the money they have brought with them they have established themselves in our country, and are they to be called foreigners? We want those settlers because they will become the backbone of the country. What built the United States? Was it not the foreign element? What built Minnesota? Was it not the Scandinavians? These foreigners have come in here and cast their lot with us and it is our duty to treat them fairly. They have a right to representation in the councils of the province so that they can obtain a measure of justice.

Again, with reference to this educational question, which my hon. friend says is the great question, but which I say is not the great question, we have brought people into that country for twenty years under a promise, because there are the speeches made by the leaders on both sides of the House when this question was brought up in 1875. It was then said that the people coming into this country should know what they had to expect. It was scattered broadcast. It was a contract entered into between the people of the Dominion and the people of that new country. It is true it might not be written down, but what are written contracts for? They are not for honest men. They are intended for dishonest men —to keep them honest. Surely the word of the leading men of both political parties is worth something and should be taken into consideration. It is understood the settlers were to have these rights and privileges and whatever the hon. gentleman from Calgary may think about it I think they have a right to them whether the constitution gives it or not. We promised it years ago, and they have enjoyed it for twenty years, and I say it would be nothing short of highway robbery to take it away from them at the present time. I am not enthusiastic over separate schools, but there is nobody in the country objects to the system of schools we have at the present time. I have been all through the country and I know whereof I speak. The leading men in the country take part in the school affairs of their district. Every five miles is divided into a school district. We have some 1,000 schools. The leading men are the trustees in these schools and they are intelligent men, and generally take the trouble to read up the school ordinance, and I have spoken to some of them that belong to the society of which Dr. Sproule is a member, and they say they were perfectly satisfied. They had no objection to the school system in existence at present. If we are going to have separate schools, I say let us have good schools. Under the present ordinances which are going to become the constitution, we have a first class system of schools. Whether separate or public, it makes no difference; they cannot employ a teacher unless he or she is qualified. I have the regulations here but will not take up time to read them. A teacher must have certain qualifications before he can teach. I have never heard them use the word Roman Catholic or Protestant in the Northwest Territories. They say 'we want a teacher with a first or second class certificate to teach in such a school.

If you read the papers you will see it there, and I venture to say that the people of my country are so broadminded that in many school districts if a man asked for employment the trustees would never question him about his religion. In one place they employed a coloured man to teach school, and he taught for years. Now if a certain number of our fellow-citizens think that for half an hour in the day they would like to have the benefit of that clause in the ordinance of the Northwest Territories which gives them the right to have a little religious instruction, who should say that they have not the right to do it? It is not the Roman Catholics alone that are getting it. The Protestants enjoy it the same as the Roman Catholics. If in any rural district Roman Catholics start a school and the trustees are Roman Catholics no doubt the official instruction will be given by the Catholics. That is all right, but if there is a section of Protestants where they think they have a grievance that they would rather have some one give their own religious instruction—mark you, the children need not remain when the religious instruction is being given—if they say 'the Roman Catholics are enjoying the right of religious instruction, and we would like our children to be brought up in the same way, and we will form another school district here which is practically another public school, because the same subjects are taught, the same inspection provided for, the same qualifications required of the teacher, they can form their district and have their school. It is not a separate school but is practically a public school, and they can have the right to teach religion in that school for the half hour a day according to their views. The government of the Northwest Territories pay by results. If at the end of the year, when the inspection has taken place whether the school be Catholic or controlled by the Protestant element, if the subjects have been taught, if the children have been advanced as well in that as in the other schools, they receive just as much per capita as in the other schools. Why should they not do so? A few persons may for conscience sake go and form a separate school of that kind. Their taxes are naturally a little higher than they would be in the public schools, but if they are carrying on good schools they will receive the government grant the same as the others. We must have a grant to make them efficient. There are parts of the Northwest where Protestant and Catholic sit on the same school board and there is never any dispute. They get along nicely and will continue in that way until some one like my hon. friend from Calgary comes along and stirs up religious strife. My hon. friend tells us he intends to do that. We know that a few short weeks ago his partner in the law business came to the county of Oxford and to the city of London and told the people that if this Bill went through he could assure them that there was going to be a rebellion in the west, and they were going to shoulder their rifles. But after the election was over my friend from Calgary took to the west like a lonely coyote. We heard no more of his rebellion or his musket. The newspapers—even Conservative newspapers in the west—were making game of him, and he has been the laughing stock of the whole Northwest Territories since he came down here and talked about rebellion in the Northwest. My hon. friend from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) is going to the Northwest to raise the standard of revolt. I imagine I see him straying through the Territories with his pockets full of pamphlets trying to stir up the people. I think I may tell him that that as far as stirring up a rebellion is concerned his partner, who is a member of the Northwest assembly, is a greater success at it, and if Mr. Bennett fails to stir up strife in the Territories there is extremely little chance of the hon. gentleman succeeding. As far as the bluffing goes, we do not care one iota for it. When the election in these new provinces take place the hon. gentleman will be out in the cold—the handwriting is on the wall—they will not be so ready to go up there and talk about the foreign element. then. They know it is a foregone conclusion. A couple of years ago they held a convention in Moosejaw and Mr. Bennett and the hon. gentleman from Calgary were there, I think. However, if he was not there he had something to do with getting it up, and they brought in Mr. Haultain, who was running the coalition government, and they told him that he had to drop into line. They passed a resolution in favour of introducing party politics at the next election. Mr. Haultain was supported by the votes of the Liberals in the assembly and he practically said: 'Gentlemen, support me for the next three years and at the end of that time I will kick you all out and put in Conservatives.' Now he finds out that things have not gone to suit him; that he could not stir up strife over the autonomy matter, the rebellion has not come; the revolt has not materialized, and when he sees the handwriting on the wall he says: 'I do not think it is a good thing to have politics introduced into the province. We will run it on non-political lines.' I say there will be no non-political lines about it. They have thrown down the gauntlet and we will take it up. In the last election in the northern country what happened? I think six or seven Conservative candidates bit the dust, and I think there was something like twelve hundred dollars of their money went to fatten up the federal treasury in lost deposits. They were wiped out of existence. No wonder my hon. friend will howl about gerrymander and this outrageous thing that was going to be perpetrated in Calgary because they elected two Conservatives. We do not bother about their electing two Conservatives. They had a right to do so. They can elect whom they please. When the whole northern country went against them—they knew that in the distribution of seats this government would give the north the justice which they did not get from Mr. Haultain. But they know that the handwriting is on the wall and they say: 'Let us have a non-political government.' He wants to get in some place; he is like a gopher, when you stir him out of one hole he will make a dive for another. He is running around and diving about to see where he can get in. But he will have to take to the timbers, and the coon will have to come down. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman from Calgary to tell about this outrageous gerrymander that is being perpetrated upon the people of the southern part of the country. There is no gerrymander about it. In the district of Saskatchewan there is as little disturbance as possible. We adopted the principles of giving the cities—and there are four of them there—a representative each, and when it was shown that Moosejaw had not representation the people of the north very gladly gave up a seat and said let Moosejaw take it.

We do not want anything but what was right, but we do want what is right and fair and just, and that is all we have got. Everybody else agreed to it—everybody but people like the hon. gentleman from Calgary and the hon. gentleman from Wolseley; and nothing can satisfy them. Anything that will have a tendency to keep their political friends out of power in the Territories will not satisfy my hon. friend from Wolseley. But this was not made with anything of the kind in view. If we had started in the gerrymander, we could have distributed the seats in such a way that they could not have won six constituencies in each province in the elections that are to come on. There was no gerrymander. The only representative of the Conservative party who discussed this question of Saskatchewan representation was Mr. Lake, who came down with the most outrageous gerrymander that I ever saw. I am sorry that I have not his distribution of seats for Saskatchewan just to show what he proposed to do. Here are the cities of Moosejaw, Regina and Prince Albert, all prosperous and increasing in population, with 5,000 or 6,000 people in each, and they want representation in the assembly; but Mr. Lake would do away with that. He wants to give the people of the north hardly any representation at all, I suppose on the same ground that my hon. friend alleges, because they are foreigners and scalawags. But this proportion before the House is absolutely fair. It is giving to the north what the north is entitled to, and to the south all that they are entitled to, because the population is going more rapidly into the north than into the south and they should have more representation. My hon. friend from Calgary says he can prove that there are more going into the south than into the north. I do not know where he is going to get his figures. I suppose he has not been up there counting noses this summer. And I suppose Mr. Bennett, who is going to start a rebellion, was not up there counting noses. I venture to say that this year over 100,000 people have come in already. No doubt some have settled in the south, but I venture to say that the opening of the Canadian Northern Railway and all these other branch lines in the north have attracted the great bulk of the people entering that country to the north, and will continue to do so for years to come. All the homestead lands along the Canadian Pacific Railway have been taken up and people naturally go where they can get homesteads for themselves and children. In order to do that they have to go to the northern belt. Land around Indian Head and along the main line is worth from forty to fifty dollars an acre. That is not a place where settlers will go. The poor settler has to go to the northern belt where he can get a free homestead for himself and buy land for his son at $5 to $6 an acre. That is where the stream of immigration is going, and before another redistribution takes place the north will have more population than the south. Taking everything into consideration, I think the distribution of seats is fair. My hon. friend says this outrageous proposition was made for the purpose of taking the capital from Calgary. What right has Calgary to be the capital? I say Regina has some shadow of a right to be the capital of Saskatchewan. It has been the capital for a long time, and the public buildings are there, but why should Calgary have more claim than Edmonton to be the capital of Alberta? Is it because they are better looking in Calgary or because Mr. Lougheed lives there, or because the fire-eater Bennett lives there? I say we must take into consideration the position of the different towns.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They have a right to make a claim.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They have a right to make a claim, but they have no right to say, because they do not get what they want, that they have been cheated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend say that I made any reference to Calgary?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend made a reference to Edmonton and if I understood him aright he claimed that the capital should have been at Calgary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the hon. gentleman was not listening to what I said.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It was very hard to understand what he was driving at because he was roving from Dan to Beersheba.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman must withdraw his statement that I made any statement with reference to Calgary or Edmonton either.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I will withdraw it if the hon. gentleman says he did not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not, and the hon. gentlemen must know I did not.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am taking my hon. friend's word for it that he did not say it, but I do not know why he was creating so much excitement about the outrageous gerrymander perpetrated on the south. Everyone who lives within sound of the cannon on this hill knows that it has been discussed in the other House, and the whole fight is put up simply because Mr. McCarthy and others from the south claimed that it was to pass over Calgary and give the capital to Edmonton. It does not make any difference what my hon. friend may have said. He may have beaten about the bush on that subject as he did on the educational question, because when he sat down nobody knew whether he favoured separate schools or not, or what he thinks about this question. If he did not try to convey the impression that an outrage has been perpetrated on Calgary, that reason has been advanced in another place, because the people of Calgary have not been able to secure the capital. Why should it not go to Edmonton? Any one who will look at the map will see that Edmonton is in a better position and more centrally located than Calgary. The hon. gentleman tries to make out that it is a question of politics because the two constituencies in the south have elected Conservatives. He has told me, and I accept his statement, that he did not say anything about Calgary or Edmonton, but I venture to say that a little while ago he made a statement that something was done to the people of Calgary because they had exercised their rights as a free people to elect a Conservative member. He has no right to say that the government did not give the capital to Calgary because they had elected a Conservative. They gave the capital to Edmonton, because it is the best place for it, because it is more centrally located than Calgary is. Everybody knows that Edmonton has a magnificent river, that it possesses immense coal deposits and I understand natural gas; that there is petroleum close to the town and everything there to build up a great city. It has the Canadian Northern. It will soon have the Grand Trunk Pacific, and will have other railroads and become a railway centre. Why should not the capital of Alberta be Edmonton? I venture to say there are nearly as many people in Edmonton now as there is in the district of Calgary. They have all the facilities there which I have mentioned, and seeing it is in a better location that it will be on the Grand Trunk Pacific and other railways and that there are millions of acres of good land to the north of it, magnincent farming lands for three or four hundred miles north, why should it not have been selected as the capital? If Calgary had been chosen it is nearer the international boundary and if any trouble should arise between this country and the United States our neighbours would take possession of it in twenty-four hours. Let us go back to the hinterland for our capital. As I said before, Regina had some claim to be the capital, but Calgary has no earthly claim that I know of. The government did not take into consideration the fact that two Conservatives had been elected from there, but they knew that Edmonton was a better place for the capital and it was selected. The next assembly will have a right to change it if they think proper to do so. It is suggested to me by an hon. gentleman that the reason why Calgary was not selected as the capital is because the government were afraid that Mr. Bennett would start a revolution and hoist the banner of revolt.

I am glad the government have taken a stand on the educational clauses in the Bill. The people are entitled to what they have got, and I am very glad they are getting it. I think in saying so I am expressing the sentiments of two-thirds or more of the people of the Northwest Territories, not the Catholic population at all, but those of other creeds. They are generally satisfied with this legislation. It is all very well for my hon. friend from Calgary to put up a legal argument on this question. He could be employed to put up an argument on the other side which would be just as logical. If I had a case in court and employed him he would put up a magnificent argument for me, but if my opponent in the case had succeeded in employing him first he would have done equally well for him. It all depends on whose ox is gored. My hon. friend is a member of the Conservative party and knows that his party has got into trouble. If he does not know it, his attention has been called to the Montreal 'Gazette' and Montreal 'Star.' He knows that they cast their die on this thing and made the greatest mistake of their lives. They should have satisfied themselves as to the feeling in the Northwest Territories before playing this card. If they had any political astuteness they would have ascertained the feeling of the people of the Territories and avoided the greatest mistake they have ever made. They know it now and feel angry, and even my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is aware that they have made a mistake. We have been told the Liberal party have gone back on their principles. I sat one night in the gallery of the other House and heard Mr. Foster speaking. I could not believe that the gentleman who was making the speech on the question was the Foster whose speeches I had read in 1896, and I had to ask somebody, is this Hon. George E. Foster that made these other speeches. I was told that he was the same gentleman. Talk about transformation, that gentleman is a quick change artist. He can change his coat quicker than anybody I know of. The government by the introduction of these Bills will settle this question for all time to come. We want no more remedial orders; we want no drag on the wheel. We got rid of that some years ago when the old Manitoba trouble was settled, thanks to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We have started out on the race of progress. The country is filling up and getting wealthy. Hundreds of thousands of people are coming in there, all consumers and making a market for the manufactured products of eastern Canada. We are doing well and we want no school question. We do not want to have gentlemen coming to the assembly with a bone of contention to start racial strife among the people. We want the matter to be put in such a shape that these gentlemen will not be able to start up strife of that kind. Knowing what some of the people did in London and North Oxford in the recent by-election, when they were asked whether they would vote for the Pope or the King, we want to avoid such trouble in the west. These gentlemen say that they would not think for one moment of raising racial or religious strife in the country. Why they have the whole of this session been scattering the seeds. Look at the efforts they made to stir up the people of the west. The whole country was covered with petitions, and brother this and brother that was running about trying to get people to sign them. We know that many people will sign petitions without much thought, but a great many did not sign these petitions and the agitators failed to create trouble. The government has done perfectly right in bringing down these Bills in this way. We are going to get rid of this trouble, settle it for all time, and put it beyond the power of demagogues to stir up strife.

I wish to refer for a moment to the question of Canadian Pacific Railway exemption. I am going to put myself on record in favour of the people of the west being released from that Canadian Pacific Railway exemption. Every one will admit that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built for the benefit of Canada, and it has been a benefit to the whole Dominion. It was built to keep British Columbia in the confederation, not for the people of the Northwest Territories, although 25,000,000 acres of land in the Territories were given in aid of its construction. It was built by the whole of Canada. We cannot fill up that country without benefiting the old provinces. We are paying our share of interest on the money borrowed to build the Intercolonial Railway, to construct the canals, and to pay railway subsidies; and against that you have spent some money on the mounted police and Indians and have given $25,000,000 of borrowed money to aid the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and what did you do further ? You gave the Canadian Pacific Railway exemption from taxation on its road-bed and branches for all time to come. I venture to say that when the population of that country will have increased many times over in the next 50 years that the exemption from taxes, if it is allowed to continue will amount to more than the whole subsidy those provinces get from the Dominion government. That road was built for the whole country, and the whole country should assume the responsibility of paying its cost. I am not going to say a word about the foolish bargain that was made at that time. It has been alluded to already. We made an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am not one to say that we should break it. Let us stick to our agreements whether written or not, as we are doing in this education matter, but this Canadian Pacific Railway question affects the whole Dominion, and I ask why should the people of those two provinces be saddled with an exemption for all time to come. when it was granted for the benefit of the whole Dominion. All Canada should release us from the exemption, and assume the liability. I intend to move an amendment on the subject when the Bill is referred to committee. I know that when these Bills become law and go into force on the 1st September and those two provinecs are launched out as members of this confederation, that you will see great development in the course of a very few years. It is taking place at the present time. If we get rid of this racial and religious strife. this bone of contention that is talked of and allow the people to work out their own salvation in that country, we will have populous and wealthy provinces in the Northwest. It is not the people of the Northwest Territories alone that own the land. The people of Canada own it and we are all one and the same. There is too much of this sectional feeling in Canada. We should try to work together for the purpose of building up a great nation, and any public man who endeavours to stir up strife, either in Ontario or Quebec, and put man against man, and province against province is no friend of the Dominion. Let us have peace, let us work out our destiny and in the course of a few years, you will find we will build up a great nation in Canada under the British flag which will be a great source of strength to the empire.

Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I should not like to give a silent vote on this question, I am compelled by conscience to say a few words in support of the position I intend to take. There is an adage, old as the time of Horace : 'Nil admirari'—be surprised at nothing, for what is least expected is sure to happen, and thus we find it to-day. A few years ago a party, in the enjoyment of power and privilege imperilled its life to carry a measure of simple justice and lost it. The personnel of the party has changed, and now it would appear almost, to take the words of Mon. Fleury : 'Puis faisant volte face assez loin de ce lieu. D'un grand air de chapeau je fais mon adieu,' so that we do not know where or how to find them. Questions should not be approached in a party spirit, and I am very sorry to have heard from two or three of the gentlemen the introduction of the religious question. The time is passed for divisions between Catholic and Protestant. It should be no longer a struggle between them. The Catholic has his position to find and so has the Protestant, but there must be a combined effort upon the part of both, for the struggle is not of one against the other, but of both against agnosticism and atheism. I have visited a good deal the other side of the Atlantic. On my first visit I saw, wherever I went, a religious people. I went back 15 years afterwards and many of my old friends were no longer staunch Presbyterians or Episcopalians. Many of those with whom I came into contact had lost all faith in religion and were agnostics, if not atheists. To me it was a matter of exquisite pain. I intend to confine myself to the educational part of this measure, because it is the only part I think myself competent to speak upon. I shall not allude to the financial question, and I am perfectly indifferent as to the boundaries to be given to Alberta and Saskatchewan, or whether we take a few thousand acres more on this side or on that; whether we come down broadly with either to the boundary line, or whether we encroach upon Hudson bay. The Territories are ours, and if one gets a little less the other will get a little more, and it is impossible to please both parties where a dividing line between neighbours is to be established. I am prepared to accept all that; but there is one question upon which I feel strongly, that we are apt to commit an act of injustice, and that is not the function of this honourable House. Justice comes from Heaven, says Bossuet, who styles it the queen of all the moral virtues.

Now where does the injustice come in here ? A parent has a right, given him by God, to educate his child in his own way. The State has nothing to do with it. If the State steps in to take possession of the child's mind, the State usurps the authority which belongs to the parent, and does a damnable act. I do not want to mince matters ; the parent is responsible and the child is obliged to listen to the parent first and not to the State so long as its first laws and regulations are respected. The State is there to see that the parent does his duty, but if he does his duty the State has no right to interfere. It has no more right to say what education the parent shall give his child than it has a right to go into his house and say what food shall be given it, or how it shall be clothed and so forth. These belong to the parent, who is responsible to God for the bringing up of the child. In the service of the State are found some of the brightest intellects, but after some of those speeches I have heard on the question, I should be sorry indeed to entrust my children to the management of some of them. The State sometimes does strange things in moments of excitement. The proposed measure is ultra vires. It is ultra vires because there can be no proper legislation which is not the embodiment of justice. I speak not as a lawyer. I am not a lawyer, thank God. To me it is a question as clearly to be defined as if it were one of tumour or no tumour, cancer or no cancer, dislocation or no dislocation ; the matter is evident and plain as day. The common school as it exists in some parts of the world is based upon the principle of state education. When did the state step in and say what the education of a child should be ? It is almost within my recollection when the thing was unknown, and it is still unknown in the best governed and freest countries in the world as I shall shortly prove.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think the leader of the opposition pointed out that it was the Conservative party which introduced that Public School Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is speaking of the other kind of schools.

Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—The state has its duties, and very important ones; but the education of a child, or rather the starving of its soul during six hours and a half a day and giving it a little condiment at the end of the day, when the child's mind is fatigued, seems farcical, were it not so serious, and a matter of cruelty. One might as well serve to him at meals, eggs without salt—meat and other kinds of food without salt—salt with nothing—and after he got through a meal, dose him with salt. Speaking of religious education, first of all let me ask, what is education? There are two aspects from which we may regard education. The true way of educating, says an eminent writer, is first to correct the beast that is within us. We were born with these tendencies, and the first effort is to correct them, in order that conscience may emerge; then to educate conscience that intellect may emerge. But what do we propose to do? We begin, first of all, with the intellect, sharpen the intellect and load the memory, and allow the conscience to take care of itself. A godless school is a source of evil beyond all calculation. There are countries in the world where they have no religious education and where they have common schools which are striking at liberty of conscience, as in France. Who is it that implants within us that liberty of conscience? We were born with it. It is our birthright. From whom does it come? It comes not from the State—the State cannot give liberty of conscience. You cannot take it away. You cannot step between man and his Maker. It is our Maker that implants in our breast that liberty of conscience—although not always, unhappily, liberty of action. Men are not always permitted to act according to the dictates of their consciences, but when they can they must, and they are not at liberty to do the opposite. One must bear in mind that from conscientious motives a large number of people cannot avail themselves of state education. In this country forty per cent cannot in conscience avail themselves of it. I will not say that they are always right. I have gone, myself, to Catholic schools for a short period of my life, and to the Protestant schools for a longer period, by far the longer. But the man who has a conscientious desire to have his child brought up in the fear and love of God in his own way, has an inalienable right to do so; and woe to the person who steps between that man and his conscience. Then we are accustomed to speak of the common school. What right has it to be called the common school, when it represents the views of only 60 per cent of the community? Are we to ignore the other 40 per cent? They are weak already, numerically inferior to the others, and have we a right to ignore them? Had the government brought in a measure to favour the minority and deal less generously with the majority, there would be less to complain of, but I contend that the state has no right to legislate in a particular direction and call that a common school which can only be used by a section of the population. It is to be regretted that in all these discussions opponents cannot enter into their opponents' mind and see things from their standpoint. Two of the speeches to-night came from entirely different quarters. They seemed to have nothing in common in their arguments, and arrived at opposite conclusions from an examination of the legal bearings of the same Bill, and yet they both possessed bright intelligence. Well, perhaps if we were to try to get out of ourselves a little more than we do, exercise a little more imagination than we do—because most of the injustices done in life arise from a want of imagination—and have more to do with justice and less with law, things would be different. If we have no imagination then follows injustice, but if a man can step out of himself and place himself in the position of one opposed to him, injustice will not usually follow. When one sees with the eye of the other, he sees with him, and justice cannot but be done. But it is unhappily the condition that there are a great number of men with little or no imagination. They see things microscopically and they attach enormous importance to trifles while matters of greater moment pass by them unheeded. Then there is a difference in the way one looks at a thing. We are all at one as to the need of religion, yet how men differ in the very concept of what religion is. One man lives an honest life, is kind to others, is honest in his dealings and practices some form of religion—to him the particular form is of no moment. On the other hand, there are those Christians who believe that every tenet of revealed religion is essential, that nothing in belief is a matter of option, and consequently nothing can be a matter for compromise. How differently men of such opposite views of religious duty will consider the present educational question. How ready the former will be to adjust or compound what he deems to be unessential, how prone to accuse those unwilling to imitate him of narrow-mindedness and bigotry; and yet how impossible for the latter to do so without forfeiting for his children that which he professes to hold dearer than life. This educational question is not a new one. It has been discussed again in England, that England to which we look for guidance and example, and whose constitution has served as the model of our own. How has England solved this question? England has never stepped between the parent and the child and nas hever attempted to give state education. I hope the time will never come when we will cease to look to Great Britain for example and to follow it as far as we can. The educational question has been a burning question with them for many years, but they have dealt with it in a fair and generous manner. They have made changes in the government of the school. At one time it was by the school trustees, at another time by inspectors, and later it was municipal. One system was found to be expensive and they changed for a cheaper system, but while they changed the form of government they never attempted to do what has been done in this case. The children were educated by their parents, or rather in the schools of their choice. Anglican, Protestant, Dissenters or Catholics, mentioning them according to their numerical strength. And how are the expenses of education paid ? In the fairest manner possible, according to results. At first they had Catholic inspectors of Catholic schools and Protestant for Protestant schools; but both sides agreed that the inspectors they had were fair and impartial. The question of religion never came up as regards the inspectors, and that is the condition of things which exists to-day. Is it not better to have something of that kind for ourselves than to go to our neighbours, in the United States, for an example. What must be the result of irreligious education, where, until half-past three in the afternoon, God is excluded from the school,—the God who made us, who permeates everything, who should be always present with us, is permitted to knock at the door and come in for half an hour in the afternoon ? We have in this country evidence of two kinds of schools, and let me here say how admirably we manage those things in the province of Quebec. I am not so familiar with the conditions of things in Ontario, but I am told they are equally happy. In Quebec, there are the Protestant school commissioners and the Catholic school commissioners, each all powerful quoad education, and the Protestant commissioners have told me that they never ask anything from the Catholic commissioners which is not at once granted. There is a superior authority superior to both to see that no injustice is done, so that if those who are numerically stronger were to attempt to do injustice to the numerically inferior the superior body immediately checks it. As an evidence of the harmony which exists, that superior body has not been called upon to act for the last 25 years. That is the happiest condition of things which could possibly exist, and why ? Because perhaps the minority had in the French Canadians to deal with an amiable godfearing people. To go, however, into matters of education in the United States, where religion is not taught and not supposed to be taught, and not permitted to be taught, what is the result ? Living here in Canada, and attached to Canadian institutions as I am, I should not like to see in this country what is described by writers in the United States to exist there. I could quote a thousand observers if time allowed; I shall take only two or three. I shall first take Bishop Spalding, of Peoria, Ill,, who, as you know, has written some admirable works, especially one entitled 'Thoughts on Education,' a book which one can afford to read with profit a dozen times, What does he say ? In the United States, millions of money are expended on education, and children get not individual teaching, but machine teaching in large buildings, with highly paid officers ; and here is the result :

> The dwellers in our fine houses are ordinary people, and show no tendency to become equal to the splendour of their habitations. The travellers in our luxurious cars and steamships have vulgar thoughts and aims, and long not for anything higher.

Our education, says Emerson, speaking of the United States, is a system of despair. It is a device to help us to gain a livelihood, to prepare the young to become clerks, or merchants or mechanics, or lawyers or preachers—a key which unlocks the world of story books, novels and newspapers ; but in education as a divine force, whereby a nobler race may be formed, we have no faith. We see to it that our machinery shall be made more and more perfect, but we have no hope that it shall be put into the hands of more godlike men and women.

Now that is the statement of one of the most thoughtful men in the United States. Emerson, whom we all know, continues : Our education is a device to help us to get a a livelihood.' And he adds it is not a Divine force. Now what is the result of this condition of things ? I take up an official document which is authority for the statement that in volume of business and number of convictions the criminal court of Cook county (Chicago),—and I take it because it is at hand and for no other reason—is the greatest criminal tribunal in the world. More prisoners are arraigned at its bar than in any similar court in the world, including London with a population of over four million ! In two months less than four years the grand juries passed upon 16,518 cases, an average of over four thousand cases each year. Yet Cook county luxuriates in the enjoyement of godless education. But the western Gotham has its ' juvenile court,' and its John Worthy school, and, its other reform methods—and will, no doubt, do something to diminish the plethora of vice with which it has to deal. Its anthropometric system, and its bureau of identification is said to be second only to that of Paris in perfection of detail. Perhaps a little religious education might have given it less to do. Yet, notwithstanding these artificial aids to detection and repression and correction of crime, statistics show an ' increased proportion of criminals, in every social system, as compared with that of past years—and shows at the same time its penal system, however perfect, to be a colossal failure.'

In many parts of the United States, and in too many parts of Canada the purpose of education would seem to be to encourage youth to seek a career which promises wealth—the possession of which being the ' ultima thule ' the limit—and too often the only limit of their desires. I am not competent to speak of Ontario, nor yet of other parts of the west, but knowing well my own province, I can say, ' Youth there is led rather to aspire after excellence in some loftier plane, and often in some avocation of an intellectual character.'

In the modern Gotham matters are not more cheerful. Statisticians show an increased population of 33⅓ per cent, or one-third in ten years. That is something to rejoice at. But during the same period crime has increased not one-third or 33⅓ per cent, but one-half or fifty per cent. New York, like Chicago, is reaping some of the advantages of a godless education. In ten years the felonies have increased ninety per cent, in one year suicide two hundred and fifty per cent.

The United States of America are at the present moment at the most critical period of their existence. And the note of alarm has been more than once sounded by the most thoughtful of their citizens, even by a vigilant and able chief magistrate. That note of alarm has swelled with each returning year till what was first a timid whisper of dissent has become a loud continued roar of distress rather than of exultation.

When, in 1855, the state of Massachusetts decided that no state money shall be appropriated to any religious sect for the maintenance exclusively of its own schools, ' and made the reading of the Bible compulsory, but allowed neither written nor oral comment, and forbade the use of any school books,' calculated to favour the tenets of any particular sect of Christians, its acts were considered wise—but time has not established their wisdom. Religious training was banished from the school and soon fell into desuetude. But something had to take its place, and instead of wholesome Christian principles—Agnosticism, or that too popular phase of geology and zoology which goes by the name of Evolutionism.

Honourable gentlemen, it has been left to our day and generation to divorce religion and education. Our Saviour acted not in this wise : His first lesson was with the doctors in the schools. The Israelites to whom so much has been promised, had their children taught at home, later in the synogogue where the Rabbi taught the usual elements of education—but always, and foremost, the bible, which formed the very keystone of all their schooling. And they were not content to delve into a translation—but the Hebrew language was taught to the children in order that they might have the priceless advantage of reading, and their children are taught the bible in the original Hebrew to this day.

It is, I believe, due to this circumstance, that the Israelites—notwithstanding the persecutions to which they have been subjected—have preserved their religious distinction, in every clime, and in every form of existence.

Before I leave the United States, I will allude to a cancer that is eating more deeply into the body politic than the tuberculosis in which my hon. friend Senator Edwards takes so much intelligent interest—more than tuberculosis and cancer combined. What is that disease ? In some states the birth-rate is far below the death rate, so that if it were not for English, Scotch and Irish men and women, the red men would come back and take possession. Why is this ? Unfortunately a few years ago, the doctrine of evolution cropped up. It was seemingly harmless, I thought it charming, and I was disposed to embrace it until I began to reflect what would be the result. Are we merely links in an endless chain, with God, if there is a God, at one end, and the little zoophyte at the other? If so, where is the harm of lifting out of that endless chain a life ab initio, or at least an anticipated life ? Unless religious education is present to say that life comes from Almighty Power, and He alone can take it away, there is no safety for the unborn. At the present time it is not by thousands, but by hundreds of thousands that life is steadily sacrificed, by a nameless and shameless method, to which I dare not allude even in the presence of elderly gentlemen as most of us are. But there is not only disturbed gestation. Ladies will not be debarred from society. They must join in the whirlwind. Maternity is not agreeable and—well—they do not like children and will not be bothered with them. There are a thousand devices. Hon. gentlemen, I formerly saw something of this kind every day in my office, and when I was a much younger man than I am now, and supposed to be impecunious, I was inundated with such cases, but I may add the same person never came back to me a second time on a like errand. This is a frightful crime ; it is decimating and more than decimating the American people. Women are becoming hopelessly barren because of the expedients to which they resort, and which they think can be dropped at pleasure, but I have seen some of them when they were old—perhaps one child arriving at maturity, and I have seen them with faces in which unutterable woe was painted. The child they had permitted to live had been taken away by death and there the old father and mother would sit opposite to each other and either of them would have given all they possessed to have a child to cheer them. How is this ? It is as I say, the legitimate outcome of evolution, a theory that has taken possession of the world. Some of the most brilliant men have adopted it, and yet it was exploded nearly a hundred years ago. Shortly after I read the views of evolutionists, I read the antidote prepared nearly a century ago ; but for one copy of the antidote that is read, ten thousand copies of the works which are doing the mischief are read, yet the evolutionists are good men who do not see the direction in which evolution is leading them. Huxley was one of the best and most amiable of men, but he did not surely realize where his teachings were leading. We are slow to suppose that in the United States the feeling of maternity is dead. Writers speak of the cold reception that fashionable women give to the child. It is different with the poor. I have never heard the first cry of a child that did not seem to give intense pleasure to the mother, however poor. There is another class free from that vice—I allude to the Jews. Persons are astonished, not I, to find the Jews, wherever they settle, increasing rapidly. When they take possession of a quarter of a city the houses are soon filled with children, each woman endeavours to realize the promise made in an especial manner to that interesting and moral people : to multiply and replenish the earth. But to come to a section of our own population ; the growth of the French Canadian people, is remarkable, without assistance from immigration. It is admitted that 146 years ago there were 70,000 men, women and children of French origin in Canada when it passed under British regime. It is supposed that 10,000 went back to France rather than live under the British flag. The 60,000 that remained have increased, how many fold, in that period of time? It is almost fabulous. They have increased 50 times. Every man, woman and child at that period is represented to-day, notwithstanding the large mortality, by fifty persons.

Now why is this? Why is it that, while the indigenous population of the Northern United States has been on the decrease, we in Canada, and especially in the province of Quebec, rejoice in the growth of a healthy and vigorous population? I answer unhesitatingly: it is due exclusively to the absence in the one case, and to the presence in the other of religious education. Whereas in one case children are permitted to grow up with insufficient views of life, and in the midst of false theories of evolution, in the other they are taught that, while they have obligations towards their fellow-men and towards their country, they have stricter obligations towards Him who created them; that God is the author of life and that He alone can take it away.

I have spoken of the United States advisedly, as the climatic conditions which there exists are pretty much what they are with us. But France also furnishes a most painful illustration of the results of godless education. Together with the successive encroachments of the State in matters of education, and the gradual banishment of the religious element from the school, France has had to deplore a corresponding decrease in her birthrate, till now, she whose people are of the same stock as our own prolific inhabitants of Quebec, has the lowest birthrate in Europe.

I have touched upon, and with great reluctance, one of the evils everywhere attendant upon education from which religion has been eliminated; and have not mentioned the alarming growth of divorce; of juvenile criminality, &c., &c., but have confined myself to the evil which has been most brought to my notice by my professional duties. And I would say that apart from any question of justice; apart from any question as to sacred guarantees to a minority, but simply as Canadians loving Canada and wishing her growth and prosperity, we should give to those Territories which are to form part of our Dominion, a constitution which will ensure, to all who desire it, the religious training of the young.

We have a people who have hitherto been let alone and have worked out their own salvation wonderfully well. If, therefore, it is our policy to attract to the new provinces, immigrants of all kinds even at the risk of having undesirable ones among them, let us beware of so framing our legislation as to exclude these of our own soil, the oldest settlers and the most attached to Canadian soil.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), moved the adjournment of the debate.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, July 14, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE FORM OF PRAYER.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON, from the committee appointed to consider and revise the form of prayer used at the opening of the Senate, presented their report and moved its adoption. He said: The committee decided that the prayers in use in the House of Commons, and which are identical with the prayers we have been using here, were satisfactory, and we have so reported.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Is the prayer shorter?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I understand from the remark which has just been made that the prayers which have been in use so many years have been changed. Is that really the case?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—No, there is no change in the prayers, but the Psalms were dispensed with. The form of prayer is identically the same as the prayer used in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Is there no change at all?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The form of prayer is not changed, but as I have explained the Psalms are omitted; the prayer is shorter.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Is there any good reason why they are omitted?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Why is not that form of prayer printed and left on the table until to-morrow so that every member can see it before voting for its adoption?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—There can be no objecton to postponing the matter until to-morrow if it is the pleasure of the House.

The report was allowed to stand until to-morrow.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND COMMITTEE ACCOUNTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

That the account of C. J. Coster, K.C., for legal services as counsel, as passed by the select committee on the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, be referred back to the Department of Justice for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not happen to be in the House when the vote was taken on this question the other day. If I had been I would have felt like moving an amendment to the motion. My own feeling has been, since looking into it, that possibly an error has been made on the side of economy in the amount allowed to Mr. Coster who acted as counsel before this investigation committee. I was strongly of the opinion that the amount allowed to the expert witness was quite ample, and it was optional for him to come or otherwise. I doubt very much if he was much of an expert. My own opinion was that he was here animated very much by a strong feeling against the company owing to the quarrels which had existed between himself and the company, and I did not feel like disturbing in any way the action which had been taken as to remuneration, which I thought was right and just, but there was a doubt in my mind whether the legal gentleman who conducted the case before the committee was allowed sufficient. Thirty dollars per day for 20 days was all that was allowed him. It is highly probable that any gentleman managing such an investigation as that would have to do a vast amount of work outside the time the committee was sitting, and although to laymen $30 a day may seem high, when you take a man away from his business it is not a large amount to allow. The Department of Justice has already dealt with it, and I do not know that the proper way is to refer it back to the department. It would be better to appoint a committee of this House to examine into the matter and make a finding as to what they consider the proper amount to be paid to Mr. Coster. I therefore move in amendment:

That all after the word 'that' be struck out, and the following substituted : the claim of C. J. Coster, K.C., regarding legal services to the select committee appointed last session to investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, be referred to a select committee consisting of Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Hon. Messrs. Lougheed, Béique, Kerr (Cobourg), and the mover, to examine the same and report to the Senate.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman accept the amendment?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is taking the House to a certain extent by surprise to move this amendment at this particular time. The Department of Justice has already been seized with this matter and considered it. If the motion of which the hon. gentleman from Rothesay gave notice were passed, the Department of Justice would know that the House thought Mr. Coster's services were entitled to greater remuneration than had been awarded to him at the previous taxation, and I think that was just what we wished. It would not have involved the loss of any time on the part of this House. The course which is proposed now involves the appointment of a special committee, the meeting of the committee, the consideration of the subject and the presentation of a report to the House. I have no doubt, from our previous experience in dealing with this matter, that there would probably be considerable difference of opinion in the House as to the report of the committee, and at this stage of the session I do not think the House can afford to spend time in that sort of occupation. I regret that this amendment has been moved; the original motion I think was the right and proper one.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am disposed to vote for the motion to refer this matter to the sub-committee.

The House divided on the amendment, which was carried on the following division.

Yeas, 28 ; nays, 21.

SATURDAY SITTINGS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That there be two distinct sittings of the Senate on Saturday the 15th instant, the first sitting to be from eleven a.m. to one p.m., and the second from three p.m. to six p.m.

PRINTING OF DEBATES.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct attention to a matter which appears to me to reflect a little upon the mode in which our proceedings are conducted. I have applied sundry times within the last 24 hours to obtain a copy of the debates of Wednesday last, and although two days have elapsed I have not been able to secure a copy yet. In the House of Commons, when the debates lasted fourteen or fifteen hours there was never any trouble in supplying members with the unrevised 'Hansard' within twelve hours after the House adjourned : and it is my opinion that unless some very good reason be shown to the contrary, the Senate is entitled to equal consideration with the lower branch of parliament, inasmuch as the Senate sets the Commons a very good example by not talking too much. I should like to draw the attention of those in charge to the matter, because 48 hours is too long a time to elapse before forwarding the unrevised edition.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hon. gentlemen will be delighted to hear my hon. friend make this complaint. We have been presenting it for years and years to this House, and we have probed the matter pretty well to the bottom. We found that the trouble was that the government did not supply the King's Printer with the facilities to do the work for this House. He had not the facilities at his disposal, nor the space in the Printing Bureau to enable him to do this work and keep abreast with what is being done for the House of Commons. I am delighted that my hon. friend takes an interest in it, and as he is a member of the government we will probably have it remedied.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I brought this matter before council every year for about five years, and there was always an objection to the extension of the Printing Bureau by the government. They thought it was badly placed, an eyesore, and they wanted it removed. As that was the feeling, they declined to make the necessary additions to it. That difficulty has now been overcome and additions are now being made in the height of the building and by the addition of a wing, which will give ample opportunity to complete the work promptly ; but in reference to this particular subject I should like hon. gentlemen who are on the committee to say whether I am right. I do not think there is a distribution of the unrevised edition.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not seen it. When this subject was up before and we were investigating, it was usually found that the fault lay with the gentlemen who detained the reports for the purpose of making proper corrections, and I think we then made a rule that unless the corrections were made within a given time, the printing should be allowed to proceed. When I have investigated it, I have always found that it was due to the detention of the proofs in the hands of the gentlemen who had delivered the speeches.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am speaking of the possibility of getting any proof at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proof of course is not distributed. I understand the first process is to send a proof to the senator who made the speech.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—No, the unrevised edition is sent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I do not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The last we have on file is the 7th July—this day week.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—That is the revised edition.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As the Chairman of the Debates Committee, I shall give a word of explanation. The rule that was adopted last session was that an unrevised edition should be distributed to the members, the next day or as soon as possible after the sitting, and of course no detention of the copy is required for the purpose of making corrections. It is only for the revised edition that the members are supposed to have 24 hours to make their corrections But as far as the unrevised edition is concerned, we must bear in mind that we can hardly expect to have it as soon as they receive it in the Commons, for this reason ; in the Commons they have a staff of seven shorthand writers who assist one another. They each take notes for ten minutes, and then transcribe their notes, and therefore as the sitting progresses the matter may be sent to the printing office. Here we have only two reporters, and if the House sits until twelve o'clock, as has been the case during the last couple of days, it is hardly fair to expect that these two reporters would do the work as seven would do it in the House of Commons. It is hardly fair to expect that the contractors would keep a staff of four or five or six or seven men when it is not required, as our session is full of adjournments. It would be very expensive and they would be unable to do it with the remuneration they are getting ; in fact the contractors have been complaining that the adjournments are so frequent that they desire to have other conditions for the reporting of the debates. But I may say that I have had occasion to inquire repeatedly during last session, and I learned that a great deal of the delay was not from the reporters but from the Printing Bureau—where they have not the proper facilities and where they give the preference entirely to the Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I might state to this honourable House that I delivered my speech the same day as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was the last speaker that evening and my speech was sent to the bureau yesterday morning and they have had it there since that time.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The fact might be mentioned that the reporting staff is a little weak at this moment. During the ordinary run of work hon. gentlemen must have observed that they received their unrevised edition in the box in the post office, but, as the hon. gentlemen probably know, Mr. Andrew Holland, one of the reporters, met with a severe accident and he has not been able to attend to his duty and there is difficulty in keeping up the staff, and such a mass of work has been pouring in during the last few days that it is impossible for the two men to sit here day and night and have their report ready for the printing bureau for the next day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not in the House when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce called attention to this matter, but I am very glad he has done so. I have been complaining of this for the last year or two, and now that it has affected one of the ministers, the probabilities are we will have some relief. But I am quite sure that if hon. gentlemen make inquiries they will find the trouble is not with the official reporters, but that it is at the Printing Bureau. That is my information, and during this whole session, with one or two exceptions, our sittings have not been over an hour or two or three hours a day, and there is no reason in the world to prevent the reports of those short sittings being in the senators' boxes the next morning. I hold in my hand the debates of the House of Commons delivered last night, comprising 70 or 80 pages. Perhaps the last speech would be delivered after twelve o'clock, but when you come to the Senate and get your mail in the morning at 10 o'clock you never find your unrevised edition of what took place the day before. You are very lucky if you get it two or three days after. I know in some cases I wanted to look at what I said. The adjournment took place in the meantime and I never saw it. It may be correct and it may not. As a rule I would say that the reports made by our reporters are very correctly made, but I do not see any reason at all why 19 times out of 20 we should not have the unrevised edition next morning at an early hour, say 11 o'clock. We have had late sittings on only two or three days, but there has been a somewhat lengthy debate since the Autonomy Bill has been introduced.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Referring to what the hon. gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Ellis) says with regard to the difficulty of our present staff of reporters having the unrevised reports ready next morning after a debate, I have nothing to say in that matter, but whatever position the members of the committee may be in, I do not think the members of the House generally are in a position to apportion the blame for the delay. I mention this because it happened the other day there was a little discussion about the same matter, and it was affirmed that the blame lay altogether with the Printing Bureau, and the next day I received a letter from the King's Printer giving certain hours and minutes and so on as to when the copy had been received by the bureau and when returned here, which seemed to indicate that the blame was not all on the shoulders of the bureau. I do not know where the blame is, but I do not think it is altogether fair to undertake to apportion the blame when we do not know the facts.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—As a member of the Debates Committee, I think it would be advisable if our chairman would at the next meeting fully discuss this matter and devise a means of remedying the complaint. I can see myself very clearly how everything can be satisfactorily carried on so far as the reporting of our 'Hansard' is concerned. It simply means want of facilities. We must all remember that if you throw an immense amount of work from the Commons and the Senate into the hands of the reporters and on the linotype machines and the printers in 24 hours, it would be impossible to meet the demand upon them. My own idea is that towards the close of the session it would be proper to get a couple of extra linotype machines and a couple of extra reporters and we could get our debates printed in the proper time. I should like to see the speeches made in the Senate put into the hands of the senators as expeditiously as is done in the Commons. There is no reason why it should not be done. We have only to deal with the matter in a business-like method and have the work done expeditiously and there will be no cause for complaint.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for the second reading (Bill 69) an Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta, and the motion of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell in amendment thereto : That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We have before us a subject on which we should be able to felicitate each other and congratulate each other on the progress of the country in population, and wealth which leads to the necessity for the creation, or formation of two new provinces in the great Northwest. Instead of such felicitations we have war, discord and ill-feeling. Who is to blame for all this ? Those who departed from the letter of the law under the conditions of which the rights of religious minorities are safeguarded. The provisions of the British North America Act should have been adhered to. I am in favour of national schools for all and let those who wish for separate schools have them and pay for them. This separation should not be perpetuated. When children grow up what do we find ? Intercourse in every phase of life—in the most sacred, such as marriage—as well as commercial and social intercourse. Not only that but we find the religious side of this question thrown to the wind as against party. The Bill as first introduced embodied the wishes of Catholics and I suppose the Catholic clergy. Are we never in this country to have a homogeneous people or are we to be for ever divided into the lambs and the goats ? It is an evil state of things—and who will say : 'I am holier than thou art—stand back.' If Catholic children are holier and better than Protestant children that is the very reason they should mix and associate and so leaven, improve, and reform by their good example. Carry this separation to its logical conclusion—in all stages of life keep the Catholics separate. It cannot be done ; Catholics of full age and of common sense would not tolerate such restrictions. In my dealings with men, and from my observations and experience, I find no difference between Catholic and Protestant. We have an example of that in this House. The feeling is as friendly and cordial as if our tenets were the same. We find Catholics individually, men of culture and refinement, and of broad liberal views. We have such in this House—who will, I know, pardon me for making a comparison of nations in a public way. Take Italy, a strongly Catholic nation, is it progressive, stable and to be envied and copied ? A country where you have a stiletto for breakfast or supper as it may happen. Take Spain, a strongly Catholic country ; the same remarks will apply, substituting machete for stiletto. Take France—once strongly Catholic—now more infidel than anything else. Take the 13 Latin-American States in South America with the Catholic religion prevailing over all. Are they progressive and stable, and is life safe ? Certainly not. My reference is to the countries from Mexico to Chili, including Venezuela, Brazil, and the Argentine. Take Germany, largely Protestant. It is stable, full of progress and prosperity. Take Great Britain, largely Protestant, and we find it stable, powerful, and prosperous with freedom for all to worship as they like. Take the different divisions of Ireland —Catholic and Protestant—let some one draw the comparison, I will not, out of respect to my friends of Irish origin. Take Scotland, largely Protestant; where does she stand ? At the head of all countries, in stability, progress and wealth, contributes to the imperial revenue $4 per head more than England does, and double the contribution of Ireland. If therefore religion influences nations, and we believe it does, with which countries lies the preponderance in stability, progress, civilization and wealth, Catholic or Protestant nations ? I need not answer, it is too well known. The United States, great in every way, is largely Protestant.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the placid way in which the country has taken this separate school question, and intimates that those most interested in the subject have not remonstrated. He asks what is the inference to be drawn? I say the inference is want of knowledge of the provisions of the Bill, on the one hand, and indifference on the other. Of the five and a half million people in Canada how many know anything of this Bill ? Are there a million who know? I think not, and the majority of those who know do not care one way or the other. I don't know if any senator will say that the recent elections in Ontario turned on the school question. I think not ; they rather turned on the general national policy of the government and the personal popularity of the elected members. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce alluded to another subject not germane to that under discussion. It was an entirely uncalled for and cold-blooded stab at a political party. Not only that, but the statement regarding stagnation in the country from 1878 to 1896 is not according to facts, totally unwarranted, totally unsubstantiated. I challenge the hon. gentleman to prove his words. Any one who will take the trouble to look at the revenue as a criterion of the condition of the country will find that the revenue rose steadily from $24,000,000 in 1879 to $36,000,000 in 1896. With that revenue the Conservative government carried on, in face of the most strenuous opposition ever seen, the most gigantic public works ever carried on in Canada, and such as the hon. gentleman would not have had nor ever will have the courage to carry out, viz.: the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Sault Ste. Marie canal and the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. These are some of the works carried out in those days of stagnation, as the hon. gentleman called them. Every stage in our progress was opposed by the hon. gentleman and his friends. We have now before us Bills to create two new provinces in the Northwest. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had not been carried into that country would it to-day be ripe for the creation of new provinces? The answer must be that it would not. The Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed and has opened up that country. Who did this? The Conservative party. Would that road have ever been built if the hon. gentleman and his party could have prevented it? No, never. And if the Canadian Pacific Railway had not been constructed the Northwest to-day would be the wilderness it was 100 years ago. These facts cannot be controverted. The hon. gentleman knows better than I do how the whole Liberal party fought against the building of that road.

Does the hon. gentleman remember the soup kitchens and the thousands of idle men from 1874 up to 1878? Does he not know of the closed factories? Does he not remember preaching unrestricted reciprocity, which meant handing over control of our affairs to the United States? Does he not know that under the Liberal policy this country was made the dumping ground for the United States surplus of inferior products? Does he not know that with the National Policy under Conservative rule the country rose with a bound from depression and despondency to full confidence, resulting in the reopening of factories and the building of new ones and in maufacturing being undertaken on a larger scale than previously? Does he not remember that capitalists, full of confidence, invested their capital? Does he not know that the revenue increased during the period he calls stagnation from $24,000,000 to $36,000,000? Does he not know that if the Liberal policy of low tariff and no protection had been put into force the country would have been bankrupt before now, factories would be closed, no Pacific Railway built, no Northwest opened, no line of steamers or trade with Japan, China, Australia and the South Sea Islands? Does he not know and see how that under such a policy as he advocated there would have been no progress, but decay? Does he not know perfectly well that the policy under which the country carries on its commerce and under which the country is so prosperous is the Conservative policy of moderate protection?

The hon. gentleman knowing all this why does he cast stones? No matter what party is in power we are delighted to see the country prosperous and this government has been most fortunate in the condition of the country for the last eight years under the Conservative protective policy—and I hope it will go on prospering.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I feel reluctant to take any part in this or any other debate in the Senate just now, being advised to avoid any kind of work for some time to come on account of my health ; but I feel the vote I intend to give in favour of the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition in this House, chiefly on account of my hostility to the educational clause of the Bill under discussion, may subject me to a charge of inconsistency, in view of my antecedents as an advocate of separate schools, unless fully and frankly explained. Not that I attach much importance to charges of that character, as no sensible man refuses to change his opinion under altered circumstances or on the acquisition of new light or information ; otherwise his consistency, if a merit at all, belongs, as has been tritely said, to the virtues of a class not reckoned among the wisest of men.

It is not always necessary, however, to make a speech here or elsewhere in justification of one's change of mind in relation to public affairs, when that change, as in my case, only involves a legal opinion ; but I do not see how I can avoid doing so on this occasion, as I have on many occasions in the past, during the early years of my political career, been known as a warm friend of separate schools.

Let me say at the outset, that I am to-day as strong an advocate of the wisdom and justice of giving separate or voluntary schools to all that claim them on the ground of conscientious scruples or convictions as I ever was, and if any issue involving such a claim as I have just stated were now properly before me, I would not hesitate how to act. But according to my present reading of the imperial Acts under which we are now legislating—I mean the British North America Act, 1867, and the Acts in amendment thereof—I consider that no such issue is properly before us to-day ; but other issues of paramount importance to the peace, welfare and good government of the country demand our consideration at the present time.

But I must also say, at the outset of these remarks, that while I still entertain the views just expressed relative to separate schools, I have changed my opinion since 1875-6 with regard to the power of this parliament to enact the educational provisions contained in this Bill, as I now consider the subject one exclusively assigned by our Constitutional Act to the provincial legislatures, and with regard to which parliament has no right to interfere.

I entered public life in 1863 as an independent member of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Nova Scotia. In the following year, the Hon. Charles Tupper introduced in that body the measure that was afterwards known as the Common Schools Act. In fact, the leader of the opposition, the Hon. Adams Archibald, united his forces with him to carry the Bill through the assembly. The measure was compulsory in all its provisions, and ignored separate or voluntary schools. I opposed it from start to finish, and frequently got into bitter altercation with some of the able men who supported it, and as may well be imagined, was often pretty roughly handled in some of these encounters. Yet I did not hesitate to give fight to the unequal forces arrayed against me. I always considered that the ground on which I stood was firm and unassailable, and that some at least of the arguments I could advance were irresistible and unanswerable, and made even so feeble a champion as myself an opponent not to be despised. I have always looked upon the right of the parent to control the education of his child as a natural, inalienable right, (unless forfeited by parental misconduct) with which the state cannot justly interfere. I have always held that the state has no right to ask or compel a parent to pay for a school, or to send his child to a school, in regard to whose teaching, or want of teaching, he entertained conscientious objections. I have always considered that the state has no right to intrude on the domain of conscience in matters of education any more than it has in matters of religion. I do not care whether a man's conscientious convictions are right or wrong or even absurd, while he sincerely holds them—doing no wrong to society and giving no offence to his neighbour—he is entitled to have them respected by the laws of the land. Wherever any other rule exists, liberty of conscience cannot exist, and if we ignore liberty of conscience, then the boasted freedom of our laws and institutions is nothing better than a mockery, a delusion and a farce. What, I ask, is to-day the secret of Britain's amazing success as a ruler of alien races of every clime, colour and description throughout her world-wide possessions ? It is, in the first place, that wise laws and just treatment everywhere follow the flag of the empire ; but it is equally true and equally important that respect for the religious rites, beliefs and superstitions of conquered races, no matter how absurd or fantastic in our eyes, is a well recognized principle of her imperial policy, and largely the foundation of its success. It is the key note to-day of Protestant England's policy both at home and abroad, and especially at home, in relation to her laws respecting education, which are framed, as far as possible, to meet the religious views of all classes, thus making liberty of conscience also a recognized principle of her educational system ; but Protestant Canada has not followed that noble example, alike generous and just, except where the terms of the hard and fast contract of the British North America Act oblige her to do so. But it must be admitted by all who heard the interesting historical statement of the hon. member from Belleville in his masterly speech the day before yesterday, that the record of the opposition in Canada for nearly a century far outshines in liberality that of the Liberal party on this question, I say, where liberty of conscience is not respected, there can be no real freedom; there can be no real happiness or contentment among the oppressed ; and there can be no guarantee for the safety, the permanency or the greatness of the state.

These, hon. gentlemen, were the views I entertained on the question of common school education in 1867, when I became a member of this Senate, and so far as the right of the people to separate schools, if they desire them, is concerned, my views, I repeat, are unchanged.

The first occasion on which I was called upon to act in an educational controversy in this body was when the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie's government, in 1875, submitted to this House a Bill for consolidating the laws for the government of the Northwest Territories. That Bill contained a clause—clause 11—which was forced on the government by the Hon. Edward Blake while the Bill was passing through the House of Commons, and which produced no small excitement at the time in parliamentary circles. That clause reads as follows :

11. When, and as soon as any system of taxation shall be adopted in any district or portion of the Northwest Territories, the Lieutenant Governor, by and with the consent of the council or assembly, as the case may be, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education; but it shall therein be always provided, that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the Northwest Territories, or any lesser portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same may be known, may establish such schools therein as they deem fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor ; and further that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and that in such latter case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessment of such rates as they may impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

Many of the supporters of the government of that day in the other chamber, who felt compelled to vote for the clause for one reason or another, to my knowledge, hoped, schemed and plotted to secure its defeat in the Senate. I knew all that was going on when the Bill came before our House, and made up my mind to do all in my power to defeat the plotters. I consulted with the leader of the opposition, Senator Campbell (afterwards Sir Alexander), who assured me he was in favour of the clause, and that I could tell all his friends so. I used his name with great advantage in my canvass of the Conservative Senators, many of whom, however, only agreed to abstain from voting, rather than vote against their respected leader. On the third reading of the Bill in the Senate, the combination to defeat the provision for separate schools in the 11th clause developed itself on the motion in amendment of the Hon. Mr. Aikins, who had been Sir Alexander Campbell's colleague in the last Conservative government, to strike out all the words in the 11th clause relating to separate schools, warmly supported by the Hon. George Brown, the great Liberal statesman of that day. There was a warm and prolonged debate in this House on the motion of Senator Aikins, very imperfectly reported in the Senate 'Hansard' of those days, with much excitement in the Senate, and up to the last moment before the division the result was doubtful. When Mr. Aikins' motion was put from the Chair it was declared lost on the following division: Contents, 22; non-contents, 24—only a majority of 2. The names were as follows:

Contents—Aikins, Alexander, Benson, Botsford, Brown, Christie (Speaker), Dickey, Dickson, Flint, Haythorne, Kaulbach, Leonard, McClelan, Macfarlane, Macpherson, Montgomery, Muirhead, Seymour, Simpson, Sutherland, Vidal, Wark.—22.

Non-contents—Allan, Armand, Baillargeon, Bellerose, Bureau, Campbell, Carroll, Chaffers, Cormier, Dumouchel, Guevrement, Hamilton (Inkerman), Letellier de St. Just, McMaster, McDonald (Toronto), Miller, Paquette, Penny, Price, Ryan, Scott, Shaw, Skead, Trudel—24.

When the result was announced the Conservative leader, Sir Alexander Campbell, close to whom I sat, turned to me and said, 'Miller, they may thank you for saving that clause.'

I certainly spoke more than any one else to save it, as the imperfect 'Hansard' reports of that period will show, and I know I worked more to save it than anybody else, not excepting the two ministers, and it may not be unworthy noting that I enjoyed the distinction on the occasion of the division of being the sole and solitary senator from the three maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island whose name is recorded in the list of non-contents, who saved the clause by the majority of 2.

The Act of 1875 was to be put into operation by proclamation, but when parliament met in 1876 no proclamation had been issued by the government. This gave an opportunity to the opponents of clause 11 to get up petitions against it, and the table of the Senate was loaded with a very large number from the maritime provinces, asking for the amendment of the Act in regard to separate schools. On that occasion I spoke at considerable length against the petitions, and in favour of the clause, concluding my speech with the following words: 'He (Mr. Miller) thanked the government again for their determination to adhere to the law of last session, which secured freedom of education for ever to the Territories of the Northwest. When the Act will have been proclaimed, which he supposed would shortly be done, it can never be repealed, and the privileges it guarantees will then become the birthright of the generations that are to people that great and promising country, so long at least as British institutions and British justice shall prevail there.'

That was the opinion I held thirty years ago, when the Act of 1875 was passed, with regard to the legal effect and operation of clause 11, and it was, I think, the opinion generally held at that time by lawyers and leading public men like the Hon. George Brown, due largely I believe to the fact that the clause had the approval of so eminent a lawyer as Mr. Blake. The paragraph just quoted is my only recorded utterance during the last thirty years on the school question, in parliament or elsewhere, although since 1890 the question has engaged the attention of all our courts from the lowest to the highest, and has been the subject of prolonged discussions in parliament and in the press, as well as on many public platforms. Up to 1890, I rested under the belief that in giving my humble assistance to secure the passage of clause 11, of the Act of 1875, I had done my share to settle the vexed question of education for ever in the Northwest Territories, and as I thought very satisfactorily. I looked upon the Act of 1875 as a permanent settlement beyond disturbance or evasion. But, first, in 1890, by the abolition of separate schools in Manitoba by the Greenway government, and shortly afterwards by the ordinances of the Northwest council abolishing Protestant and Roman Catholic separate schools in the Territories, I had a rude awakening to the incorrectness of my conclusions. It will be admitted the investigation in the courts, and the agitation outside, threw a flood of light on the legal and constitutional points involved that parliament had not to guide it in 1875. I did not fail to keep myself as well informed as I could on the various developments of the subject in controversy, between the friends and opponents of separate schools, with all my sympathies in favour of the former.

In 1890, I took occasion to discuss the school question with the late Sir John Thompson. My intimacy with Sir John and my connection with his public career, are well known in Nova Scotia, and perhaps in all the old provinces, as the Toronto 'Globe' published verbatim a pamphlet written by me in relation to Mr. Castell Hopkin's biography of that distinguished lawyer and statesman some years ago. We discussed clause 11 of the Act of 1875, and clause 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, several times. Sir John differed from my view of the legal effect and operation of the Act of 1875 as a permanent settlement of the school question in the northwest. He expressed himself in his usual modest way of only throwing out doubts, which he would like me to take further time and opportunity to consider and investigate. He regarded clause 11, as merely tentative, provisional and temporary, and as creating no vested rights whatever, and his recorded utterances are to that effect. I clearly inferred from the general trend of his conversation that his views leaned distinctly to non-interference with the local authorities in educational matters, even in the Territories, in conformity with the spirit of clause 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, although the letter of the clause might not strictly apply to the Territories. We talked the subject over frequently in the early nineties, and while I still held to my views of 1875-6, he seemed to me to show a stronger leaning to the doctrine of provincial rights. When he was required in 1894 to report on the virtual abolition, as I thought, of separate schools in the Territories, as contemplated by the Act of 1875, by the Haultain ordinances, on the petition of Father Leduc and others, some people attributed his report against the petitioners to timidity or cowardice, or a desire to evade the issues raised. Nothing could be more erroneous or unjust. In my opinion, he would have advised the disallowance of the obnoxious ordinances if he thought in doing so he stood on safe constitutional ground; but he feared a conflict with the Northwest council in which he might be worsted in the courts, thus showing how strong a hold the idea of provincial rights had on his mind. When Thompson had passed off the stage in 1894, and after further study and research on my own part, I came reluctantly to the conclusion, that my opinion as to the legal effect and operation of clause 11 of the Act of 1875 was untenable and unsound, and that the subject of education belonged exclusively to the provinces, whether already in existence, or afterwards created; and this is the opinion I hold at the present time.

It is I admit a change of the legal view I took of the subject in 1875-6—a change largely due to intervening events and circumstances, and to the exhaustive discussions and investigations in the courts, in parliament, and in the public press during the last thirty years. But how often in a less period of time than thirty years are even the ablest lawyers compelled to change or modify their opinions on legal questions in consequence of new light from further study and investigation? I am not at all embarrassed by the change I have to admit, when I see the great changes so many eminent men have felt themselves at liberty to make on this vexed question. For instance, how different is the position the Prime Minister occupied not ten years ago, when he denounced as coercion, remedial legislation authorized by the highest court in the empire, and cried 'hands off Manitoba,' from what he does to-day when attempting by his Autonomy Bills to override provincial rights, and the difference is one both of principle and policy? The course of the late Premier Mackenzie was equally inconsistent, or even more so. In 1867, Mr. Mackenzie reprobated separate schools in the Canadian legislature with all the strength of his robust vocabulary, and commended the non-sectarian system of education prevailing in the United States as one of the wisest emanations of the mind of man. Yet in 1875, only eight or nine years afterwards, while he was Prime Minister of Canada, he approved the insertion of a clause in the Provisional Constitution of the Northwest Territories, creating Protestant and Roman Catholic separate schools.

Let me here say, that I do not consider the educational provisions of the Bill before the Senate secure separate schools to the minority of the new province, or in fact any educational privileges whatever, and this the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce virtually admitted yesterday. I believe they will prove absolutely worthless towards any such end or purpose. I will not call them a 'gold brick,' but they are most certainly a deception, so far as they hold out any hope in that direction. I take the ground that you cannot compel the new province to establish separate schools within its borders or give any school privileges whatever, without its consent, no matter what laws this parliament may pass to attain that object. Such laws will become perfectly futile and inoperative against the will of the people. When Alberta becomes a province it will have just such schools as suit it, despite our wishes or legislation. Need I do more than point to the province of Manitoba as proof of what I assert? We all thought when Manitoba entered the union its educational status was irrevocably settled, and that it guaranteed for ever separate schools to religious minorities. What are all those guarantees worth to-day? Absolutely nothing.

We will experience the same result with this new province of Alberta, when its legislative machinery is in working order. I repeat, when Alberta becomes a province it will establish just such schools as will suit its people, despite our coercion or legislation. And what will the oppressed minority be able to do about it? Seek remedial legislation? Surely the Liberal party will never attempt to coerce the new province by remedial legislation. Rather would we expect to hear from that quarter the cry 'Hands off Alberta'; 'no coercion.' And just as surely it would not be expected from the Conservative party, after its experience of injustice and ingratitude, and the lesson of three general elections, that it would ever again rush to its doom on another Remedial Bill. There will never again be any remedial legislation attempted by either political party in this Dominion, no matter how unjustly the majority may treat the minority in any of the provinces. And this is the mess that Papal ablegates and delegates have made of the school question in Canada.

The only result of the obnoxious legislation now before the Senate will be to create in the new provinces a never-ending cause of irritation and strife—accompanied with creed animosities—and the general disturbance of that harmony and peace so necessary to the progress and development of a new country with a great future before it.

So strongly was I animated by these sentiments that, although prostrated by sickness when this Bill was introduced in the other branch of parliament by the right hon. the Prime Minister in a very extraordinary speech—a speech that did more than anything else to inflame passion; to arouse religious and national prejudice, and prolong the session—I felt it my duty to address the following letter to the hon. leader of the opposition two or three days before the resignation of the Hon. Mr. Sifton:

(Private and confidential.)

181 Lisgar street, Ottawa,
February 27th, 1905.

Dear Mr. Borden,—I have been confined to my rooms, in fact to my bed, for the last ten days, threatened with appendicitis.

As one who has given the school question in Canada some study since the beginning of my public life in 1863, I think my knowledge of every phase of the subject equal to that of most public men. I think I know as much of the blunders of both parties in regard to it, as well as my own, as most onlookers.

I consider the speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the Autonomy Bill in parliament a few days ago a marvel of political indiscretion. Can he recede? If not, the disruption of the Liberal party cannot be delayed six months.

What should be the attitude of the opposition on this question at the present time? To me nothing is clearer than our duty to stand by the constitution—fearlessly and firmly; and the control of education belongs to the new provinces constitutionally.

I have neither inclination nor strength to give the reasons for the opinion I hold, but they exist abundantly in my mind.

I do not know when my physician will allow me out of bed.

Yours truly,

WM. MILLER.

R. L. Borden, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons.

But the Prime Minister did recede under the dictation of that practical statesman the Hon. Clifford Sifton, and readily cast to the winds the high, moral and religious ideas so offensively expressed in his indiscreet speech on the first reading of the Bill, sacrificing his convictions to retain place and power. Would any of our great Conservative leaders in the past—Sir John Macdonald, Sir George Cartier or Sir Charles Tupper—have played so ignoble a role? They would have stepped proudly out of office sooner than do anything of the kind. And yet no later than yesterday we heard Sir Wilfrid Laurier lauded as the greatest statesman Canada has ever produced, by an hon. gentleman whose admiration for his friend seems to amount to personal idolatry.

The legal and constitutional features of the Bill have been so ably, fully and clearly placed before the country in the other branch of parliament, as well as in the public press of the Dominion, that I will not by repetition of the arguments of others, or by any new argument of my own, pay so poor a compliment to the intelligence of the Senate as to appear to suppose that hon. senators are not as well informed on the vital legal points at issue as I am myself, and some even more so. Besides, this general expression of my views is just as much as I care to attempt at present. The able legal statement of the leader of the opposition in another place remains unanswered and unanswerable, and had I been a member of the House of Commons on the occasion of the second reading of this Bill in that House I could not have avoided voting with him on his constitutional amendment; and I believe had the late Sir John Thompson been present on that occasion he would have recorded his vote with the minority in defence of provincial rights.

But I also consider the Bill does not fairly settle the land question. The province of Alberta should have all the provincial resources for revenue and development that the old provinces secured as the terms of confederation when the union was created in 1867. It is true that Alberta is treated no worse than was Manitoba when it became one of the provinces of the Dominion, but it does not follow that that treatment was either wise or just. At any rate the circumstances and conditions, both as regard the Dominion and the Territories, are entirely different from those which existed in the early seventies when Manitoba was admitted, and any comparison of its case with the new province would be very absurd, or at least very inapplicable. Moreover, from all I can learn from the best authority the distribution of the constituencies in the Bill is grossly partisan and unjust, and has been openly denounced in the House of Commons as nothing less than indecent, and I therefore have no hesitation in consequence of my hostility to the Bill on the three important subjects I have referred to in voting against the motion of the hon. Secretary of State, and in favour of the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I was surprised to hear the views on education expressed by my hon. friend the member for Victoria (Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.). Surely he does not seriously entertain the idea that Protestants and Catholics can obtain religious instruction in the same school from the same teachers. That would be impossible. I think that all who have spoken on this subject both inside and outside of the two Houses of parliament will agree for the sake of argument that our population is divided between two great sects or religions, the Catholic and Protestant. As far as I am concerned, I will not hold second place to any one in insisting upon a thoroughly Catholic education in our Catholic schools, and let me say that I would look with pride on the bringing back of the old days and the old schools that were in the shadow of the Protestant churches. In those times schools turned out men which gave Canada a name and a fame, men of rectitude, men of honour, men who did not go crazy on financial matters, men who were not of that class described by Lawson, of Boston, who make the dollar their God and care not for the freedom or happiness of their fellow men. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition yesterday read a very interesting document prepared and circulated a few months ago for the members of this House. I must confess that I was pleased at its contents. In that document he made reference to the school agitation of the old days. My hon. friend seemed to convey the impression that in the old days when the Conservative party was in all its glory the Liberal politicians were upon record as the opponents of Catholic education and separate schools. Among the other men mentioned was the late Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, and as a tribute to his memory I feel that I should say something in his defence on account of what was stated in that document yesterday. It is quite true indeed that Sir Oliver Mowat in his earlier years was an opponent of separate schools, but Sir Oliver Mowat lived to do better. The hon leader of the opposition also made reference to the present hon. leader of the government in this House having been a Conservative in those days. We all learn as we grow older, our minds become matured and broadened; and in finding a place in the Liberal ranks I am [illegible] leader was not out of place. If he has left the Conservative party he is in good company, for we must remember that men like Gladstone did the same thing. I have often with pleasure referred to the leader of the opposition as being the youngest man in the Senate. I sincerely hope that as he grows older his mind will also be broadened, and he may yet, as our Secretary of State, be found on this side of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no hope for me.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Let me say this in regard to Sir Oliver Mowat and as a tribute to his memory. Nineteen years ago the elections in the province of Ontario were fought by the Conservative party with the express purpose of abolishing separate schools. I say this advisedly and thoughtfully. There were two elections in Mr. Meredith's time. We all know that Sir William Meredith at that time was the leader of the Conservative party, and we know that the Toronto 'Mail' and Sir William Meredith deliberately went to the country with the avowed purpose of abolishing separate schools. Finding that this could not be done they promised on their return to power to make our separate schools in Ontario unworkable. As friends of separate schools we had Sir Oliver Mowat, and his party. He went to the country as the champion of separate schools and carried the country, and I was proud of my fellow-citizens of Ontario for decrying the agitation which was got up in those days.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am only taking in the situation now; I should like to know where those statements which the hon. gentleman mentioned were made. I took part in that contest and we never had such a platform. It is true that Sir William Meredith and His Grace the Archbishop of Kingston had a squabble over it in the press, but so far as the electorate are concerned they took no part in it.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I was myself present in the London Opera House when Sir William Meredith described the Catholics of Ontario as the common enemy.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That may have been his opinion, but I am asking you what the contest was.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I am giving you the opinion of the leader of the Conservative party in that election.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The party were not bound by that opinion.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—The compromise agreed to by the representatives from the Northwest Territories, and which appears to be the full extent of what they were pleased to call their concession, leaves but little ground upon which they may base a claim for fair dealing, not to speak of generosity, towards the minority. It becomes a majority to be generous; but they should at the very least be just.

Let me draw attention for a moment to this view of the matter: The Catholic people of the Northwest Territories desire, as do the Catholic people of the Dominion, that their children should receive a religious training in their schools, and that this religious training should be imparted during every school day. Be it remembered that the entire expense of supporting these schools is borne by the Catholic ratepayers. I might say here that in the election in London several respectable Protestant gentlemen were found to be fully persuaded, that the Protestant people of the Northwest Territories would be compelled to support Catholic schools. Our Protestant neighbours are not called upon nor are they expected by Roman Catholics to contribute the smallest amount directly or indirectly towards the maintenance of separate schools. It is a mistake to suppose that any sum of money granted by the government towards the separate schools is a contribution coming out of the pockets of non-Catholics. The separate schools receive only that percentage from the public exchequer to which they are entitled, because the supporters of these separate schools contribute their share to make up this common fund.

When we take into account, then, the fact that separate schools are maintained entirely by the Catholic people, is it not something which deserves a harsher term than presumption for any portion of the community to dictate to the supporters of separate schools what amount of time should be devoted to religious instruction? An Ontario politician has placed himself upon record as favouring the study of blue-books in the public schools, but that study of all studies—that study which fits the soul for eternity, that study which enrolls soldiers of the cross, that study which trains the heart and the mind, and ever holds before us the beauty and the grandeur of following in the footsteps of Him whom we all adore; that study, hon. gentlemen, is barely tolerated. It must not interfere with the regular curriculum, but is given half an hour at the closing time, when the children's faculties are tired from the day's work. Twenty-seven hours of the week are devoted to the things of this world—the things of time—and three hours a week to the things of eternity; and all this in a country where the great mass of the people make boast of their Christianity; all this in a land, which, while it has sent millions to China and Japan and Africa for the conversion of the heathen, will barely tolerate the teaching of Christianity to its own children as part of the daily school work.

While I think it is advisable, under the circumstances, to accept the school clause as a compromise, I cannot, and I regret to say it, compliment the majority upon their sense of fair-play. It has been truly said that in our dealings one with the other there should be a policy of toleration, a policy of give and take; but in the case before us as much as possible has been taken and as little as possible given to the minority.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear. That is the compromise.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I am not in sympathy with the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Belleville, because I believe, were it to receive a majority of the votes of this honourable House, it would in all likelihood result in placing the minority still further at the mercy of a majority which is not friendly disposed. Some who favour this amendment are, it seems to me, gentlemen of very opposite aims. It is a sword which may cut both ways. While some sincerely hope that its effect would be to bring to the minority its full rights in regard to religious education in the schools, others there are, I believe, who anticipate that it would have the effect of destroying altogether the separate school system. Concede to the new provinces the right to legislate in the matter of education, and the future may bring us face to face with a condition akin to that which is now the shame of Manitoba.

It may be advanced that there is no such scheme in the minds of the majority of the people of the Northwest Territories, and that if left to themselves they would deal justly with those who desire the establishment of a separate school system. I wish I could look at the case in this light, but experience teaches me that it is well to have guarantees protecting the rights of the minority. In the years to come we may have a population hostile to religious teaching in any of the schools, and the Catholic minority, as in Manitoba and the United States would be forced to support two sets of schools, the public schools and the separate schools.

Many of my non-Catholic friends advocate the national or public school system, which they believe would result in a greater degree of harmony amongst the entire population. This has been proved over and over again to be but a very attractive theory which has not in practice met the anticipations of its promoters. Catholics will at all times and in all countries make sacrifices for the training of their children in that faith which they hold dear as life and which they wish to transmit to their descendants. If I am asked for proof of this assertion I may point to the states of the American union, where it is computed they pay a sum amounting to $25,000,000 yearly for the support of their parochial schools, and they are also burdened with their share of the tax required to meet the necessities of the public schools. The charge is commonly made that the separate are not equal to the public schools in respect of efficiency. Let me take the separate schools of London as an example, and I firmly believe the same conditions are found elsewhere in the province of Ontario. The best test as to efficiency may be found in the number of children passing the entrance examinations for the high school. It will be found that there is a slightly larger percentage sent from the separate schools than from the public schools. Let me not be understood as casting any reflection upon the secular training imparted in these schools. They do excellent work in the different studies which form the curriculum. But why should there be any objection to teaching religion in the schools when we have here such satisfactory results? And be it remembered that in these Ontario schools, Catholics are given a free hand in the matters of religious teaching. No one ventures to dictate to the school management how little or how much religious instruction may be given.

But even in Ontario, where the rights of the minority are fully guaranteed by the constitution, they do not in practice receive fair play. They do not receive any share of the money derived from the tax on stock companies. Furthermore, if a Catholic sends his child to a public school in cases where the separate school is somewhat distant he must transfer his taxes. On the other hand, if a Protestant sends his child to a separate school for the same reason he cannot, under the law, pay his taxes to the separate school. In other words, a Catholic may support the public school, but a Protestant cannot give his taxes to the separate school.

When the fathers of confederation had finished their noble task—when a splendid whole was created by a combination of the scattered dependencies forming the northern half of the North American continent—it was hoped that all cause of friction on the lines of race and creed prejudices had been for ever allayed and that Canadians would evermore be found united as one family, each vieing with his neighbour in the promotion of a patriotism having the golden ring, but we are confronted with the aftermath of the heartburnings of the old days, and it becomes true patriots to stem the tide which is bearing us on to disaster. Combinations of disturbing elements form a menace to the grand future before us—the building up of creed and racial barriers is an unholy task—the implanting in the minds of one section of our people a distrust of another portion of the community (as causeless as it is criminal) by men whose patriotism comes from the lips only—is a crime to which all Canadians proud of this country should treat as a treason punishable by consigning to obscurity the guilty ones. We have entered upon an area of prosperity. Let us also enter upon an era of good will. We have in the years before us a prospect golden with promise. Let us not mar it by fostering hatred in place of love, distrust where there should be confidence, commotion where should reign peace and concord. There is room for us all and let each do his share to make fair Canada what nature intended it should be, a land of freedom, a land of contentment, a land of happiness, a land of promise for the generations to come.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL — In fairness to the present chief justice of Ontario, I must be permitted to say that while I am not prepared to doubt the veracity of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken nor to contradict the language which he says he heard Mr. Meredith utter, I have had a hand in every contest that has taken place in Ontario, and I deny most emphatically that since confederation there has ever been to my knowledge in any contest in which I have been engaged, the question of the abolition of separate schools in Ontario. I know that that was the case in contests before confederation, because I have had some experience in it, having been defeated myself in refusing to pledge myself to do that which the hon. gentleman says the Conservative party went to the country upon. Mr. Meredith, before he was appointed chief justice, had a controversy with His Grace Archbishop Cleary, and a very bitter one, but they never went so far as has been indicated by my hon. friend. I regret to hear him make that statement, because it is so at variance with my knowledge of the political character of Chief Justice Meredith, and I know so far as the Conservative party is concerned, in any contest which I have entered, and with which I have been connected, that was never a question at issue. It is true that Mr. Meredith, when leader of the Conservative party in Ontario, took a position against the extension of separate schools and declared his adherence to the system which prevailed when the province entered confederation and the maintenance entirely of the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act. But he never went beyond that so far as my knowledge goes.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I should be sorry now to do Sir William Meredith any injustice, but I have a distinct recollection of the discussion in those days in regard to separate schools. Sir W. Meredith placed himself on record as an opponent of separate schools. I will not go so far as to say that he promised to abolish separate schools, because as a good lawyer he knew he could not do it; but he promised to do the best thing he could, just as my hon. friend said—to let the schools go back to the condition they were in at the beginning, when separate schools were first established in Ontario.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL — He could not do that. He was not foolish enough to think so. He knew he had to adhere to the provisions of the Confederation Act.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—When we first had separate schools in the province of Ontario we were saddled with a great many things. We were saddled with the ill-will of our neighbours, who did not want separate schools, and the assessors did us great injustice——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that was cured afterwards by the Act.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Allow me to finish. In many respects we were subject to great annoyances, one of which was that we were compelled to collect our own taxes, and in many other ways we suffered a great deal of injustice. Sir W. Meredith promised to go back to that condition of things if he was elected.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have prepared no speech on the question but I think it is incumbent upon me as a member of this honourable House to express my opinion, in as calm a manner as I am able to do, first on the question as to whether this parliament has a right to deal with the educational clause as is attempted to be done by the Bill now before us; second, as to whether clause 17 of the Bill is within the letter and spirit of the constitution; third, as to whether the Bill with that amended clause is giving the minority its full share of right, or if not in what respect it falls short of doing so; and, fourth, as to whether the Bill as it is—and I refer specially to clause 17 of the Bill—deserves the approbation of this honourable House and of the country at large. However before taking up these questions, I feel a desire to congratulate the last speaker upon the tone and the manner in which he has approached the school question. I desire to extend my congratulations to the hon. member from Richmond (Hon. Mr. Miller) for the noble words and the noble sentiments which were expressed in the first portion of the speech which he delivered a few minutes ago. I cannot fail to remark as I am sure a number of hon. gentlemen in this House have done, that these noble sentiments have been unfortunately marred by the last portion of the speech. I say unfortunately marred not only by the tone, but by the way in which the hon. gentleman has deemed it proper to refer to the leader of the government, to the Prime Minister, being to my mind an invitation, so to speak, to the people of this country to disregard the law, whatever it may be, that parliament may place on the statute-book of the country on this question. The hon. gentleman has stated and given the best reasons why he has been in favour of separate schools. The hon. gentleman has stated that in 1875 he was of opinion that the letter and spirit of the constitution demanded the insertion of clause 11 in the Act of 1875. He went further and stated that he was then of opinion that that statute of 1875 was to be binding for all time to come, but that he had since changed his opinion. I must say that I agree with him that it is the worst of pride in any man not to have the courage to change his opinion when in conscience he is inclined to do so, on any political or other question. But I have not understood the hon. gentleman to give us any reason why he changed his opinion, and I have not understood him to say that clause 93 of the Constitutional Act is not applicable to all the provinces of the Dominion, including any new provinces which may be created. I have rather understood the hon. gentleman as saying that whatever may be the law of the land in the Northwest, the people in these two provinces would rise against and above the law of the land and strike out, so to speak, by a stroke of the pen, whatever law we choose to place upon the statute-book. For my part with all the respect and I may say the admiration which I entertain for the talent of the hon. gentleman who is very far my senior and my superior in this honourable House, I regret that he has deemed it advisable to take a position of that kind. These remarks of the hon. member from Richmond, and especially the remarks which were directed against the acts of the Liberal party or of the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, have suggested to my mind that we might very well compare at this hour the position which the two parties occupy on this question. Let us examine the position of the Conservative party first. It is well known that the Conservative party, represented by its leader, the Hon. Mr. Borden, in the House of Commons, deemed it advisable to first stand on the letter of the constitution, as he stated he was taking his position when the Bill came into committee, to meet the motion for the second reading of the Bill by the following motion :

> That upon the establishment of a province in the Northwest Territories of Canada as proposed by Bill No. 70, the legislature of such province, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867 to 1886, is entitled to and should enjoy the full powers of provincial self-government, including power to exclusively make laws in relation to education.

The hon. gentleman did not at the time consider that it would be safe to rest on the Imperial Acts of 1867 to 1886, but he added in his resolution to make it explicit, and beyond any question 'including power to exclusively make laws in relation to education.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But always subject to the provisions of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Always otherwise subject to the provisions of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not otherwise.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—When he took the precaution, instead of stopping with the words 'full powers of self-government,' of adding these words :

> including power to exclusively make laws in relation to education, it was because he wanted to remove any doubts and therefore to affirm that the new provinces should be vested with the exclusive right of dealing with education. Now what was the next position taken by the hon. leader of the opposition ?

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Has it not been decided and is not even our rule that we are not to speak of what has passed in the other House. That objection was made in the Senate some time ago, and I should be sorry if my hon. friend, whose reasoning I am sure would be very strong, should expose himself to being called to order. I submit he ought not to speak of what is passing in the other House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman I understand does not raise the point of order.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I do raise the point of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) was allowed for over two hours to quote speeches made in the other House, and we have just allowed the hon. member for Richmond (Hon. Mr. Miller) to read his speech in which references of the same kind were made, many of them in not the most appropriate terms; now that it is our turn to speak, the hon. gentleman would deprive us of the right in reply to those remarks to make references to matters in the other House. If the hon. gentleman insists on his point of order, I would say this that in the other House, where they are pretty jealous of their rules, during the present session a member placed on 'Hansard,' the speech made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), and I know that no point of order was raised. I am not aware that it has even been ruled in the House of Commons that references of that kind cannot be made. I am not quoting from speeches, I am speaking of resolutions merely giving the text of resolutions bearing on this question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cited the resolution proposed in the other House. Bourinot lays down the rule that debates in the other House cannot be quoted, but documents of record of the other House may be cited. I declare the point of order not well taken.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I gave the text of the resolution offered by the hon. leader of the opposition in the House of Commons. How was that resolution treated by that body ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does my hon. friend think that this last clause of Mr. Borden's resolution changes the legal import of it in any respect whatever ? Does not the language 'subject to the provisions of the British North America Act' govern the last clause of it as well as all the rest ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have already expressed my opinion in that respect, and have no desire to repeat myself. I said that it was an indication that he felt the necessity of over-riding, so to speak, any doubt which might arise in regard to the imperial Act, by incorporating these words, 'including power to exclusively make laws relating to education.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the adding of these words change the import of the resolution in any degree ? I am asking for the hon. gentleman's opinion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I will have occasion to deal with that question later, and I will not shirk the inquiry of the hon. gentleman ; but for the purpose of saving time, and being consecutive in my remarks, I would rather not deal with the matter at the present moment. I was going to call attention to the fact that on this motion of the hon. leader of the opposition in the House of Commons the Liberal party was united, with the exception of two, and that the Conservative party were disunited. Some fifteen or twenty of their number, amongst whom were leaders like Mr. Monk, Mr. Bergeron, Mr. Pringle and others whom I could name, voted against their leader's motion. Then the next step taken by the Conservative leader was to move the following resolution :

That the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said provinces in so far as the same are applicable under the terms thereof.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was on the third reading ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—On the third reading ; it was proposed in committee also. The hon. leader of the opposition prefaced that motion by expressing his opinion——

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I rise to a point of order. The Speaker has decided that documents may be cited, but that you cannot state what has happened in the other House. I ask if that is not according to the rules and according to authorities on the subject ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would appeal to my hon. friend not to press this point. No doubt both sides have transgressed the rule in this debate, and at this late stage of the debate it would be unfair to press the point against the hon. gentleman when others have set him the example.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I am willing if the Senate is of that opinion ; but I am afraid if this is allowed to go, a precedent will be established and followed for ever.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—When I made my objection I said then, and I must repeat, it is because I know that the hon. gentleman will not merely repeat the opinions of others, but will give us good reasons of his own, and I should be sorry if we were to get into the habit and even claim the right to discuss the conduct of the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition or any other member of the House of Commons. If we follow that course we cannot avoid saying, perhaps unintentionally and in the excitement of the moment, things which will bring us into collision with the House of Commons, and I think it would be better to stop it. The hon member from Marshfield has said that we have already departed from that rule. That is not my fault. For example, the hon. member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) was called to order by the hon member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) after he had been reading extracts and was nearing the end. My hon. friend replied that he had only one more citation and asked to be allowed to read it, and the hon. gentleman from Toronto consented. It was not my business to interfere. But in this case I know the hon. gentleman who is speaking and have the greatest regard for his talent I consider him the ablest man on the other side of these questions, and I think he should keep to the rule more strictly than others. That was the question which I put just now, and which I still put, that the hon. gentleman ought not to violate the rule, and I am sorry that I cannot accede to the request of my hon. friend from Marshfield.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The admonition given by the hon. member is opportune and the manner in which he endeavours to keep to the rules of the House is to be commended. If I wanted to be a little captious I might say, but I will not say it, that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is himself out of order for leaving his seat.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am of opinion that I am in order. I am dealing with the Bill, and I have the right to quote the legal opinion expressed by anybody on the question, whether it be Mr. Borden, in the House of Commons, or Mr. Christopher Robinson, in Toronto. I have a right to show the construction which others place upon that clause, and it is for that purpose that I am referring to the opinion expressed by the Hon. Mr. Borden. I am not quoting his language or any part of his speech. I am merely drawing attention to the fact of common repute that the Hon. Mr. Borden has expressed certain opinions on the question. However, I invite the decision of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER—The point is of too considerable moment to consider at the time, and inasmuch as the House last evening allowed an hon. gentleman to cite the opinions of members of the other House on this question, I will allow the debate to proceed and decide the point at a later sitting.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The position taken by the Conservative party on this second resolution of Mr. Borden's was very much the same as that taken on the first resolution. There was a division in the party and a large number of prominent members of the party refused to follow their leader, and even moved resolutions of their own, going much further than the Bill which is now before us in favour of the minority. In other words they tried to reinstate clause 16 as it was originally in the Bill. The hon. leader of the opposition, in making that second motion, expressed the opinion that if clause 93 of the British North America Act was automatically imported into this Bill, it would not have the effect of securing any rights in favour of the minority, and the position which he took was the position taken last night by the hon. member for Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed), to wit, that the words in subsection 1, of section 93, 'at the union,' would refer not to the day when these two new provinces would enter into the confederation as provinces, but to the day when the Northwest Territories were purchased by the Dominion of Canada, and the territories came under the jurisdiction of this parliament. With that view I cannot agree, and I submit that the answer given very frankly by the hon. member from Calgary last night shows that this view is unfounded. The hon. gentleman admitted, first that subsections 1, 3 and 4, of section 93 are applicable to all the provinces, these new provinces as well as all the others, excepting Ontario and Quebec, which are governed by subsection 2. The hon. member admitted that up to this time, and up to the day when these two provinces shall be admitted as provinces into the confederation, section 93 does not apply to those territories. But nevertheless his reasoning or his conclusion would be that notwithstanding that, the section mentioned would apply, the words 'at the union' referring not to their entry into confederation as provinces, but to their admission merely as territories when purchased by the confederation. That I cannot agree with for this reason, because it is against the text of the constitution, and because also it would be against common reason. What is the text of the constitution? The text of the constitution speaks of union in different parts of the Act. It uses the word 'union' in the preamble:

And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the union of other parts of British North America.

It refers there, I submit, clearly to the admission as provinces. Then in the heading of subsection 3, we find 'union' relates to the compact made between the different provinces. Then we take section 93 and find that the words are used:

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

If it had been intended to cover not only provinces, but territories it would have been necessary to make the last words of the clause read, 'have by law in the province or in the territory at the time of the union.' But there was nothing of the kind. The word 'union' was used throughout the Act in connection, and close connection, with, not the territories, but with the provinces, dealing with the question of the congregation of several provinces together and the admission of other provinces which might take place thereafter. We have the same thing in section 146 where the machinery is provided for the bringing in of new provinces, not only such provinces as Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, but also the bringing in of new provinces which might be created in the Northwest Territories. Therefore, I express for my part the opinion, and it seems to me that it is beyond contradiction, that if we were to apply the Constitutional Act automatically as has been suggested, the words 'at the union' would necessarily refer, not to 1870, but to the first of September next when this Bill becomes law and goes into operation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that is also the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is the opinion of the Minister of Justice and the opinion of the Prime Minister, and I have no doubt the hon. member from Calgary, with the ability and the judicial mind which he possesses to such a high degree, on considering the point further will come to the same conclusion. It being six o'clock, I move that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until this evening at eight o'clock.

Second Sitting.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock.

THIRD READING.

Bill (87) 'An Act to incorporate the International Bridge and Terminal Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 69) an Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta.—Hon. Mr. Beique.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—When the debate was adjourned I was dealing with the contention of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed), that according to his reading of the constitutional Act the words 'At the union,' in clause 93, referred, not to the time when the new provinces shall be created, but to the time when the Northwest Territories were placed under the jurisdiction of this parliament. I draw the attention of hon. members of this House to the consequences to which this would lead. We have on our statute-book the Act of 1875, which was the law dealing with the organization of the Northwest Territories. Section 11 of that law did not give a full measure of autonomy to the Northwest Territories, as far as the educational question was concerned. If the Northwest Territories in the full enjoyment of their provincial autonomy in that respect had established separate schools as we had them in the province of Quebec or as you have them in Ontario, and these schools would have been by virtue of the law, and unanimous consent of the people in operation for 20, 25, 50 or 100 years, according to the contention of my hon. friend, whenever this parliament deemed it advisable to organize the territory into a province, it would not have been in the power of this parliament, in applying section 93 of the imperial Act, to have made provision for the maintenance of that system of separate schools. In that connection the hon. gentleman asks the question as to whether the framers of confederation had in mind the 1st of September, 1905, for the application of the Imperial Act to the new provinces. I might return the question and ask why they would have had in mind the 15th July, 1870, rather than the time when the territory would be created as a province, and would enter the confederation as a province? I have stated that an interpretation of that kind would not be in harmony with the whole of clause 93 of the Imperial Act. What was the system that was inaugurated under clause 93? What had the fathers of confederation, to use the expression, of my hon friends, in mind ? They had in mind that this Dominion was inhabited by two different nationalities, divided into two different religions, Protestant and Catholic, that the rights were to be equal as between Protestants and Catholics, and they had in view the protecting of the one denomination and the other, and as the schools were intimately connected with the two religions, which were the dominating religions in the country- they deemed it advisable to make provision not only for the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but for all the provinces which were to enter confederation in 1867 as well as all provinces which might enter thereafter.

They were so jealous of protecting the rights of those minorities for all time to come that they not only provided by subsection 1 that the rights or privileges existing in regard to denominational schools at the time any provinces would enter the union should be protected for all time to come, and that it would not be in the power of the legislature to enact any law infringing in any way upon such rights or privileges, but they went further, and by subsection 3 of the same section, declared that even in provinces where there were no separate schools at the time of the union or at the creation of the province, if at any time thereafter they should establish a system of separate schools, that system should be maintained for ever and could not be encroached upon by future legislation of the province. Is it not clear that the determination was that this system of protection to minorities, whether Protestants in one province or Catholic in another province, was to be continued by the federal parliament of Canada. The interpretation of my hon. friend would lead us to this consequence, that whereas this system would apply to the four original provinces. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec, and equally to British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, it would not apply to the two provinces which we are now about to create. That because some of the provinces would have been created by carving them out of the Northwest Territories, the general law could not be applied and that in those provinces there would be no protection to the minorities, either the protection afforded by the first subsection or by the third subsection of section 93. It seems to me that one has only to call attention to these consequences and to the clear intention of the framers of confederation, to dispose of my hon. friend's contention. If the interpretation of the hon. gentleman were correct, it would follow that in applying the Imperial Act automatically as he says to the new provinces, the minority would have no guarantee, because the application of the law would go back to the 15th July, 1870, when there were no schools established in the Northwest Territories ; and it is very likely for this reason that the hon. gentleman added that as far as he was concerned he was disposed to give in the new provinces all the privileges to which the minority are entitled under the constitution. On the one hand he has shown generosity——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think I put it that way. I said the minority would be absolutely entitled to whatever rights and privileges they had under the constitution. It is not a matter of giving it to them at all; it is a matter of right.

Hon. Mr .BEIQUE—I do not take exception to that part of the able address of the hon. gentleman. I know it was uttered in a good spirit, that he has no doubt expressed his sincere opinion, and that he would not be one who would grudge protection to the minority in the province in which he happens to live. Under the Bill as framed we have section 17, and the hon. gentleman takes exception to subsection 3 of that clause because he claims that it is an abuse of the power of this parliament in so far as it purports to declare that the rights which are intended to be protected are the rights which exist under chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances at the time the Bill goes into force. On my part I am of opinion that it was not necessary. Section 3 of the Bill provides.

3. The provisions of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1886, shall apply to the province of Alberta in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the provinces heretofore comprised in the Dominion, as if the said province of Alberta had been one of the provinces originally united, except in so far as varied by this Act and except such provisions as are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment may be held to be, specially applicable to or only to affect one or more and not the whole of the said provinces.

For my part I am of opinion that that section would have been sufficient to incorporate section 93 with the construction that I place upon it, but from the mere fact that a doubt has been suggested that another construction might be placed upon the statute, the duty of this parliament is to remove any doubt and to adopt a clear text in that respect, not only for the purpose of removing any doubts if there were any reason for doubt, but for the purpose of preventing this pretended doubt being made use of to continue the agitation which we have witnessed in this country for the last three or four months. If the Bill contained only this third clause, then we would have seen people in Ontario and the west, and possibly in other provinces, continuing the discussion and trying to create an agitation in the new provinces for the purpose of inducing the legislature at its next session or at some future session to attempt to legislate in contravention of the Bill which we have before us. We would have had under this Bill what we have had in the province of Manitoba, case after case carried from court to court until finally disposed of by the Privy Council. Therefore I say that it was incumbent on the government to adopt a clear text in order to prevent such a state of things. And in doing so they follow the example of the Conservative government in 1870, when this parliament was creating the province of Manitoba and doing it avowedly under section 146 of the British North America Act stating that the new province would be created :

On such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed, and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act.

Nothwithstanding the terms of section 146 and nothwithstanding the fact that this Imperial Act of 1870 was passed avowedly in virtue of that section, the fathers of confederation, the Conservative government, with the approval of both sides of the House, enacted section 22 of the Manitoba Act which imported the word 'practice' which was not to be found in section 93 of the British North America Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That motion was not concurred in by both sides of the House. The majority, led by Mr. Mackenzie, voted against it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for correcting me if I should be corrected, but what I mean is that as far as that is concerned no exception was taken by either side of the House as to the power of parliament to enact the section in the words which were adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is, in using not merely 'by law,' as appears in subsection 1 of section 93 of the Imperial Act, but adding to these words the expression 'or practice' in the province at the union. Therefore, I say that this parliament has a very good precedent and has only followed an example to which nobody has taken any exception.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They do take exception now.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—To which nobody took any exception in 1870.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would that law not have been as clear if the government in place of quoting the ordinance of 1901, had stated that the rights that were given to the minority would be according to the law of 1875 ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I will deal with that when I am discussing another point, when comparing the Bill as it now stands with the Bill as it was originally introduced. I believe that I have established that this parliament has the right to legislate upon the matter ; that the Bill which is now before us falls within the province of this parliament. It falls within the powers of this parliament ; and it is in accordance, not only with the letter, but also with the spirit of the constitution.

I do not contend for my part that the Act of 1875 is absolutely binding upon this parliament.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The federal law.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes. The Northwest Territories remain until the new provinces are created, under the jurisdiction of this parliament and it is perfectly clear to my mind that this parliament could now repeal the provisions contained in the Act of 1875 in regard to education as it could have been repealed in any of the past sessions of this parliament. If those provisions were repealed, chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances would unquestionably be the law of the Territories. And the Bill now before us in perpetuating the provisions of the ordinances in regard to separate schools and to religious instruction, has the effect of repealing any provision of the Act of 1875 which may conflict with that part of the ordinances. The hon. member for Calgary referred to the opinion given by Mr. Christopher Robinson. Mr. Robinson in his opinion says :

> The right of the Dominion to impose restriction upon the provinces about to be formed, in dealing with the subject of education and separate schools, is, I think, not beyond question. This would require more consideration than I have yet been able to give, and must ultimately be settled by judicial decision. I am asked, however, whether parliament is constitutionally bound to impose any such restriction or whether it exists otherwise, and I am of opinion in the negative.
> It must be borne in mind that I am concerned only with the question of legal obligation. What the parliament ought to do or should do in the exercise of any power which they may possess, is not within the province of counsel.

Mr. Robinson simply answers the question, as to whether this parliament is legally bound to maintain the provisions of the organic Act of 1875, and to crystallize those provisions into the constitution of the new provinces, and I am perfectly in accord with him, because so long as these territories remain under the jurisdiction of this parliament, this parliament has the power to repeal any law it has passed for the territories. But a point that I would like to make which was made elsewhere and which commends itself to my mind is this; although this parliament would have the right to do it, it would not be in accordance with the spirit of the constitution and it would not be dealing fairly with the minority in the new provinces. It would not be dealing fairly with these provinces, because as I have said, it would not be in accord with the spirit of the constitution, which demands that the rights of the minorities be guaranteed, and it also would not be in accord with the promises which have been made. It is perfectly well known that when this organic law was enacted for the Northwest Territories it was enacted with the avowed intention, as expressed by the men who took part in the debate, that it would be of a permanent character. The compromise, so to speak, was made that it would not be repealed, and that it would stand as a guarantee in the future for all newcomers into the Northwest Territories. I say therefore that when framing the constitution of the new provinces it is incumbent upon this parliament to perpetuate these provisions and keep faith with the minority in the new provinces.

I desire to say a few words on the question as to whether Bill 69 gives to the minority the full share of protection to which the minority is entitled, and this raises the question as to how far clause 16, No. 2, now clause 17, has departed from the original clause 16. The hon. gentleman from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan) in the very able speech which he delivered last night in this chamber, made a comparison between the school laws as they exist in Quebec and in the province of Ontario, and the Bill as it is presented to us. I would draw his attention to the fact that it is hardly fair. The law as it exists in Quebec or the law as it exists in Ontario, but especially in Quebec, is not the measure of right which the majority is bound to give to the minority, it goes far beyond especially in Quebec, what was guaranteed by the constitution. And one has moreover to bear in mind that these laws have been enacted under section 2 of section 93 which are applicable only to the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and that the measure of guarantee which was provided for in subsection 3 of section 93 for the other provinces does not go as far as that. Therefore a comparison should not be made with what the law may be, as it exists to-day, but with the law as it should be under subsection 3 of section 93, which is the section applicable to the new provinces. I desire to correct, I think, the hon. gentleman from Alexandria when he stated that in the province of Ontario the Catholic schools have their own inspectors. If I can read properly the Revised Statutes of Ontario, I should not put that construction on the law in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I know that is a fact. The inspector visits the schools in our town twice a year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (Windsor)—Yes, that is the case.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In the Revised Statutes of Ontario, chapter 65, I find the following:

65. The Minister of Education, all judges, members of the legislature, the heads of the municipal bodies in their respective localities, the inspectors of public schools, and the clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church, shall be visitors of Separate Schools. R.S.O., 1887, c. 227, s. 62.

But I find the following section 66:

66. The Roman Catholic separate schools (with their registers) shall be subject to such inspection as may be directed from time to time by the Minister of Education, and shall be subject also to such regulations as may be imposed from time to time by the Education Department. R.S.O, 1887, c. 227, s. 64.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is exactly what I quoted last night. I drew the distinction that in Quebec they had a board of education, composed, I think, of twelve members, and that they controlled all the schools in that province, while in Ontario there was no provision of that kind, that it was under the Department of Education, and that the Department of Education had the power, under the law, to appoint a Roman Catholic separate school inspector.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I take exception merely to the last statement. I do not question that in practice they may appoint Roman Catholic inspectors, but I contend that under section 66 they are not bound to do so and to-morrow they might refuse; they would be entitled in Ontario to refuse to appoint Roman Catholic inspectors, and they might compel the inspection of all schools, separate and public, by inspectors of the Protestant faith.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—No; they would not do that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman referred last night to the law as it stands in Quebec, but in Quebec it is because the majority of the legislature desires to treat the minority liberally, but they are not bound to give them a board of education of their own faith. In 1868, after the confederation, just the year following confederation, and in face of the imperial Act, what was the statute enacted by the province of Quebec? They provided for the appointment of a Minister of Education. That Minister of Education happened to be Catholic, and might have been Protestant, but he was very naturally Catholic, because the majority were Catholics; and he had the whole control of the schools, separate as well as common schools, and it was only in 1869 that the two boards of education—one Catholic and one Protestant—were organized. It was not by virtue of the imperial Act, it was not because the legislature was compelled to do so, but it was because it was deemed proper under the circumstances to afford that remedy to the Protestant minority. I am very glad that we have that spirit of conciliation in both provinces, and I hope that the example of these provinces will be followed in the new provinces, and that the idea that in these new provinces the people are going to rise against the enforcing of the law which we propose to place on the statute-book will not be realized at all. But with the organic law of 1875 and the old section 16 of this Bill, which was practically a copy of that organic law, or with section 17 as it is now before us, I defy any legal gentleman to determine the division line where the legislature would have to stop in the enactment of regulations with regard to separate as well as public schools. I defy any legal gentleman to prepare a text, a safe text, which would draw the division line, leaving to the state the control to which the state is entitled under the letter and spirit of section 93 of the imperial Act, and giving to separate schools the protection or guarantee to which they are entitled. The only thing which can be done in matters of this kind is to adopt a clause embodying the principle in such general and clear terms as will enable the court to apply the letter and spirit of the law as circumstances may arise. I say that even in Quebec, or in Ontario, I think no legal gentleman would be able to draw the line where the legislature should stop in dealing with educational laws. It may take all kinds of forms, and I know that the constitution protects the control of the state in all matters which pertain to education, except religious education.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Under the imperial Act, in the province of Quebec, in the province of Ontario, and in all the other provinces, the legislature has the power of determining the books which shall be used in the school, but they have not the power, without abusing their authority, of imposing books doing violence to the faith of the minority in separate schools, imposing books in which there would be anything contrary to the teachings of the religious faith of the pupils.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is a denominational school ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—A denominational school is a school where religion is taught but it does not mean a school where only religion is taught, and because it is a denominational school it does not remove the power of the state, the control of the state as far as the selection of the text books and as far as general education is concerned, but it prevents the state from prohibiting the use of proper books for the purpose of teaching the religious faith to which the pupil belongs.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman give to a school which is denominational the right to choose the books ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would not necessarily go as far as that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Say in history ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But we are dealing with the constitutional law, with the legal question, and that is the main question before us, as to what are the rights that are guaranteed under the constitution ; I am dealing with the full rights which are guaranteed under the constitution and I say that in denominational schools, even in the province of Quebec, or in the province of Ontario, the power of the school boards to choose their own books even as far as religion goes, provided the state choose books to which no objection can be taken, is not beyond question or doubt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who would be the judge ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It would be the courts who would have to decide. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Can he suggest anybody else ? Supposing a law is passed in the province of Quebec appointing a minister of education instead of the Catholic and Protestant boards and that he orders the use in both public and separate schools of such and such books. If there is anything in those books which is contrary to the faith of the Catholic or to the faith of the Protestant, then the question will arise as to their right to disobey the regulation and the judge would have to decide; if the minister of education maintains his decision, the matter would have to come before the court and the judge would have to decide according to the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does the hon. gentleman think the law clothes the Minister of Education with the right to choose the school books that are to be used in the schools—the original organic law as the hon. gentleman calls it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, the law authorizes him to choose the books which shall be used in the schools, but he cannot choose books for use in separate schools containing anything contrary to the religious faith or teachings of the pupils. That is my opinion on the Constitutional Act. It is very difficult to draw the line, and this brings me to deal with the Bill before us. I would have preferred the old clause 16 because it was wider in its terms. I do not agree with the hon. leader of the opposition in the Commons when he contended that the organic Act of 1875 did not guarantee separate or denominational schools. I think that the wording of the original clause 16 would have gone further for the protection of the minority, but I must admit that although it may be contended that the law of 1875 remained in force—because the law could not be repealed by any of the ordinances—one must admit that from the fact that these ordinances had been passed not by a legislature in full control of its legislative powers, but by a council which remained all the time under the jurisdiction of this parliament; when the Northwest Council had to submit to this parliament all its ordinances, and when parliament was challenged so to speak to disavow any ordinances infringing upon the organic law, and when parliament from 1892 to this day not only allowed these ordinances to remain on the statute-book but allowed a whole machinery to be put in operation, allowed the system of schools to be organized and carried on under these ordinances, allowed a new state of things to be created, I say that there is a great deal to be said in favour of the contention that it would not be expedient now, for this parliament, to go back to the state of things which existed in 1875. For this reason I say that it was the duty of the parliament, and it is our duty to take into serious consideration the reasons which are offered in that direction, not by parties who are animated by bad motives, but by parties who possessed of a proper spirit of conciliation, claim, not without reason, that this new state of things which has obtained for such a great number of years should be respected and that we should not now go back to 1875.

Turning to clause 17, to my mind it affords two guarantees. First it guarantees separate schools.

> Nothing in any such law shall in any way affect any right or privilege which any persons have at the time of the passing of this Act under the terms of chapters 29-30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories.

There was no complaint made as far as the separate schools were concerned, except—and very properly—that this would not allow full protection to the majority wherever in any school district the majority would be Catholics. I must confess that this is rather a remote danger, where the majority is Catholic they have their own school board. That school board is elected by the ratepayers and it has the right to choose teachers, and in practice I cannot reasonably anticipate that this condition of things will be changed. But the objection was that with people who would be evilly disposed, with a legislature which might desire to reduce to the smallest limit possible the protection accorded to the minority, that they could devise means whereby they would curtail the rights of the majority in the school districts. That I admit is the case. But to my mind the point was satisfactorily covered by the last part of the section, when these words were added: 'Or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.' This last part of the section has the effect of crystallizing into the constitution section 137 of chapter 29 of the ordinances, and that section, to my mind, goes beyond section 41, providing for separate schools. If the minority had been left under section 41 for its protection, inasmuch as that section provided only for separate schools, the matter would have been left to all kinds of doubt. But by crystallizing section 137 into the constitution, I claim that the teaching of the Catholic religion——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In half an hour.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The teaching of the Catholic religion for half an hour, as the hon. gentleman says, is guaranteed in all schools whenever the parents desire that it should be done, in all schools, whether public or Protestant, whether of the majority or of the minority. I claim that it is a most valuable guarantee. The objection is as to the half hour. Would the hon. gentleman who makes the objection be ready to assert that the state is obliged by law to allow religious teaching for an hour or two hours every day? The state has the control of education and in Quebec as well as in Ontario would the hon. gentleman be prepared to say that it would not be open to the legislature to limit the teaching of religion to half an hour each day? Is he under the impression that a court of justice would curtail that right and declare that an Act of that kind would be unconstitutional ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I do not contend that, but I do contend that the court would give separate schools to the Catholics, while this clause does not. It gives half an hour for religious education in the public schools.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We must not play on words; we want separate schools. Under the section in question they can establish separate schools, for what ? For the purpose, as far as Catholics and Protestants are concerned, of giving a teaching in harmony with their respective faith ; therefore, for the purpose of protecting the religion of the minority—whatever it may be.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is not the object of the clause to give separate schools where it says they can establish separate schools? Are they going to have any right to separate schools beyond the half hour?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—They have the choice of the teachers.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I want to know if they have any more than half an hour for religious education?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—They are not entitled to more than half an hour for the purpose of teaching religion, but they are guaranteed that half hour. The point I make is that under the constitution, even in Ontario, you would not be entitled to more than half an hour if the legislature should choose to limit it to that extent, and therefore you cannot take exception to that clause as curtailing the guarantee given to the minority. I admit that it would have been fairer if the agitation had not taken place and if this parliament has considered itself free to deal with the matter in a broader spirit. I think that is what should have taken place, but on the other hand, I must confess, anticipating history as my hon. friend from Stadacona did the other day, that the Prime Minister would not have shown himself worthy of the position he occupies if he had not taken the course he has pursued. If he had resigned on the question he would only have increased the agitation in the country and he would not have protected the very people whose interest he would have been defending. I am ready to admit with the hon. member from Stadacona that it would have been unworthy on the part of the Prime Minister to make a concession for the purpose of retaining in his cabinet the late Minister of the Interior, because then it would have been a question between one of his ministers and the public interest. But I am satisfied that the reason which prompted the Prime Minister and government in adopting another clause was nothing of the kind, and as a matter of fact the Minister of the Interior did not resume his portfolio in the cabinet. What prompted the Prime Minister was the agitation in the country and in which a large number of Liberals and Conservatives well disposed and in good faith had taken part, and it was the duty of parliament to give due consideration to all opinions in that connection and try and adopt a measure which would put an end to the agitation and receive the approval not only of Liberals, but of Liberals and Conservatives alike. I am satisfied these are the considerations which prompted the Prime Minister to adopt the wording of the clause we are discussing.

I cannot close my remarks without expressing my disappointment at seeing in a century when immense progress has been made in the whole field of the human mind, such an agitation as we have been witnessing for the last few months in the Dominion. The hon. gentleman from Calgary took exception to some remarks of my hon. friend from Mille Iles. I cannot agree with him; I think the remarks were appropriate. They were not directed against any Conservative or Liberal who in good faith took as we contend a wrong view of the question. Everybody is master of his own opinions, and so far as they are respectable they should be respected. My hon. friend's remarks were directed against those who from political or other like considerations tried to create strife between races and religions in Canada. I say it is to be regretted by Conservatives as well as by Liberals and that we should all bear in mind that we are two races in this Dominion destined to live together, not one to be absorbed by the other, but to work in complete harmony in building a Canadian nation. I ask hon. gentlemen would it make for the better progress of British institutions and for the welfare of this Dominion if by a stroke of the pen the French element could to-morrow be transformed into an English element ? I say no. The two nationalities have the genius proper to each. The English have the commercial and practical genius. These are dominating qualities in them which I admire. I try to borrow, as far as I am concerned, as much as possible of these qualities. We Canadians of French descent have the characteristics and qualities of our race, and I claim that they are not inferior to that of the English race, and I claim that it is for the welfare of this Dominion that the qualities of the two races be perpetuated and harmonized as much as possible.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I shall, in the first place, refer to the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State when introducing this Bill. He said what I think I have read before, uttered by a prominent gentleman in another place, that the education of children belongs to the parents, that religion is necessary in education, that this Bill would ensure religious education to the children, that the schools in the neighbouring country are neutral schools, that the results of such education have been divorce, lynch law, and many other crimes, which fortunately are not very numerous in this country ; and he added that morality was not on the same footing now as it was forty or fifty years ago. After hearing those sentiments expressed by the hon. Secretary of State, I did not expect that he would introduce a Bill which overthrows all those great sentiments which he seemed at least to wish that we should agree to. This brings me to the question of separate schools and I wish to refer to a question raised by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) that the government had full power to change the educational law. I will only say for the present that I admit the power, but I do not admit the moral right, and there is a great difference between the two. We have seen countries doing such things in the past. It was done in England when Henry VIII. violated every law in separating himself from the Church of Rome; and to-day we find France repealing laws which were designed to promote Christianity.

But I wish to speak first of separate schools. Different systems are to be found in the different provinces. In Nova Scotia, though they had some trouble years ago on the subject of education, we are told by distinguished politicians that at present the Catholics of that province have de facto separate schools. I admire the liberality of that province. Another eminent gentleman from the adjoining province of New Brunswick says the same thing has taken place there. What a difference between those provinces and the provinces in the west. When the question of separate schools was agitated in the old province of Canada, when the hon. Secretary of State, then Mr. Scott, the father of separate schools, brought the matter up, what was the state of feeling in the country? Nobody thought of having neutral schools. There were in those days two parties, the Protestant and the Catholic party. While they differed on some points, they agreed that religion must be taught in the schools. It was so all over Canada. It has been said that the Protestants could not agree with the Catholics, but there is one thing on which they do agree and that is the Ten Commandments. Where do you find morality if you do not accept the Ten Commandments. We have the history of other nations in ancient days, and what was their morality? Look at the lives of even the best philosophers of Greece and Rome. Look at Lacedemonia, where thieving was encouraged; look at Greece, where they had the Eleusinian mysteries. But in old Canada we were all Christians, and all agreed that it was necessary to teach the Ten Commandments. Now, you cannot inculcate the Ten Commandments in the minds of children from six to fourteen years of age by a mere lesson as to their importance. Everything you do must come under the rule of the Ten Commandments. A little boy may tell a lie and the schoolmaster will have to correct him. In doing so, he must tell the child, you are sinning, you are going against the command of God. Does a child use bad words, the same course must be pursued. That is the opinion of Catholics and I think of many Protestants. We want religion taught during the whole day. We do not want to be always praying or studying the catechism or the Bible. but we want the religious education to be continuous. According to the school laws in Manitoba and the Territories, the school hours are from nine to twelve and half-past one to four, five and one half hours altogether. We contend that religion must be taught in the schools during the whole of that time. They say no, we will give you half an hour out of the eleven half hours of the day, and there are some people who say in half an hour you can teach the catechism. I am addressing myself to Catholics. Is it not astonishing to hear Catholics say that that is the proper way to instil religion into the minds of children, and to bring them up. Are we not Catholics and have we not chiefs to direct us—our bishops? What do those bishops tell us to do?

Are we to be led by politicians in such matters. I have seen the effect of it in the United States and I do not understand how a Catholic can have such ideas. I was remarking just now that in old Canada there were but two parties in the country, Catholic and Protestant. There are three parties now. Forty or fifty years ago—and there are several hon. gentlemen here who can remember those times—we did not know what an atheist or agnostic was. There were some who called themselves deists. That is to say, they believed in God, but not in certain other doctrines. But if a man said he was an atheist he was not believed. Now, however, how many proclaim that they are atheists and agnostics? Some have gone so far now that they believe they are descended from monkeys, and so on. This party is not yet the most numerous, but it is active and working in the dark in advocating neutral schools. What does a neutral school mean? It means that you can speak of religion only during half an hour during each school day. They do not forbid the teaching of any other subject. It is only religion which is prohibited during ten of the eleven half hours. In some places, what sort of books are used ? There is a history which is approved of by some hon. gentlemen present, which eulogizes Oliver Cromwell. If Oliver Cromwell is admired, surely it cannot be by gentlemen of the Irish nationality. It was Cromwell who said when he was asked to be more lenient to the Irish, 'let them go to hell, or Connaught.' Yet in the schools of Manitoba there is a history used in which I can show you a eulogium of Cromwell. The fact that Protestants in old Canada were all in favour of religion being taught in the schools is confirmed by a passage I am about to read in Ryerson's 'Story of My Life.' Mr. Ryerson concludes a letter with these emphatic words:

> Be sure that no system of popular education will flourish in a country which does violence to the religious sentiments and feelings of the churches of that country. Be assured that every such system will droop and wither which does not take root in the Christian and patriotic sympathies of the people—which does not command the respect and confidence of the several religious persuasions, both ministers and laity —for these in fact make up the aggregate of the Christianity of the country. The cold calculations of unchristianized selfishness will never sustain a school system. And if you do not embrace Christianity in your school system, you will soon find that Christian persuasions will soon commence establishing schools of their own.

Ryerson, as probably every one knows, was superintendent of education for nearly thirty years. I do not like to name anybody, but I do not like to think that one who has fought so nobly and gloriously for the right of people to give religious education to their children should vote the other way now. This Dominion contains, according to the last census, about 5,000,000 of people. Of this population nearly four-fifths are in Ontario and Quebec, where the separate school system exists, and in the maritime provinces where it exists de facto. That is, separate schools are to be found everywhere throughout the Dominion east of Manitoba and to some extent they exist in Manitoba; therefore for a few hundred thousand who are agitating the country, and will agitate it still, you pass this law. Where is there a country happier than Canada ? Are we not fully satisfied? Apart from some excited minds who are always looking for a chance, we do not quarrel among ourselves. Protestants and Catholics do their best to educate their children, and our education is certainly as good as any to be found in other countries. Our superior education is as good as any in the United States and our common schools are as good as the best they have, and we are improving our system every day. We can continue to improve if we have peace ; but we cannot if we quarrel ; that is the position of the country. I objected this evening to an hon. gentleman speaking of what occurred in the House of Commons and therefore I will not say what comes to my mind, which comes to my lips naturally, and which I have some difficulty in repressing. I shall now endeavour to answer as well as I can my hon. friend from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique). He said in reply to the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed), that we had full power to change the law. I reply we have the power, but I do not think we have the right. If a law passed in 1875 and confirmed in 1886, giving full liberty for separate schools in the North-west Territories, does not apply for the future, there is this to be said—it is the opinion of my hon. friend that it does not apply ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I said it would not be fair to the minority, but it is within the power of this parliament at this day to change the law of 1875.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I admit we have the power to do many things, but it is another question whether we have a moral right to do them. That law will stand, if the opinion of such men as Hon. Messrs. Scott, Blake, Brown and Mills count for anything. According to those gentlemen this law is permanent. If it is permanent, there is no necessity of confirming ordinances which amount to nothing. By the very act of confirmation you show that you do not believe they are legal in themselves. I am not a lawyer but I think I know enough of equity and good sense to know that an inferior legislature could not pass a law changing the legislation of the federal government. The opinion of the gentlemen I have named was of sufficient importance to bring the matter to the attention of the government. In 1891 a statute was passed, intituled 'An Act to amend chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled An Act respecting the Supreme and Exchequer Courts. Section 4 of that Act is as follows :

4. Section thirty-seven of the said Act is hereby repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

37. Important questions of law or fact touching provincial legislation, or the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters vested in the Governor in Council by the British North America Act, 1867, or by any other Act or law or touching the constitutionality of any legislation of the Parliament of Canada, or touching any other matter with reference to which he sees fit to exercise this power, may be referred, by the Governor in Council, to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration; and the Court thereupon shall hear and consider the same.

2. The court shall certify to the Governor in Council, for his information, its opinion on questions so referred, with the reasons therefor, which shall be given in like manner as in the case of a judgment upon an appeal to the said court and any judge who differs from the opinion of the majority shall, in like manner, certify his opinion and his reasons:

3. In case any such question relates to the constitutional validity of any Act which has heretofore been or shall hereafter be passed by the legislature of any province, or of any provision in any such Act, or in case for any reason, the government of any province has any special interest in any such question, the attorney general of any such province, or in the case of the Northwest Territories, the Lieutenant Governor thereof, shall be notified of the hearing, in order that he may be heard if he thinks fit :

4. The court shall have power to direct that any person interested, or, where there is a class of persons interested, any one or more persons as representatives of such class, shall be notified of the hearing upon any reference under this section, and such persons shall be entitled to be heard thereon.

5. The court may, in its discretion request any counsel to argue the case as to any interest which is affected and as to which counsel does not appear, and the reasonable expenses thereby occasioned may be paid by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General out of any moneys appropriated by parliament for expenses of litigation.

6. The opinion of the Court on any such reference although advisory only, shall, for all purposes of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, be treated as a final judgment of the said court between parties.

7. General rules and orders with respect to matters coming within the jurisdiction of the court under this section may be made in the same manner and to the same extent as is provided by this Act, with respect to other matters within its jurisdiction, and, in particular, such rules and orders as to the judges making them seem best for the investigation of questions of fact involved in any reference thereunder.

Now, it is said here the word 'may' is used. In the Senate Debates of 1875 the speaker said :

Words of compulsion are never applied either to the Sovereign or to a sovereign body. Our constitution, like that of England, imputes the intention both to the sovereign and to parliament, to keep faith and to perform all the duties falling within their respective jurisdiction.

Therefore this clause when it says 'may,' implies also a compulsion. Those gentlemen having before them the opinion of such men as I have mentioned, and some others, should have taken the opinion of the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—On what question?

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—To ascertain whether it is constitutional to change the promise made by the Crown in 1875 and 1886, assuring the people of the Northwest Territories that they would always have the right to separate schools. When they first introduced this Bill there was no necessity of asking such a question because it was then the opinion of the government that the promise should be adhered to—that it was according to law. They had to ask the permission of the Governor before imposing certain taxes in aid of education. But the Bill has been changed. When they were changing what had been promised by the Crown, what men of eminent ability like those I have mentioned said could not be changed—the law relating to separate schools—the government ought at least to have sought the opinion of the Supreme Court, but they did not do so. If they had done it they would have told us; they have not told us, therefore they have not done it.

I go further, and I say the minister is obliged to ask the permission of the Sovereign, represented by the Governor General, to impose taxes to give aid to certain institutions. They must have permission from the Governor, because all the public moneys belong to the Sovereign. He is the guardian of the treasury, and we must ask his approval before we can deal with them in any way. Now, if he is the guardian of the treasury, there is another thing he guards with much more care, and that is his own honour. If without having his permission you bring in a measure changing the law of the Territories, guaranteeing separate schools to the minority, there should be some authority for doing so. The government should ask the permission of the Sovereign himself through his representative; and it is because they have not done so that I have great pleasure in seconding the motion of my hon. friend from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell).

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I am as strongly in favour of separate schools as any member of the Senate. I endorse every word that has been uttered by my hon. friend from London (Hon. Mr. Coffey) in favour of separate schools; but at the same time I consider that we are not getting separate schools, and therefore I shall not vote for this Bill. I have studied this question a little during the session, and I wish to ask the hon. Secretary of State now whether this Bill gives anything in addition to what we get from the statutes of the territories now in existence. I wish to know if it contains anything or gives any rights or privileges to the minority in the territories that are not given to them by the statutes of the territories to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It practically enacts the law of the territories. It was all we could obtain—all we could get. It was that or nothing.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—That is the conclusion I have come to. Therefore this government has no right to create the contrary impression in the minds of those who advocate separate schools in this Dominion, particularly those who want separate schools in the new provinces created by this Act. The Catholic minority in the province of Alberta have nothing given to them by this Bill but what they have already, and the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier has no right to claim any credit for giving to those people what they now possess. I think it is not at all fair to the people of this Dominion that that impression is sought to be created among——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not my hon. friend see that if there is no Dominion statute, the new provinces can change the law at once? If we pass the law they cannot. The privileges remain.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I will come to that in a moment, if the hon. gentleman from Halifax will be patient. I consider that it is not at all complimentary to the intelligence of those who favour separate schools in this Dominion to be told that this Bill introduced by the Sir Wilfrid Laurier government is giving them what they already possess. My hon. friend from Halifax says that if this Bill was not introduced and carried by this parliament the rights of the minority in those Territories would be swept away. Our experience of affairs in Manitoba, I think, sweeps the argument of the hon. gentleman from Halifax completely away. The people of the Territories can do what the people of Manitoba have done, and they can do it with much greater justice than the people of Manitoba. The cause of the minority in Manitoba was a just cause, a right cause ; it was a cause that was decided by the highest court in the empire in their favour, and it was ordered that they should have a remedy. They applied to parliament for that remedy, and parliament, led by the right hon. gentleman who is at the head of the government to-day, blocked that remedy and for ever prevented the minorities in the new provinces of this Dominion from applying to parliament for a remedy in regard to school matters. If the people of the province of Alberta should be ungracious enough to repeal the Act which they now have in the statute-book, there would be no remedy, no appeal. If there were an appeal, it would never be listened to. That matter has been for ever killed in this Dominion. I think it would be much better policy if the government had not interfered in this matter at all. It would have created a friendship with the people of the province of Alberta on this question that I am afraid will not exist now, and my experience of parliament for thirty years justifies me in coming to the conclusion that it is better for this Dominion, even if it has the jurisdiction, to abstain from legislating in educational matters for any of the new provinces coming into the Dominion. My experience of the Manitoba school question, my experience of the New Brunswick school question, and my experience in all the agitations on school questions since I came to parliament in 1873, justifies me in that conclusion. I have come to the conclusion that the principle adopted by the leader of the opposition in the other House is the correct one, and that we should abstain altogether from interfering in educational matters in the province. What will be the result in the province of Alberta when it becomes a province of 500,000 or 600,000 inhabitants ? Are they going to be content with the legislation they have on the statute-book now for their schools in that province ? They will not. The laws with regard to education will be constantly advancing in that province, and if this legislation which is proposed to be passed is to be stationary for ever, the consequences will be that the minorities in those provinces will suffer. The new provinces cannot be less just to the minorities than they are now. I am therefore against this Bill, because it does not grant us anything that we have not now under the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, as contained in chapters 29 and 30, mentioned in the Bill. I believe that the jurisdiction in this matter rests entirely with the provinces, and therefore I intend to vote for the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—For five months parliament has been engaged in framing a constitution for two new provinces wishing to become full partners in the confederation. These new provinces are to be carved out of the Territories lying west of Manitoba. Surely this is one of the most important functions of this parliament, and no wonder that the measure now before us has caused here and outside, all through the land, considerable attention and discussion.

Numerous and far-reaching are the problems involved in this proposed action. These new provinces, before very long, will have much to say in the public affairs of the Dominion. Everybody is alive to the rapid settlement of those countries. They will be in the near future, potent factors in politics as well as in the building up of the national wealth. With such a project before our minds our aim must be to give them such a standing in this aggregation of provinces that they be impressed with our wisdom and with our consideration for their present and future wants, so that they may also be desirous of maintaining their partnership with us and their loyalty to the flag which overshadows our destinies.

The prime aspect which confronts us in connection with this measure is the opportunity of creating these new provinces at the present moment. For my part I have no hesitation in saying that their welfare would not have been endangered by postponing this measure for some years. Proper arrangements could have been made by which their present condition could have been improved so as to tide them over without this machinery of provincial life. As a matter of fact, they have at present a political organization which is equivalent to provincial unity. But, at the same time, it cannot be denied that public opinion in the Territories is in favour of this movement. The Territories feel that it is time for them to take their place around the federal board, and have, not only the institutions of a self-governing body, but also the name of provinces in this large Dominion. And under a popular regime such as we have, governments are bound to take notice of public opinion. No fault then, according to my idea, is to be found with the cabinet for bringing in such a measure. This feeling seems to be pretty general. Where differences of opinions come in is when the various provisions of the Bill are under consideration.

I am not concerned with the financial allowances made to each of the new provinces, except in this particular, that it appears to me to be the acknowledgment of the principle that the public lands, although their administration is to remain in the federal authority, still are an asset of the provinces.

Indeed, the financial allowances made to these provinces exceed the allowances made to the other provinces, and the g und upon which these provisions are justified is the fact that which the old provinces are in possession of the public lands, and enjoy thereby a large revenue, the new provinces are deprived of such possession and revenue. It is according to my humble views, a sound policy. In the confederation Act the principle is laid down of the ownership of the public lands by the provinces. If, in certain cases, circumstances were such that this principle could not be carried on to its full extent, we must, however, adhere to the principle and dispose of those lands for the benefit of the provinces where they are situated. It is simply a trust that we must administer in all good faith and in the spirit of the constitution.

This brings me to the question whether the Dominion should in the present case, turn over or not the public lands to the new provinces created by these Bills. In my opinion, the government has taken the proper course in retaining the administration of these lands.

The title of the Dominion in those lands is a combination of two elements. First, of ownership, and second, of a trust. For, if the government of Canada can claim that they have bought these lands, and, consequently are the owners of the same, still they cannot assimilate such an ownership to that of the rancher on his cattle. The government owns for the benefit of the nation or for a section of the people. In this instance, the government owns the lands for the benefit of the provinces where such lands are situated. That is the way that these lands form, as I have stated a moment ago, a trust in the hands of the federal government. On the other hand, it is said with truthfulness that the whole Dominion has contributed to the indemnity that was paid for the acquisition of those Territories, and consequently that trust is so held by the government not only for the provinces, but for the whole Dominion. Then, the primary object which the federal government must have in view in the disposition of those lands must be, no doubt, the advantage of the province, but it is easy to conceive that in many instances the welfare of the whole Dominion may be involved in the administration of that trust. Then again it follows that the central power has a pre-eminent interest in keeping the trust in its original form. Apart from that, it is in the nature of a trust that it be maintained in the form it was originally created until it is determined. True it might be said that the power that creates the trust could have it determined or could alter its conditions. But then it becomes a matter of policy. It seems to me that the policy adopted by Sir John A. Macdonald still holds good. Sir John A. Macdonald justified his policy by the following statement. It will be found in an Order in Council of the 30th May, 1884 :

> The success of the undertakings by the Dominion government in and for the Northwest, depends largely upon the settlement of the lands. Combined with a great expenditure in organizing and maintaining an immigration service abroad and at home, parliament pledged its faith to the world that a large portion of those lands should be set apart for free homesteads to all coming settlers, and another portion to be held in trust for the education of their children. No transfer, could, therefore, be made, without exacting from the province the most ample securities that this pledged policy shall be maintained ; hence in so far as the free lands extend there would be no monetary advantage to the province, whilst a transfer would most assuredly seriously embarrass all the costly immigration operations which the Dominion government is making mainly in behalf of Manitoba and the Territories.

The great attraction which the Canadian government now offers, the impressive fact to the mind of the men contemplating immigration is that a well known and recognized government holds unfettered in its own hand the lands which it offers free, and that that government has its agencies and organizations for directing receiving, transporting and placing the immigrant upon the homestead which he may select. And if the immigration operations of the Dominion, which involve so large a cost, are to have continued success and to be of advantage to Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, your sub-committee deem it to be of the utmost importance that the Dominion government shall retain and control the lands which it has proclaimed free to all comers. Were there other considerations of sufficient force to induce them to recommend their transfer to Manitoba, and as a consequence and by precedent the surrender to the provinces to be created from the Northwest Territory, all the lands within their boundaries, then they would advise that the provinces holding the lands should conduct their own immigration operations at their own expense.

There is a question which I cannot let pass without referring to it; it is the question of how the territories should have been divided and the new provinces mapped out. As to the division and number of provinces, I do not think the present proposition is the best that could be put before us. I think it would have been much better to have removed the present western boundary of Manitoba to a point somewhere near Moosejaw, and then organize the rest, from this point to the Rockies, in one province, thus forming only two provinces, the northern limit of which might have corresponded with the 63rd or 64th degree of latitude north. Manitoba was entitled to that extension of its area. A mere look at the map shows the absurdity, at the present time, of leaving it with its present boundaries, when they are compared with the size of the other provinces. Besides, Manitoba has been the pioneer province of the west; it has opened the way for the creation of other provinces in that far distance; its people have been instrumental in bringing prosperity not only within its limited area, but to the whole western prairies. All this should have inclined the government to satisfy our claims in that respect. And then, as I said, it would have been possible to form only one province with the balance of those territories west of Manitoba as far as the Rockies. The advantage of such an arrangement would have been to reduce considerably the expenses and to simplify the machinery of government. We are too much governed in this country. No doubt, a federal government is the only one possible in Canada, if we want to maintain the unity of British North America. There are in Canada differences of origin, of opinions and of feelings which would not be satisfied otherwise. There must be different provinces. But at the same time we should try, when circumstances and conditions permit it, to lessen that provincialism, so as to leave the people somewhat free from excessive expenses and complicated government machinery. Again, I say, we are too much governed. We have a federal government, we have provincial governments, county councils, local municipal councils, school trustees, and what others; so much so that the people of Canada are continually thrown into spasms on account of elections taking place somewhere. That is not good for the peace and harmony that should prevail amongst us nor for the quietness of mind, necessary to the proper working up of the prosperity and the building up of the nation. And although the subject is not one to be discussed along with the measure that is now before us, I would like to be permitted to respectfully submit to our friends of the maritime provinces whether it should not be better for them and for Canada, to unite and organize their respective territory into one larger province, so as to save a portion of the turmoil of elections, and of expense to themselves and to the central government. Be that as it may, it seems to me the claims of Manitoba should have been satisfied, and those claims having been so satisfied, it would have been to the interest both of the people west of Manitoba and the people of Canada at large to have but one other province east of the Rocky mountains.

Before leaving that subject let me express the hope that if this Bill passes as it is, the government of Canada will at a near date recognize our claims to the territory east and north of Manitoba, up to Hudson bay, and annex that portion of Canada to our province. The other provinces which have been mentioned, Quebec and Ontario can have no claims upon that domain, which almost as a matter of right belongs to Manitoba. It would also be in the interest of all parties concerned if an amicable arrangement could be entered into by the province of Ontario and Manitoba, by which the former would abandon to our province the districts of Lake of the Woods and of Rainy Lake to be compensated by the addition to the Ontario territory of all that part of Keewatin extending northward to Hudson bay and lying east of the Severn river, this last river to form a natural boundary line between the two provinces from its mouth up to a point where it intersects the 92° of longitude, and then the boundary to be a line projected duly south to the American boundary. If hon. gentlemen will be kind enough to consider the matter a little, they will see that these territories belong to the western system rather than to the eastern system. They are only 130 miles from Winnipeg, whilst the distance from Toronto to reach them is 1,200 miles. It seems that they should more naturally fall under the jurisdiction of Manitoba than under the jurisdiction of Ontario. While dealing with that subject of frontier, I suggest to our government the idea of approaching the government of the United States in an amicable and dignified way, for the acquisition, for consideration, of a few acres of land belonging at present to that government, and lying west of the Lake of the Woods. If hon. gentlemen will look at the map, they will see a mere spot, on the west shore of the Lake of the Woods bearing the colours of the United States. This piece of land does not seem to be of much importance to our friends in the south, while it should naturally form part of Canada. Such anomaly in the possession of the territory around Lake of the Woods has already been the cause of some friction and is liable to create at any time uneasiness between the two governments. Hence perhaps the desirability of restoring this piece of land to the country to which it seems more properly to belong, by prudent and proper negotiations with our neighbours. I throw out this suggestion for what it is worth, not wishing to unduly insist upon it.

Now, I come to the question which has caused so much agitation to arise in certain parts of the country. It is a very delicate question to deal with. One is never sure in speaking on such topics that he may not hurt the feelings of others. I will try to keep within the bounds of propriety and moderation while affirming the principles of justice and equal rights. My intention is to give to my remarks on this subject the character of an explanation rather than of a discussion. Much of the feeling exhibited in connection with these matters is generally the result of some misapprehension. It is with the view of clearing up such misunderstandings, in so far as my ability may go, that I venture to address this House on the measure now before us.

In the first place, is the clause 17, formerly 16, within the jurisdiction of parliament? I have no hesitation in saying that it is. The constitution gives this parliament the full power to make laws for the good government of the country when creating new provinces out of the Northwest Territories. Let me here refer to the British North America Act, 1867, as foreshadowing the union of the territories to Canada. For, as it has been said elsewhere during the last five months, we must, every class and every one of us, rest upon the constitution for every safeguard to our liberties. It is not only the solid rock upon which stands our political fabric, but it is moreover the bridge which permits us to meet, whatever may be the distance which separates us in certain matters. Let us adhere firmly to our constitution, and confederation will be maintained and will work smoothly. Clause 146 of the British North America Act, 1867, expresses itself as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council on addresses from the Houses of the parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory, or either of them, into the union, on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act.

Some years afterwards, in 1871, the imperial parliament passed what is known as the British North America Act, 1871. By this Act it was provided, section 2, that:

> The parliament of Canada may, from time to time, establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such province, and for its representation in the said parliament.

Please remark that in this legislation full jurisdiction is given to Canada to create provinces and make provision for the constitution of the province and for passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such province. The words which are to be found in the British North America Act, 1867, viz.: 'Subject to the provisions of this Act' are omitted in the Act, 1871. So that the parliament of Canada is under no restraint or limitation as to its legislative power, with regard to the matters now under our consideration.

If we refer to the correspondence which then passed between the Canadian government and the imperial government we will better understand the whole bearing of and the unlimited power conferred on us by the British North America Act, 1871.

Sir John Macdonald, then Prime Minister of Canada, wrote to Lord Kimberley, then the Secretary of State for the colonies, that he wanted an imperial Act confirming the Act of the Canadian parliament, 33 Victoria, chapter 3. In that letter he said:

> To empower the Dominion parliament from time to time to establish other provinces in the Northwest Territories with such local government, legislature and constitution, as it may think proper, provided that no such local government or legislature should have greater power conferred upon it than the power conferred upon the local government and legislatures by the British North America Act, 1867, and also empowering it to grant such provinces representation in the parliament of the Dominion.

These words, read in connection with the Act of 1871, show clearly the true meaning of this Act of 1871 and makes clear to everybody the extent of the power of this parliament.

It has been argued that the Act of 1886 did limit the legislative power of Canada in connection with the creation of the new provinces. The clause quoted in support of this contention is the last one, which reads as follows:

> This Act and the British North America Act, 1867, and the British North America Act, 1871, shall be construed together.

I contend that this clause and the whole Act of 1886, has no bearing at all on the point we are considering at present. In the first place there is not in this clause nor in any other clause of this Act any provision restricting the power given to parliament by the British North America Act, 1871, which is the governing enactment. In the second place, this clause of the Act of 1886, applies only to the subjects dealt with in that Act. Now, the subject dealt with in this latter Act is merely the representation of the Territories in parliament. So the restrictive provision, if there is any, would only apply to the subject of such representation. The consequence is to leave unimpaired the legislative authority of this parliament in so far as education is concerned as in all other matters. But, admitting for the sake of argument, that there would still be some kind of a doubt, it would be easy to clear that doubt by having the Act creating the new provinces ratified by the imperial parliament, as has been done very often, since 1867.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has the Act of 1886 qualified that Act of 1871?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No it has not, it qualifies the British North America Act of 1867. If it has any bearing on any Act it would bring the British North America Act of 1867 to the reading of the Act of 1871.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I understood it qualified the Act of 1871 and brought it under the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Not to my mind, it is impossible that it should be so. It is the very reverse. By considering the two I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that the Act qualified in this clause is rather the Act of 1867 which it brings into the construction of 1871.

There has been before an interpretation put upon this British North America Act, 1871, by the highest tribunal of the empire. In the famous case of Riel, the Lords of the Privy Council declared as follows:

> That the words of the statute (1871) were apt to authorize the utmost discretion of enactment for the attainment of the object pointed to.

After reading this pronouncement, it seems to me that we should not have any more doubt as to the soundness of the proposition which I have placed before the House.

Having said so much, and having, to my mind, demonstrated beyond a doubt that the parliament of Canada has full jurisdiction in this matter, and can provide in this Bill for the establishment of denominational schools in the future provinces, I would like to add that if it (the Act of 1871) stood alone, I would say that it does not make an obligation to parliament to give such a school system to these new provinces. But there are grounds other than the strictly legal aspect of the matter, grounds upon which one can and must stand if he wishes to come to a right conclusion. Some of these grounds are the vested rights legitimately secured to these people by virtue of various promises and previous legislation. The pledges have been numerous. We have only to recall to our memory different circumstances which are now somewhat forgotten.

In the first place, let us recall that under the Hudson Bay Company regime there were nothing but denominational schools, conducted by the various churches doing missionary work in the far west. On the 1st of May, 1851, the Rev. Cochrane, of the English church, moved, seconded by the Rev. Laflèche, that:

To weaken the mischievous and destructive energy of these violent and untamed qualities of human nature which so frequently manifest themselves in society, in a half civilized state, and to strengthen the feelings of honourable independence, to encourage habits of industry, sobriety and economy, it is moved—that £100 be granted from the public fund to be divided equally between the bishop of Rupert's Land and the bishop of the Northwest (Catholic) to be applied by them, at their discretion, for the purposes of education. Carried unanimously.

A few months after, in the fall of 1851, the Presbyterian church presented to the council of Assiniboia the following petition:

To the Governor and Council of Assiniboia:

The petition of the trustees of the Presbyterian church of Frog Plain humbly showeth:

That, as the improvement of education seems to be more requisite, at least among the Protestants of the settlement, than its mere extension, your petitioners pray that their minister may receive from the public fund a sum proportioned to the fifty pounds, as aforesaid granted to the Church of England, without prejudice, however, to the recognized equality in the premises, between the Protestants as a whole and the Roman Catholics.

And your petitioners shall ever pray.

(Sgd.) A. ROSS,
JOHN FRASER,

and the other trustees of the Presbyterian community, Red River Settlement, 26th November, 1851.

Later on Dr. Bunn moved and Mr. Laflèche seconded this resolution: That fifteen pounds be granted to the Rev. John Black, of Frog Plain, for the purposes of education in accordance with the petition of the committee of his congregation.

Mr. Laflèche gave notice that, at the next meeting, he will move for an additional grant to the bishop of St. Boniface of fifteen pounds for education in soncideration of the additional fifteen pounds now granted for education of the English population.

This last notice of motion was carried into effect on the 9th of December, 1852.

The motion was introduced by Rev. Mr. Laflèche and seconded by Dr. Bunn, and it reads as follows:

That fifteen pounds be granted to the bishop of St. Boniface for the purposes of education.

We have in these money grants to the different churches the recognition of the denominational school system, in so far as any system could then be established and recognized in those territories, and that system has since been looked at by the people as a right vested in them.

The people of the west lived under that rule up to 1870, when the territories became a part of the Dominion of Canada.

I beg the hon. gentlemen in the Senate to bear in mind this condition of things, when I recall what has taken place between all parties connected with the transmission of the authority from the Hudson Bay Company to Canada. It is important not to lose sight of the fact that this recognition by the ruling power of the time, viz.: the Hudson Bay Company, created for every section of the people vested rights about education, in order to understand fully the bearing of subsequent events.

On the transfer of the territories to Canada, trouble arose as every body knows, on acount of the injudicious way in which certain officials of the government had acted. The government of Canada had to take some steps to restore peace and confidence. Negotiations took place, and these negotiations were the occasion of distinct promises on the part of the imperial government itself. Let us recall some of those promises. In the first place I will recall the answer of Lord Granville to whom the government had asked for military assistance. In a despatch sent to the Governor General, 5th of March, 1870, Lord Granville, speaking on behalf of the imperial government said:

The proposed military assistance will be given if reasonable terms are given to the Roman Catholic settlers, and if Canadian government enable Her Majesty's government to proclaim transfer simultaneous with movement of troops.

It is well to refer here to the list of rights, which the delegates of the west had submitted to the Canadian government. Section 7 of the Bill of Rights claimed the granting of denominational schools.

That Bill of Rights was then of public notoriety, the imperial government was aware of it, and this injunction of Lord Granville about reasonable terms to be given to the Roman Catholic settlers indicates clearly he had in view the claims of the Catholics with respect to education. It does so, more especially when we recall the action of the Hudson Bay Company in granting money to denominational schools. What next? Then came the assurances given to His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface by the Governor General of Canada, Sir John Young. By his position, His Grace was in fact representing all the interested parties. He had the confidence of the government and of the resisting element. So any direction or promise given to him may be considered as partaking of the nature of a compact. It was in this spirit that the then Governor General, Sir John Young, afterwards, Lord Lisgar, wrote to Monseigneur Taché on the 16th February, 1870:

> The imperial government has no intention of acting otherwise than in perfect good faith towards the inhabitants of the Northwest. The people may rely that respect and attention will be extended to the different religious persuasions.

Previous to writing this letter the Governor General had issued a proclamation in which there were the following words:

> By Her Majesty's authority, I do therefore assure you that on the union with Canada all your civil and religious rights and privileges will be respected.

By these proclamations and directions, the Canadian government became a party to the imperial promises.

Then here again, we have a clear undertaking by the highest authorities in the land and in the empire to respect the rights of the Catholic population, in whatever number, of whatever colour they might be. And those rights are clearly those referred to in the Bill of Rights and recognized as far back as 1851, by the Hudson Bay Company.

The Crown itself is a party to the compact, and for this parliament to repudiate to-day the pledges of the Crown is almost equivalent to a crime of insubordination against the authority and pledges of the Sovereign.

Apart from that, let me say just here that too often we hear and we see in the general press that even if there was ever a compact in connection with the Territories it was with a few half-breeds and that the white population coming into the country is not to be bound for ever by that compact. That is a doctrine which does not sound well to the ear of a law-abiding people. Any agreement entered into with any class of the population should be adhered to as strictly as any covenants gone into by any two respectable individuals. Any nation, any public body, any government is bound to live up to the agreements entered into by them. And if they do not, public opinion and parliament should force them to retrace their steps and do what is right. In this case the very weakness of those concerned should induce us to treat them honestly and with generosity. Let us not be misled by such attempts at getting over our signature without delivering the goods. The agreement entered into is not only with those first settlers. It was made with the prospective settlers, too. The immigration literature of the governments of Canada, past and present, has represented to the intending settlers that if they were to come to this country they would enjoy freedom of speech, freedom of conscience and also the privileges of denominational schools. In a recent book issued by the government, with the view of making the foreigners aware of the conditions that they will find when coming within our borders, it is said that

> At the union, in 1867, care was taken to safeguard the rights and privileges of denominational and separate schools. (La Puissance du Canada, page 52.)

This sentence is only one which has been repeated year after year since 1867. If the system did not suit them they were aware of it; they could stay at home; they came here with their eyes opened; they became party to the agreement and they are bound to-day by the same. If on the other hand it suited them, it is a breach of promise to-day to deprive them of it. And who are the other parties to that agreement? It is the Canadian government, it is the Canadian nation, it is the Crown itself, as shown by the proclamation and letters of Lord Lisgar, just quoted. Is it not an act unworthy of the honour of Canada that we should by repudiating these pledges, bring now such a disregard upon the nation, upon the government of Canada and upon the Crown. Let us Canadians of this 20th century, let us take a position not inferior to that of our predecessors; let not the pages of the history of our own country at the present time, be defaced by the application of a less dignified and less honourable rule than that which was laid down by the fathers of confederation and their immediate successors. Truly I say by their immediate sucessors, because Mr. Alexander Mackenzie himself, who became premier of Canada in 1873, himself recognized that the policy now advocated by me was a good one. He recognized it both by his legislation and by his words in parliament, as I will show in a moment; but, as my line of argument purports to show that this policy of justice and protection to the minority has been affirmed not only on principle by expressed words of our public men, but also by legislation, let me go back to 1870—I will come after to Mr. Mackenzie's acts and utterances.

In 1870, the parliament of Canada had to frame a constitution for a part of the western territories. It created the province of Manitoba. It provided that the minority would be entitled to denominational schools. The Act creating Manitoba may have been defective in some respect; but there was not at any time, and there is not to-day one soul who doubts for a moment that the deliberate intention of the framers of that Act was to assure to the minority on whatever side it might eventually be, the enjoyment of denominational schools. And that enactment was then an affirmation of the policy contemplated by the fathers of confederation, a construction of the British North America Act, 1867, in its proper spirit, and the sanction of legitimate principles that were to guide the nation with regard to such matters. Then the Act received the imperial stamp, thus again and more deeply, if possible, giving the true and the inward interpretation of the compact entered into as well as the very best indication that freedom of conscience was to be the rule in Canada.

The same lesson is to be drawn from the Act of 1875, passed under the Mackenzie regime. Then there was as there is to-day some divergence of opinions on the floor of this House and in the country, although it seems that none existed in the House of Commons. But the sober judgment of our leading men in both parties carried the day. The spirit of our political fabric prevailed. The policy of protection for the views of the minority was upheld, and the result was that clause 11 was introduced in the Act constituting the government of the Northwest Territories (1875). And as to that clause being the result of such a policy let me quote a few sentences uttered then by the leaders of both parties.

In the first place, I wish to recall the speech of Mr. Blake, who introduced the subject in the House. That quotation will show light on the subsequent action and words of Mr. Mackenzie. Mr. Blake said:

> To found primary institutions under which we hope to see hundreds of thousands, and the more sanguine of us think, millions of men and families settled and flourishing, was one of the noblest undertakings that could be entered upon by any legislative body, and it was no small indication of the power and true position of this Dominion that parliament should be engaged to-day in that important task.

These are solemn words, deeply considered sentences, in which nobody could fail to discover that Mr. Blake then meant that the measure of liberty and protection they were about to give to the people of the Northwest Territories was to be of a permanent character and would apply not only to the then actual population, but to all comers, and to the very largest population that could be dreamed of. And Mr. Blake, in speaking in that way wanted to warn that future population. Because he says again:

> He believed that it was essential to our obtaining a large immigration to the Northwest that we should tell the people beforehand what those rights were to be in the country in which we invited them to settle.
> He regarded as essential under the circumstances of the country, and in view of the deliberation during the last few days that a general principle should be laid down in the Bill with respect to public instruction. He did believe that we ought not to introduce into that territory the heartburnings and difficulties with which certain other portions of the Dominion and other countries had been afflicted. It seemed to him, having regard to the fact that, as far as we could expect at present, the general character of that population would be somewhat analogous to the population of Ontario, that there should be some provision in the constitution by which they should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those possessed by the people of the province of Ontario. The principles of local self-government and the settling (mark, the settling) of the question of public instruction seemed to him ought to be the cardinal principles of the measure.

In the light of these suggestions of Mr. Blake to the government, let us see now what Mr. Mackenzie, the then Prime Minister of Canada, said. Mr. Mackenzie said that he would provide a clause by which,

The Lieutenant Governor, by and with the consent of his council or assembly, as the case might be, should pass all necessary ordinances in respect of education, but it would be specially provided that the majority of the ratepayers might establish such schools and impose such necessary assessment as they might think fit; and that the minority of the ratepayers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, might establish separate schools; and such ratepayers would be liable only to such educational assessments as they might impose upon themselves. This, he hoped, would meet the objection offered by the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake).

This again was a declaration of policy and a compact. This conclusion is all the more strongly forced upon us by some of the utterances of other leading members of the House then.

Mr. Smith, now Lord Strathcona, and then member for Selkirk, said that he was glad to find that the First Minister intended to introduce a provision in committee dealing with the subject.

Hon. Mr. Mills, a respected member of the Liberal party said at the time:

There was another matter, it seemed to him, ought not to be disregarded; and that was the terms and conditions under which these people would ultimately be formed into a province. It would be better that the people who settle that territory should know beforehand the terms and conditions under which they would be an organized part of the Dominion.

The policy suggested by those utterances was adopted and the Bill passed in the Commons. Then it came to the Senate. Here again that policy was regarded as most appropriate. Many honourable gentlemen addressed the House. Amongst others there were Hon. Mr. Miller, Hon. Mr. Scott and Hon. Sir Alexander Campbell, then the leader of the opposition. On an amendment proposed by Hon. Mr. Aikins to the effect of rejecting the clause introduced by Mr. Mackenzie in the Commons, Sir Alexander Campbell said:

It would be much to be regretted if the amendment passed. The object of the Bill was to establish and perpetuate in the Northwest Territories the same system as prevailed in Ontario and Quebec, and which had worked so well in the interest of peace and harmony with the different populations of those provinces. He thought the fairer course, and the better one, for all races and creeds, was to adopt the suggestion of the government, and enable the people to establish separate schools in that territory and thus prevent the introduction of evils from which Ontario and Quebec had suffered, but had judiciously rid themselves.

Mr. Brown himself who had been all his life an opponent of separate schools on principle, agreed to the remarks made by his colleagues on that occasion. He said:

He concurred with what had fallen from his hon. friends on the treasury benches, and from hon. gentleman who had spoken on the amendment with respect to the propriety of allowing separate schools.

The Hon. Mr. Scott, who was then, I believe, as he is to-day, Secretary of State, gave, in the following words, the true doctrine on this matter. He said:

He was one of those who maintained that parents had a right to educate their children as they pleased, and that they ought not to be taxed to maintain schools to which they could not conscientiously send their children. Our whole system of government was based upon that sound principle, and how long could we have happiness and peace in this country if we were to abolish that safeguard, which was now recognized in both the large provinces.

Hon. Mr. Miller has said to-night that he has changed his views on this matter in so far as the constitutional power of this parliament goes, but nevertheless, let me quote his words as repeated by him to-night. It will go a long way to show that at the time the law of 1875 was passed, it was the general consensus of opinion that such law was settling the question for all time to come.

Parliament, said the hon. gentleman, had an undoubted right, under the circumstances, to make such provisions regarding the question of education, or any other question, for this new territory, as in its wisdom it thought best for the future peace and well-being of the country.. .. .. He thought they should take a lesson from their past experience, and deal with the subject in a fair and liberal spirit. All the Bill asked was that all parties in that new country should have such schools as they chose to establish at their own expense, and that minorities would at all times be safe against the tyranny or intolerance of majorities. That would not be interfering with the just rights of any body or clan but, on the contrary, it would be guaranteeing the rights of all classes. It would simply be providing, while they had the power to do so, for freedom of conscience with regard to the vexed question of education.

And again in 1876, the hon. gentleman said with regard to the law of 1875 :

He (Mr. Miller) thanked the government again for their determination to adhere to the law of last session, which secured freedom of education for ever to the Territories of the Northwest. When the Act will have been proclaimed, which he supposed would shortly be done, it can never be repealed, and the privileges it guarantees will then become the birthright of the generations that are to people that great and promising country, so long at least as British institutions and British justice shall prevail there.

Before making further remarks let me point out to you some of the sentiments which seem to prevail in the above quotations. The right of this parliament to legislate upon this matter as they please, the rights of the parents to educate their children according to their views, freedom of conscience in this country are affirmed; necessity of peace and harmony between ourselves, and as the best means to reach that noble goal, the guarantee to the minorities against possible intolerance in matter of education are advocated; the right for the minorities to establish denominational schools is pointed out as the best legislation that can secure to our country quietness all over the land and one which is in complete accord with the recognized principles upon which confederation rests; the propriety of framing laws which will be a warning for the intended immigrants as to the conditions under which they will have to settle and with which they have to conform their own views and their life is also insisted upon. More than that, it was affirmed that the action of this parliament in passing clause 11 of the Act of 1875 had the effect of creating permanent rights for the minorities. This was affirmed by the Hon. George Brown, who said at the time:

The moment this Act is passed, and the Northwest became part of the union, they came under the union Act and under the provisions with regard to Separate Schools.

Hon. Sir Alexander Campbell said :

The object of the Bill was to establish and perpetuate (mark, perpetuate) in the Northwest Territories the same system as prevailed in Ontario and Quebec.

And when Mr. Blake and Mr. Mills said that 'We should tell the people beforehand what those rights were to be, the situation in which we invited them to settle,' or that 'it would be better that the people who settle that territory should know beforehand the terms and conditions under which they would become an organized part of the Dominion,' they evidently contemplated the actual creation of permanent rights, of permanent terms and conditions for the Northwest; and parliament having sanctioned the law under these circumstances, it has endorsed those views and have de facto created such a condition of things as we should not disturb now. I have referred to all these facts and expressions of opinions because they constitute in my view a long and strong chain of national traditions which should impress every one who is called to participate in the political affairs of our country. Every nation that has evolved within its national traditions has been successful, but any nation that was imprudent enough to disregard those same traditions and to disturb the foundation stone of its political regime, has seen its national life marred by hurtful explosions. Let us profit by the lessons of other nations. We are on the path of progress and consolidation. Let us not throw across the road any stumbling blocks such as would be division amongst ourselves, oppression of the minorities by the majority, suppression of freedom of conscience in questions where conscience obtains. Now, I wish this House would listen to another argument arising out of past legislation, I mean the legislation adopted by the territories themselves. We are told we should have full confidence in the people of the Northwest. But, when we recall the way in which the Catholic minority in Manitoba has been treated, when we recall the fact that in the territories themselves the Catholic minority has been deprived by the ordinances of 1891 and 1892 of the advantages secured to them by clause 11 of the Act of 1875, is it a wonder that we should exhibit some hesitation ?

After the territories had been given a political organization by Act of this parliament, they passed ordinances, or laws, establishing a system of denominational schools, by which the two great sections of our country—the Catholics and the Protestants —could establish schools of their own. They provided by those ordinances the machinery by which each section could control their respective schools. Now, I say that such local legislation, both in Manitoba and the Territories placed the Territories within the rule of subsection 1 and 3 of clause 93, of the British North America Act, which decreed that:—

Subsection 1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

Subsection 3. Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority.

This language is tantamount to saying that the provisions made in matters of education, when once passed by the province, shall not be altered nor repealed. They are to be the permanent law of the province.

Now, I contend that the fact of the Dominion parliament having given to the territories a political organization of their own in 1875, has placed those territories in the position of a province. For all the purposes of the Bill now before us, the words territories and province are synonymous. The rights belonging to the one political organization belong to the other as a matter of course. There is no substantial difference between the annexation to confederation of a province and the annexation of these territories. The word province in subsections 1 and 3 of clause 93 aforesaid of the Confederation Act, stands to mean any portion of the territory duly organized and having a distinct entity from any other part of confederation. As a matter of fact those territories have had for many years past their political autonomy. They have had their own legislative authority, they have had their provincial political assembly, they have had the management of their affairs, their government, their judiciary, their lieutenant-governor, their representatives, both in the Senate and in the House of Commons. What we are doing now is simply to determine their boundaries in a different way and to give them some extended powers and the name of provinces after having given them long ago provincial powers.

This action of ours now is not a question of substance, but simply a question of degree and of delimitation. We merely say to them: 'instead of being one political entity you will henceforth constitute two political entities, and instead of having the right to legislate on such and such a matter, you will have the right to legislate on such and such other matters. We are supplementing their legislative jurisdiction. They are already sovereign on certain matters within their boundaries, (subject only to the veto of the Governor General in Council, as in the case of any other province) we extend those powers to some other subjects.

True it may be objected that the fact that the federal power is still able to interfere with their political status, is an evidence of their subordinate condition. It is true that their condition is a subordinate one. But subordinate as it may be, they are just the same a political entity. It is indifferent whether they hold that political entity under the name of province or territories. The moment they enjoy the privilege of administering their affairs to any extent then they come under the operation of subsections 1 and 3 of the clause 93 of the British North America Act. Because there is, as it were, a contract entered into between the different powers that be and the people, to abide by certain enactments and by certain ideals, without which a certain part of the people would not have gone into those Territories, without which that part of the people would not have abandoned their native land for their new land, nor their comparatively easy life for the trials and the hardships of the settler's life.

In the year 1891, an Act was passed amending the Supreme Court Act, so as to give to the Governor in Council power to submit certain questions of law or facts to that court. In that Act, subsection 3 of section 4, assimilates the territories to the provinces in providing that in any such case the government shall notify the attorney general of the province interested, or, says the statute: 'in the case of the Northwest Territories, the Lieutenant Governor shall be notified of the hearing,' in order that he may be heard if he thinks fit.

This statute manifestly here makes the Northwest Territories rank as a province and recognizes to such territories the same rights as to the provinces generally. As a matter of fact they are considered as a province.

This assimilation of the territories to a province made by me as above, is warranted by the parliament of Canada itself. Indeed, if I turn to the interpretation Act, as found in the Revised Statutes, 1886, there I read (subsection 13 of sec. 7) :—'The expression 'province' includes the Northwest Territories and the District of Keewatin.'

Thus by common sense, in equity and in accord with the enactments of our parliament, we have to admit that the territories stand now, although bearing a different appellation, on the same footing as the provinces in our political fabric. And being so, we must treat them under the present circumstances as we would be bound to treat any other province having distinctly that status. In the latter case parliament would be bound to recognize and to maintain the rights conferred by clause 11 of the Act of 1875. Now let us do the right thing and maintain in the Act now before us those rights for these new provinces. It is due to them, and it is due to us, inasmuch as it was, when the Act of 1875 was passed, the clear meaning of the parliament of Canada as shown by the above quotations, which I will now repeat and supplement.

Mr. Brown, on the 8th of April, 1875, said in the Senate :

> The moment this Act passed and the Northwest became part of the Union, they came under the Union Act, and under the provisions with regard to separate schools.

By these words, Hon. Mr. Brown expressed the opinion that the provision of the Act of 1875 was placing the Territories in the position of a province and, to use the very words of the Right Hon. Prime Minister : 'If the principle of separate schools was introduced, then according to the terms of the constitution, it was introduced for all time to come.' And so must also be construed the words of Mr. Blake, when he said, discussing the same Act of 1875 :

> They should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those possessed by the people of the province of Ontario. The principles of local self-government and the settling of the question of public instruction it seemed to him ought to be the cardinal principles of the measure.

In the Senate Sir Alexander Campbell put the same meaning on that clause, when he said :

> The object of the Bill was to establish and perpetuate the same system as prevailed in Ontario and Quebec.

Let me add the words of the Hon. Mr. Penny, who though not an admirer of the separate schools, expressly declared that we—— > Might as well settle the matter at once by allowing the creation of separate schools.

Now, let us see what public opinion understood and said. The 'Mail,' on the 19th April, 1875, said :

> By their Northwest Territories Bill the present government provide that separate schools may be established in those territories. The proposal we regard as eminently wise. . . Every one may see how fortunate a thing it would have been if the school question had been put on a stable basis in New Brunswick, and if by the Northwest Act, the government should have prevented future burnings on educational matters in the great new country which belongs to us in the far west, they will have done a good work indeed. We cordially endorse their action in this matter.

Montreal 'Gazette,' 17th March, 1875 :

> The Bill seeks to fix the constitution which is to govern these vast territories in the future.

And whilst approving of this principle, the 'Gazette' suggests that ample time should be given to that Bill in view of its importance. It says, however :

> Looking to the encouragement of immigration into the Northwest there can be little doubt of the importance of having the character of the institutions under which, in the future, these immigrants will have to live, settled in advance.
> With the form of government settled in advance, and with the machinery provided for its coming into practical operation without further legislation, and by the force simply of advancing settlement any immigrant settling in the country will do so with the full knowledge of the institutions under which he is to live and will assume therefore, a voluntary allegiance to those institutions. . .

From these remarks it will appear that the 'Gazette' is taking the view that the enactment of 1875 fixes the future condition of existence of the territories. And these remarks are applying to the school system as well as to the other portions of the Bill. This is made evident by the following lines :

> In the Bill, as prepared, the government had omitted all reference to the important subject of education and all provision for the avoidance of those difficulties which at this moment are doing so much harm in New Brunswick. True, after it was printed Mr. Mackenzie discovered the omission and submitted a manuscript clause to cover it.

So, according to what has been said, there were certain rights, certain conditions of things established then, in 1875, and those things and conditions were to be for ever, they were to be perpetuated, according to Sir Alexander Campbell. They knew then what those conditions were. It was the system of denominational schools as understood in Quebec and Ontario. That seems to have been forgotten and also to have become more complicated than it was then, on account of certain legislation of the territories themselves.

Let us ascertain the constitutional condition of things existing there at the present time in matters of education. If the Catholic population have vested rights no amount of reasoning should be able to deprive them of those rights. The parliament of Canada ought to be the first to respect such a compact and apply in their proper spirit the principles laid down in subsections 1 and 3 of clause 93 of the British North America Act 1867.

That condition of things is the one which was duly established by the Act of 1875, and by the legitimate ordinances passed under that Act by the legislative assembly of the Northwest. It cannot be denied that by clause 11 of the Act of 1875, the intention was to give to the denominations coming under the designation of Protestants and Catholics,—the privilege of establishing such schools as are regarded by them as affording full protection to their respective views, viz: denominational schools. As a matter of fact, that intention was carried out by subsequent ordinances, notably by the ordinances from 1884 to 1888. Those ordinances were intra vires of the legislative assembly and created a denominational school system which is still, legally and constitutionally, the very condition of things in the Northwest. I say it is still the legal actual condition of things, because all ordinances passed since are ultra vires, consequently they are null, void and as such, non-existent. These latest ordinances are void because they were passed against the letter and spirit of clause 11 of the Act of 1875. By the ordinances of 1891 and 1892, they abolish the denominational schools previously established. The legislative assembly of the Northwest could not do that. Subsections 1 and 3 of the 93rd clause of the British North America Act, 1867, prohibited such action.

Mr. Haultain himself was very far from being sure of the correctness of his legislation, because, according to the present Lieutenant Governor of the Northwest, he was reported by the Regina 'Leader' as having said that:

> There were some points in the Bill he could not agree to and which he would mention. He could not agree to the clause making uniform text books compulsory. It was contrary to the constitution.

Judge Rouleau wrote at the time to His Grace Archbishop Taché that the ordinance was unconstitutional and that separate schools were no more in existence although they were still designated under that name. According again to the present Lieutenant Governor of the Northwest, the Hon. Mr. Forget, the ordinance had for its object the 'abolishing of every feature which characterizes the Catholic schools.' 'Nothing essential no more distinguishes the Catholic schools from the Protestant schools, except the now ironical designation of 'separate schools.' Now, chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of 1901 are but a revised edition of the ordinances of 1891 and 1892 which took away the characteristics of the Catholic schools, and now it is proposed to make that legislation the limit of the guarantee which the minority is to rely on in the future, and also the limit of the control that the same minority will ever have on the education of their children. I do not believe, hon. gentlemen, it is the way we should deal with the people of the Northwest.

The actual rights of the minority now are those guaranteed by the Act of 1875, and by the ordinances passed by the legislative assembly of the Northwest from 1884 to 1888 in the exercise of its legal and legitimate jurisdiction. The subsequent ordinances limiting those rights were not within the jurisdiction of legislative assembly, and consequently must not govern the situation. The de facto situation is not the legal situation nor is it satisfactory to the section of the people whose cause we are now advocating. The legal situation would be satisfactory and this parliament ought not to hesitate to ratify the same by the new charters. Does the present Bill give the minorities the school system which they are entitled to ? It may give it in name, it does not give it in fact. It is the greatest political bantering that ever was perpetrated. We hear some supporters of the Bill stating in emphatic terms the necessity of granting to the minorities satisfactory conditions. and they lead the people to believe that this Bill has this effect, while, as a matter of fact, it does nothing of the kind.

It is claimed, as an objection to the establishment of a true system of denominational schools, that if we were to enact here a charter imposing that system we would put the new provinces in a subordinate position. Who would dare to rise on the floor of this House and say that Ontario and Quebec are subordinate provinces ? Yet, they have the system of denominational schools ? Both are satisfied, both are keeping the pledges they made to the minorities when they went into confederation. Surely the west could be satisfied if placed in the same situation as those great provinces, which may be called the parent states in our federal aggregation.

Now, if parliament has full jurisdiction, the question presents itself to our consideration : Is it a good policy to confer upon minorities certain guarantees which should satisfy them in matters of education, and further than that, are we not bound to confer such guarantees ? It was considered a good policy to legislate in that way when confederation was framed. And it was considered to be a good policy not only for the time being, not only for certain provinces, but for the future and for all the provinces for which the parliament of Canada would then be in a position to frame a constitution. The intention of that policy is to be found in many of the speeches made by our statesmen at the time of the introduction in the old Canadian parliament of the Quebec resolutions.

Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, then Premier of United Canada, said on the 3rd of February, 1865, when explaining the reasons for which confederation had been brought in before parliament :

> The reasons were two-fold. They related first to the intrinsic merits of the scheme itself, divested of all other considerations, and next, to the settlement of domestic difficulties which, for some years, had distracted the country, and the means we might and ought to employ to restore good feeling, harmony and concord therein.

That is the language of a French-speaking Canadian. Let us have now the views of an English-speaking Canadian, and one whose position was such that nobody can suspect for one moment his earnestness. I refer to the Hon. Geo. Brown, who expressed the same idea almost in the same terms. Speaking of the value of the confederation scheme he said :

> The existing evils it will remedy.

What were those domestic difficulties spoken of by Sir E. P. Taché, and what were those evils referred to by Mr. Geo. Brown ? Exactly the same difficulties and evils we are now endeavouring to conjure, and these men, and all others who were favourable to the scheme, were of opinion that it was worth sacrificing long standing and strong personal views in order to secure the passage of the Bill providing for federal union. So Mr. Geo. Brown said expressly :

> Now, I need hardly remind the House, said Mr. Brown, that I have always opposed the system of sectarian education. . . . . But assuredly, I, for one, have not the slightest hesitation in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union.

These are samples of the sacrifices some of our Canadian public men had to and did make of their opinions for the high purpose of putting an end to the unhappy condition of things then existing. Is it to be believed that in the minds of those public men the remedy was only to be temporary ? Is it to be believed that in their inner heart there was a secret wish for the revival, at any future time and in any other place in confederation of such difficulties ? I would not like to do such an injury to their memory. As a matter of fact, Mr. George Brown foresaw the time when the Northwest Territories would be a part of confederation, and spoke of the maintenance in these lands of 'liberty and justice and Christianity.'

These facts and these utterances show in what spirit the confederation was conceived. It shows also what was in the minds of the fathers of our present constitution, the only policy that should be pursued with regard to the questions which are again agitating public opinion. Let me add to the above the following words of Sir A. T. Galt, he who took such a hand in securing to his co-religionists in Quebec the guarantee which they have ever since confederation enjoyed untrammelled. Here is what Sir A. T. Galt said :

It must be clear that a measure would not be favourably entertained by the minority in Lower Canada which would place the education of the children and the provision for their schools wholly in the hands of a majority of a different faith.

These words of Sir A. T. Galt had reference to the minority in Quebec and in Ontario. But he adds almost immediately those significant words : 'The same privileges belong to the one of right here as belonged to the other of right elsewhere,' thus covering all provinces.

These words and the occasion on which they were uttered leave no doubt in the mind that Sir A. T. Galt meant that the situation which was to be created for the minority in Quebec should be the rule all over Canada. And he gives his reason for advocating such views :

'There could be no greater injustice to a population than to compel them to have their children educated in a manner contrary to their own religious belief.

Such is the spirit which animated the fathers of confederation, and such is also the spirit underlying our constitution—a spirit of generosity and of liberty, which is but the expression of the freedom that every class within the empire is entitled to.

We have fortunately amongst us one of the delegates at Charlottetown and Quebec, in the person of the Hon. Mr. Macdonald, from Prince Edward Island. I hope he will add his testimony to those which I have quoted above.

Let us now take the Bill itself. The original clause 16, though not perfect and not placing beyond all doubts the rights of the minorities, yet was acceptable. I would have voted in favour of the Bill if that original clause had not been removed. The present clause 17 has been substituted for the other. It is very unfortunate. That clause 17 in the Bill as now presented to us does not give to the minorities any thing like what they are entitled to. The contention that it gives separate or denominational schools is not accurate. It gives separate schools in name, but not in fact. It gives a separate school-house which is only a material feature, but it does not give the genuine article, the teaching institution which has been known all over the land and for a long time as constituting a distinctive school controlled by the parents whose children attend the same. The half hour of religious instruction or exercises at the fag end of the school hours, or rather after the school hours, do not constitute the Catholic school. According to our views the atmosphere of the school during the whole day must be Catholic. The teaching must be permeated, as it were, with Catholic views and sentiments. The text-books must not be only inoffensive, but Catholic in form and in spirit. These are the views held everywhere by the Catholics and at all times. In doing that they are right not only in their own estimation, but in the estimation of others. The Duke of Argyle, the father of the present Duke, while speaking on Australian schools expressed himself in the following way in the House of Lords:

The Catholics had the high honour of standing alone and refusing to pull down in their schools the everlasting standard of conscience. This resistance on the part of the Roman Catholics, I believe, may be the germ of a strong reaction against the pure secularism ; against what I venture to call the pure paganism of the education of the colony.

As to its possibility or advisability in this country let us see what Mr. Alexander Mackenzie once said :

For many years after I held a seat in the parliament of Canada, I waged war against the principle of separate schools. I hoped to be able —young and inexperienced in politics as I then was—to establish a system to which all would ultimately yield their assent. Sir, it was found to be impracticable in operation and impossible in political contingencies.

There is nothing in the school system allowed by this Bill which may commend it to our views and place it within the description of such schools as were contemplated by the fathers of confederation and by the Act of 1875. We have only to refer to various expressions of opinions stated elsewhere to be convinced that my proposition cannot be controverted. We have amongst others the right hon. Prime Minister himself, who said in a letter addressed to one of his friends :

The impression prevails that separate schools such as they are intended by the Bill will be ecclesiastical schools. This is quite an error. What you call separate schools in this instance is practically national schools. Here is the law of the Northwest Territories at the present moment: All the teachers have to pass an examination and be certified by the Board of Public Instruction; all the schools have to be examined by inspectors appointed by the Board of Public Instruction; all books in use at the schools have to be approved by the Board of Public Instruction; all secular matters are under the control of the Board of Public Instruction, all tuition has to be given in the English language; at 3.30 children can be given religious instruction according to rules made by the trustees of the schools, but attendance at this is not even compulsory.

Do you find fault with this last clause? Do you not believe that what you call 'separate schools' in this instance is really 'national schools'?

The great objection to separate schools is that it would divide our people, but if the same education is given in what is called 'separate schools,' as in all other schools, I fail to see what objection there is to such a system.

Then, Mr. Sifton said, speaking in the House of Commons on the same subject:

In the year 1892, what was known as the dual system was entirely swept away and that system which we have in the Northwest Territories, substantially as we have it at present, was established. . . . Where there is a public school, the minority, Protestant or Roman Catholic, may organize a separate school; but every separate school is subject absolutely to all the foregoing provisions, and is in every sense of the term a public school.

Hon. Mr. Paterson, the Minister of Inland Revenue, is reported as having spoken in the same strain. He said:

It must be borne in mind that those separate schools are formed precisely as every school district is formed. Although the name separate school appears to convey to the minds of some people the impression that they are separate in the sense in which they are established in some other province, there is no distinction between these schools and the other public schools as regards organization.

Let us see what the Hon. Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance has said. I will quote his words:

It would be utterly mistaken to say that we are giving to the Northwest provinces separate schools in that sense of the word. I submit to this House that the system of schools which we have to-day in the Northwest Territories is a national school system, and if it has all the elements of a national school system then I say there is no principle involved in this discussion which would justify us in having a quarrel over it. What is this system? From the hour at which these schools open in the morning up to half-past three in the afternoon they are absolutely alike; there is no difference; the teachers have the same duties, the same qualifications the same examinations, the same course of study, the same books are prescribed by the government, the regulations are made by the government. I repeat that from the hour of opening in the morning up to half-past three in the afternoon there is no shade of difference in all these schools in the Northwest Territories.

Shall I quote now a member of parliament, Mr. Crawford, representing Portage la Prairie. Mr. Crawford is an Orangeman, so he says at least, and he spoke in the following way:

The original clauses of the Bill were very indefinite. Under those clauses it was open to the people to have such school laws as they had in Manitoba, or they could have the old school laws that were in existence in the Territories previous to 1890. . . . Now these school laws as they are in the Northwest Territories, and as they are intended to be continued by this legislation are not at all the kind of school laws that the people, particularly of Ontario, have in their minds.

If this Bill goes through it will establish not what I claim are separate schools. In fact, the name 'separate' should hardly have been used in connection with them.

Coming now to what has been said in this House, we find the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir Richard Cartwright, expressing himself as follows:

What is it that Quebec proposes? It proposes purely and simply this: That we guarantee to these people in the Northwest the simple privilege that I have adverted to, that during one-half hour in each day on paying the proper cost and charges they may confer religious instruction upon a certain portion of the population. That is a good deal less than Catholic Quebec has guaranteed to the Protestant minority within its borders. It is less and a good deal less than Protestant Ontario has guaranteed to the Catholic minority within its borders.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am free to admit that as far as I can judge, it is considerably less than the actual legal obligation incurrred by us in the Act that we passed in 1875.

Hon. Mr. Scott, Secretary of State, was as clear as the others in his appreciation of the present clauses. He said:

I shall say no more on that subject other than this: The proposal in the present Bill is vastly different from the concessions as I may term them, that were made by this parliament in 1875, and which were fully discussed in this chamber. Those are a mere skeleton of what parliament then conferred upon the community, but for the sake of peace the minority are willing to accept. They will make the best of the situation. Practically there are to be no separate schools beyond the fact that there may be half an hour's instruction from 3.30 until 4 o'clock, if the trustees so desire.

The clear and formal admission made in this chamber by the hon. gentlemen occupying treasury benches, proves beyond all doubt that we are not given what the original clause gave and what was due to us.

It is very regrettable that the government should have thus receded from their former position. This Bill, as originally drafted, could have carried, and thereby justice and right would have been done. As the effect of this Bill will be quite the reverse and as this feature of the Bill is the most important one, I am bound to vote for the six months' hoist.

I had many more observations to make. My intention was to refer to many objections that are generally made against the working of the school system now in existence in Ontario and Quebec. I will only refer to one or two.

It has been claimed that our schools were inferior and inefficient. In that regard the Manitoba Catholic schools have been especially referred to. This alleged inefficiency of our schools is simply an afterthought. When the Greenway government declared its new policy with regard to education, they had never blamed our schools, they had never even called our attention to any improvement that could, in their mind, have been made.

A few months before the opening of the provincial legislative session of 1890, many public men spoke on the proposed changes. Amongst them were Mr. McCarthy, then a member of the House of Commons; Mr. Martin, attorney general for Manitoba; Mr. Smart, Minister of Public Works in our province. None of them is reported as having referred to this alleged inefficiency. The reasons given for a change were only that the time had come when the province should dispense with the dual language and the double-barrelled school system, as they called it, so that unity could be brought about in the land by the children sitting side by side in the public schools.

Then when Mr. Martin introduced this measure in the local House, he expressly said :

> The government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department are conducted under this system, but because they are dissatisfied with the system itself.

This declaration makes it clear that it was not a question of efficiency or inefficiency. They wanted a change under any circumstances ; they wanted what is called a system of national schools, but which should be called merely governmental schools.

Instead of being looked at as inefficient, our schools were at all times given the highest praise. People visiting our settlements and our institutions expressed their surprise at the excellency of the school work. Many of the gentlemen now sitting in this House were not here in 1895. But those who were may remember that then I placed on the table specimens of our school work generally, and they were such that they could not be excelled.

At the time the law of 1890 was passed in Manitoba and at the time Mr. Sifton made his famous Haldimand speech there were in our Catholic institutions in Winnipeg over 30 per cent of pupils belonging to English-speaking and Protestant families. Surely these families would not have sent their children to those schools if they had not been efficient. Some of the parents of those children have since testified in favour of those schools. Amongst them I find the late Captain Clarke, a gallant soldier who took part in the fight against the rebellion in the Northwest in 1885. Here are his words :

> I can speak with experience with reference to the excellence of your section, two of my daughters having been for a long time with the good sisters of St. Boniface, where their progress was as satisfactory to me as it was pleasant to them.

We were called to take part in the school exhibition at the Indian and Colonial Exhibition in 1886, at London, England. On this occasion the 'Canadian Gazette,' 4th November, 1886, of London, spoke in the following way of our schools :

> The collection contains samples of books, exercises, scholastic materials, &c., coming from the Catholic schools as well as from the Protestant schools of the province (Manitoba).
>
> The excellence of the work, and especially of the geographical charts, is incontestable. This is the more pleasing if we consider the fact that many of the exhibits are dated from the year 1884 and the beginning of the year 1885. It is evident the exhibit is composed of the ordinary duties of the schools in all parts of the province, and not of work specially prepared for the occasion.
>
> No pretension has been made to eclipse the school exhibits of the other provinces, but the collection under our eyes denotes that in one of the most recently organized provinces of the confederation, there exists a school system which, although respecting the faith and religious convictions of the population, offers to every one an education capable of fitting for the highest rank in society the child who is placed under its care.

That sort of evidence could be multiplied. Governors, lieutenant governors, men of rank in every class of the people, visited our schools and could not but pay them the highest praises.

Mr. Sifton has said elsewhere, this year again, that our schools were absurdly deficient. After what I have just said, it must be evident to all gentlemen that Mr. Sifton was, in saying so, absurdly wrong, absurdly unfair, absurdly ignorant of what he was speaking about. Mr. Sifton has never been in a position to judge or misjudge of our schools. He never set his foot in them, although he was by the law a visitor of the same. His utterances are slanderous. Indeed that gentleman must be placed amongst that class of men who not satisfied with ruining the institutions of a people, not satisfied with taking away from them their own property, are disposed to ruin also their reputation, to insult their feelings, so as to cover his own deficiency and his own wrong-doing. I will not say any more on that point except that the assertion that the Catholic schools are deficient is merely a catch word and ought not to have any influence on the mind of the legislators of this country.

However, I desire to add to the above testimonies that of our late Senator Boulton, from Manitoba, an opponent of separate schools, who said on the floor of this House on the 23rd April, 1895 :

In my immediate neighbourhood there is a separate school, named after the clergyman, Father Decorby, who founded it. He conducted a separate school there for years to which the Protestant population in its neighbourhood went. They were all satisfied with the school; they had no complaint to make of it.

If I understand well the plea that is made with regard to one system of schools being preferred to the other is that the denominational schools are inferior. This is quite inaccurate. They are equal to the others, at least. In our case, they are even superior in so far as they teach generally two languages. What is more practical than language in life ? Surely this creates a kind of superiority over the schools where one language only is taught.

Leaving that aside, however, there is one thing which may be apparent to everybody. It is the fact that if we are not allowed to control our schools, we will have eventually to start private schools or parochial schools, so as to procure to our children the kind of education, the moral training that we believe they ought to have. But these parochial schools will have to starve, being deprived of the municipal taxes and of the legislative grant. Being so deprived of financial resources, they will of necessity be unable to give such instruction as we would like them to give. Then you will have just the kind of schools which you want to guard against. Whilst, if we are allowed to fare as we think we should be allowed, then we will have well equipped schools, both mentally and financially, and the result will be that our children will receive such an education as will prepare them, to use the expression of the 'Canadian Gazette,' for the highest rank in society. Those schools would be, to a legitimate extent, under the supervision of the government officials, who will ascertain whether the assistance given to such schools is well earned, and if not, will suggest any desirable improvement. So, even at that point of view, it would be better to let us have the school system we are asking for.

The doctrine which is propounded somewhere that by granting subsidies to the denominational schools the state is endowing the church is very far from being accurate. The state has no fund by itself. It is the money from every individual in the land that constitutes the funds of which the state may dispose. The Catholics are contributors to those funds like any other subjects of the Crown. And as it is a principle under British institutions that every one who pays must share in the benefit of the fund where his money goes, it follows that in receiving any grant from the government or from the municipal chest, we are only recovering our proportionate share of our own money. Other considerations of the same nature could be gone into. But let us come to figures, which is the most practical thing to do. In putting at $500 in round figures the cost of the maintenance of a rural school, I think I do not exaggerate in any way. Now, what amount do such schools receive from the government ? I will take the figures in the province of Manitoba, as more familiar to me. These figures are taken from the official reports of the Department of Education :

	Maximum grant.	Average teacher's salary.
1891	$150 00	$426 60
1895	130 00	368 17
1900	130 00	406 78
1903	130 00	451 39

The conclusion of this is, that the state is receiving its secular education at half price ; we pay the other half, and the state gets religious instruction and moral training for nothing, although it goes a long way to the maintenance of good order in the community.

Although not a pleasant subject to refer to, allow me to say a few words about public schools. Merely from a social point of view it is well, surely, that we should give the warning, if anything transpires to justify it. It is a service to them and a service to the country that we render in doing so. It is not a pleasant duty, but a duty just the same. We hear very often some say that they have been educated in the public schools and that they are not worse than ourselves for all that. It may be, it may not. I do not want to penetrate into the inner life of our Christian brethren to that extent. Comparisons, it is said, are always odious ; very often they are not safe. The question can afford to be considered from higher grounds.

The Catholics do not claim to be a better lot than others. We have our miseries and too great a number of human weaknesses. But I say this, hon. gentlemen, if you and we have still a superior morality, it is because we have all in our hearts some principle of Christianity. And so long as we retain some vestiges of that Christian training, we will continue, I hope, to shine amongst the nations so far as the social and moral dispositions of our people are concerned. But history must have some lessons for us. It is admitted amongst all students of history that paganism does not offer a sure moral principle, does not even lead to it, but on the contrary is apt to instil in the very heart of the individual and of the people generally, moral disorder and villainous passions. Whoever has gone somewhat deeply into the Roman life before the advent of our Saviour, knows how lamentable it was in that respect. May it please God that we never come down to that. But if we eradicate all religious teaching, all religious training from those institutions, where the younger generation pass most of their lives, I mean the schools, do you not believe that the Christian principles which maintain the older generation in the right path will gradually disappear, and what then ?

Let me quote a few words of public men and moralists on the American public schools. I hope these quotations will not be offensive to anybody. It is not my intention; I merely desire to place before you the warnings given by some who are in a position to do it.

The New York 'Methodist' said some years ago that public schools of the United States were 'hot-beds of infidelity.' A writer of good standing in the United States, Mr. Richard Grant White, wrote (December, 1880) in the 'North American Review' :

> Vice has increased almost pari passu with the development of the public school system, which, instead of lifting the masses, has given us in their place a nondescript and hybrid class.

If fifty or sixty years of public schools have given such results in the United States, would it not be a good thing for us to pause now while it is still time. Let us come nearer home. Some weeks ago Toronto was horror-stricken by a crime which had happened within its territory. A young girl carried away and cruelly murdered without any motive a child that she found on the street. I refer to the Carr girl. After the first explosion of grief and of surprise people began to think. The 'Globe' of the 23rd of May wrote the following lines :

> That a girl scarcely entered her teens could be capable of treating a living thing in a way that she would not treat her doll is veritably amazing. . . . The child's surroundings have probably not been good, but this alone would not account for the callousness, hardness and lack of sensibility which she displayed.

The 'Mail and Empire' was more courageous and spoke clearly in its number of May 26 :

Even for the most forsaken child, it is true, there is always the school. In this city it is free to all—in fact, all children are obliged to attend it a minimum number of days every year during what is known as the school period of their lives. But the school cannot, as now constituted, be the moral asylum for these little ones that it ought to be. One thing it does—it teaches them to read. How much better would many of them be without that knowledge? Illiteracy would place them out of the reach of the depravers who write and purvey the five-cent novels which are the mental pabulum of children of the Josie Carr type.

Is not this a timely warning, gentlemen? Should we not pause before such appalling statements?

The extreme and ultimate results from human institutions do not crop up at once. Any seed put in the soil does not at once come out of the ground. Sometimes it takes days; sometimes it takes months before one sees the stem coming out, but one day or other it is sure to come out and grow and give seeds for another and more powerful crop. So it is with education. It is a seed that we put in the inner part of the soul. It may take years or centuries to bear its fruits, but it will some day or other bring forth good or evil according to the kind of education communicated to the people. Leibnitz said that by the education of the youth you can change the surface of the world.

If once a nation begins to relax in its views on anything pertinent to education, it is sure that gradually the relaxation will go on affirming itself more and more. Let us take an example amongst ourselves. In the province of Manitoba, by the law of 1890, it was provided that some religious exercises could be had after school hours. Now, what has been the outcome of that regulation? Let us see the official reports of educational authorities in that province:

IN MANITOBA.

	Number of schools in operation.	Schools with religious exercises.	Closed with prayer.	Bible used.
1895.....	786	433	396	295
1903	1,163	256	290	199

As you see, as the years have rolled on, and as the number of schools in operation has been increasing, the number of schools where religious exercises have taken place have immensely decreased.

I heard the other day a gentleman say that he would like to see religious training given in all the schools, but that for Protestants it was impossible on account of the diversity of creed amongst them. I confess I was somewhat surprised at such a remark. My conviction had always been that there was not such an insuperability of doctrine as between themselves. Sir A. T. Galt, when claiming protection and separate schools for his people in Quebec, did not make any distinction as between the various Protestant churches. He merely claimed separate schools for all the Protestants as a group, showing thereby that all the Protestants of Quebec, no matter what was their particular church, would be safeguarded and satisfied. Moreover, I have lately noticed in the newspapers of the country that there was a proposition for the union of churches. If those churches can religiously unite, is it not an evidence that there is no such insuperable obstacles as could prevent the attendance of the Protestant children at a union school? Surely the Protestants do not regard the public schools as offering to them any conscientious objection. Because, if they did, I am sure our fellow-countrymen of the Protestant faith would act upon it.

Mr. McKenzie, a member of the House of Commons, said the other day, elsewhere:

Why shall we hold out for a thing that Roman Catholics cannot and will not accept? Is it not a proper thing for us as protestants who have children to educate them in our own way? There is nothing in so far as the different Protestant bodies are concerned that will prevent them from having their children educated together in the same classes, taught by the same teachers or from receiving religious instructions upon grounds common to all Protestant bodies.

But, after all, if, by the circumstances surrounding themselves, some of our fellow-citizens could not take advantage of a good thing, is it a reason why others should also abstain? Because you cannot afford, by circumstances or otherwise, to relish certain delicacies placed on the table for you as well as for other people, is it a reason why I should not myself touch it?

A good deal has been said about the hierarchy. It is to be regretted that too many people do not better study the history of our country. I am sure that if they did they would take a better view of our clergy. From the earliest days of the British occupation up to the present time there is ample evidence of the loyalty of the Catholic church. On every occasion of the invasion of Canada by our present southern friends, the church dignitaries have preached to their flocks their duty towards the Crown. It has been very often said with truthfulness that had it not been for the gallant conduct of the French Canadians, England would not have been able to preserve this part of Canada to her allegiance. On many occasions, when the people were of a troublesome disposition, the voice of our prelates was heard advising peace, harmony and submission to the laws of the land. They did it in 1837-38, they did it when confederation was inaugurated, they did it in the east, they did it in the west. For that purpose our missionaries were called to the distant prairies by Lord Selkirk, a Presbyterian. Bishop Plessis, of Quebec listened to the request of Lord Selkirk, and he sent there Father Provencher, who was made a bishop afterwards. This first bishop was succeeded by His Grace the lamented Monseigneur Taché. He also in his turn was a worker of peace. The Canadian government called him back one day from Rome and at the request of both the imperial and Canadian authorities, he undertook the difficult task of quieting the people of the Red river and of reassuring them about the intentions of the Canadian government. This he did faithfully and successfully.

Later on, on the still farther distant prairies, Father Lacombe exerted his influence for the peace of the country and by his influence amongst the Indians he assured the peaceful construction of a great national work and prevented bloodshed when it was most dangerous to interfere. Let me put before you what the Winnipeg 'News,' a daily paper said at the time about it.

These lines are a retranslation in English from a French translation of an article in the 'Evening News,' of Winnipeg :

When the whole of Canada feared and trembled to see the blackfeet side with the rebels, who firmly stood before them? Who prevented them from rushing upon us? Was it the Canadian government or the forces of the empire? No, the poor, humble and devoted Father Lacombe was the man who did so. To him the Canadian mothers owe their thanks for not having to-day to mourn their sons, to him many happy wives to-day owe their gratitude for not having to sob over the tombs of their husbands. Lacombe and his companions the Fathers André, Fourmond, Cochin, and other brave soldiers of the Cross did not hesitate, they went and faced deadly weapons; they threw themselves between the Indians and the Canadian people at a time when danger was extreme, and they prevented the shedding of blood and saved millions of dollars to the public treasury.

These are only few instances of their good will, and of their influence for the welfare of our country. I may sum up their action in this regard by saying that their constant teaching and their whole life is devoted to that peaceful and beneficial work. Is it not too sad indeed to hear now and then some one hurling at them the bitterest and most unjustifiable accusations ? Those who do that and believe those accusations are not always devoid of good faith and of natural good dispositions. Unfortunately they read unreliable books where that stuff is to be found ; they do not read history in its proper light and hence their difficulties. Many speak about the unity of the nation. No one is better fitted to bring that unity than our clergy ; no class is better disposed towards that view than that fine body of able, intelligent and zealous men. For the sake of Canada itself, believe in these words and act generously towards our church and our religious convictions, one of which is the organization of the schools on the lines we have been suggesting all the time.

This testimony which I am glad to be in position to give our hierarchy, is but the echo of higher authorities. During the last century there lived in England a man who has commanded and still commands the admiration not only of his countrymen, but of the whole world. That man was styled in his own life-time the grand old man. Now, what did Mr. Gladstone say on one occasion :

Since the first three hundred years of persecution the Roman Catholic church has marched for fifteen hundred years at the head of human civilization, and has driven harnessed to its chariot as the horses of a triumphal car, the chief intellectual and material forces of the world ; its learning has been the learning of the world ; its art the art of the world ; its genius the genius of the world ; its greatness glory, grandeur and majesty have been almost, though not absolutely, all that in these respects, the world has had to boast.

My hon. friend, the member for Victoria, has thought proper to run down the Catholic countries in a comparison with Protestant countries. I commend these words of Mr. Gladstone to his meditation. I desire also to call his attention to certain facts and to some testimonies, which ought not be suspected of partiality in our favour.

England was a Catholic country once. Modern England owes to Catholic England her Magna Charta, her sound constitution, her parliament, the jury, her universities, her splendid cathedrals. Even if we take only the material side of the matter, let us see what her writers and her public men said. John Ruskin writes :

> Though we are deafened with the noise of spinning-wheels and the rattle of the looms, our people have no clothes ; though they are black with digging fuel, they die of cold; and though millions of acres are covered with ripe golden grain, our people die from want of bread.

Mr. Chamberlain, M.P., ('Fortnightly Review,' December, 1883).

> Never before in our history were the evidences of wealth more abundant, never before was luxurious living so general and wanton in its display, and never before was the misery of the poor so intense, or the conditions of their daily life more hopeless, or more degraded.

And then Mr. Chamberlain goes on speaking about :

> A million of paupers and millions more on the verge of it.

I could call to my help other testimonies of the same kind and from sources equally at variance with my own faith, but for Britishers these are sufficient. I leave those words to your meditation. One word more about unity. Surely this is a noble goal. But unity lies more in the soul than in the external forms. National love of the country and of its magnificence in every shape, attachment to the soil, respect for each other, an equal devotion to the same flag, a sincere allegiance to the same Crown, these are the strongest factors of unity. No matter what may be our differences otherwise, we will get at unity by cultivating the above sentiments. And in no other way shall we get at it. Look back in the Canadian history. The moment the people of French origin perceived in the English policy towards us a disposition to have proper respect for our race, that moment we, as a people, reconciled ourselves to the new regime, and so much so that to-day we would not go back to the French flag, were we at liberty to do so. Lord Dufferin found no objection to unity in the diversity of languages and of races.

Lord Dufferin, on one occasion, expressed himself as follows :

> I think that Canada should esteem itself happy in owing its prosperity to the mixture of several races. The action and reaction of several national idiosyncrasies, the one upon the other, give to our society a freshness, a colouring, an elasticity, a vigour, which without them, would be wanting to it. The statesman who would seek to obliterate these distinctive characteristics would be truly badly advised.

It has been regarded as an absurdity by certain English statesmen to try to obtain unity by the obliteration of our characteristics. On a measure that was then before the imperial parliament concerning the former two Canadas, Burke, the famous orator and statesman, said:

> To attempt to amalgamate two populations composed of races of men, diverse in language, laws and customs, was a complete absurdity.

Now I will quote another opinion which goes further and is diametrically opposed to the opinions which have lately been freely expressed in Canada. That opinion goes to say that instead of counteracting the views of the people, it is better to adapt the laws to the character of that people so as to produce a better result. After the constitution of 1774 had been given to Canada, a debate arose in the House of Commons in England, on the occasion of a petition from the people of Quebec, asking for the reinstallation of the trial by jury and the writ of habeas corpus. Sir Robert Smith, a member of the House, then spoke and said :

> Whoever reflects upon the excellencies of the British laws would wish to see them extended over the whole face of the British empire ; but if there are local and circumstantial reasons, arising from the national character of the people, their language, customs, usages, institutions and I will even add, their prejudices, which in this case, ought to be consulted, and not only consulted, but, in some measure, indulged ; but if there are reasons arising from these various circumstances that make it impossible for the English laws to be adopted in their original purity, I will venture to affirm, that a legislator is not only justified, but that is an essential part of his duty so to alter and modify these laws as may best adapt them to the peculiar genius and temper of the people, so as to become the best rule of civil conduct possible and the best calculated to promote their general happinesss. It was ever the maxim of the greatest legislators of antiquity to consult the manner and dispositions of the people and the degrees of improvement they had then received, and to frame such a system of laws as was best suited to their then immediate situation.

This reminds me of a lesson which comes to us from antiquity. The wise legislator Solon had been called to give laws to his people. Some time afterwards learned men of some other parts of the world came and asked him whether, in his opinion, he had framed for his people the best laws that could be made. He simply answered that he had given to his people the laws that could best be adapted to them. This was considered wisdom, and has been considered wisdom at all times up to this date. Truly the laws ought to be made for the people and not the people for the laws. Taking into consideration the circumstances under which we live, it would be for the best interest of this land of ours to legislate so as to afford contentment to the various sections of the people.

But then I hear some say that the majority must rule. Are you sure that such a rule should obtain in everything ? Then, if I am not mistaken, the Catholics, although not the majority over all other churches, are the largest religious denomination in the Dominion. If the majority must rule in all cases, then let all the smaller denominations come to us, or vice versa. Many would object to that, I am sure. No, gentlemen, religious convictions cannot be matters to be decided by yeas and nays. In a country of liberty, each one is free to kneel before his own altar. When it comes to education, the Catholics regarding that subject in the light of their conscience, should be granted without discussion the institutions which they regard as touching the very soul of their children.

Is not, in fact, this rule that the majority must rule everywhere, and in everything, too brutal ?

We are, in round figures, 40 per cent of the whole population. Is not that figure large enough to inspire towards us better appreciation ? Are the conscientious views of such a large section of the country always to be questioned, debated, neglected and ignored ? Parliament of Canada does not do that with other bodies. Every session deputations from various concerns come here and appeal to the government for some betterments. These are, however, of a material order, less important than the interest that we have at heart, and still they are heard, and we do not send them back by brutally saying to them that they are a minority.

Unity ! Do you think that you will find unity in the repulsion which will necessarily be engendered by a policy which refuses satisfaction to conscientious views ? Such policy is not calculated to foster good feeling between races and creeds. That policy is rather calculated to widen the gap which divides us.

Unity ! I have already said where we could find it. Let me, however, put before you the words of one of those who assisted in bringing about confederation.

Sir John Rose said on one occasion :

> We trusted each other when we entered this union ; we felt that our rights would be saved with you ; and our honour and good faith and integrity are involved in and pledged to the maintenance of them.

There lies unity ; in carrying out respectfully and faithfully the pledges referred to in the above words, that unity will be realized.

I know, circumstances are sometimes difficult to overcome. But the solving of those difficulties depends much of our action. The leaders of the nation are very rarely unable to master public opinion. In times of emergency the parties must do as they did in 1864. Then many of our political men rose superior to their party feelings. They united to find a way out of our troubles. They succeeded and they created confederation. Now, if I am permitted to refer to the events of 1896, I will say that then the opposition, and its leaders especially, should have risen in their places in the House of Commons and pledged their support to the Remedial Bill. If they had done that, the question then would have been settled and settled for all times, and for every part of the Dominion. No war in the Northwest was to be dreaded. We would have no such troubles as we have to-day. And to-day, consistent with myself, I say that this year when the Autonomy Bill was laid before the House of Commons it was to my mind the duty of the present opposition to offer their support to that measure in its original form inasmuch as the Bill as originally drafted was an acceptable

one. Again I say that if the opposition had taken that course, much of the agitation which has been going on for the last five months would have been quelled from the beginning. And in the long run such attitude would have received the approval of the people. Unfortunately, another course was followed and the result is that we have neither peace, nor justice, nor a good measure.

The Senate, however, exists to act as moderator. It was created to represent the second sober thought of the country. Such being the case, I submit that this House should inspire itself with the sentiments contained in the words of Sir John Rose, quoted above, and improve this Bill or reject it. My voting for the six months' hoist is only to record my dissatisfaction of the measure in its present shape. I know this will not have the effect of throwing out the Bill. We will have then an opportunity to improve the same when in committee, and I hope the government will consent to such an improvement.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for the second reading (Bill 69) an Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta, and the motion of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell in amendment thereto : That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.—Hon. Mr. Perley.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—At this very late period of the session I would naturally be inclined to say nothing on this subject and I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible. I don't intend to speak at length, because the Bill has been discussed very intelligently and thoroughly in both Houses, especially its legal aspects. It is doubtful if any Bill which has ever been submitted to the parliament of Canada has been more thoroughly discussed. I quite agree that it is a measure deserving most careful attention, because in my judgment no Bill submitted to parliament since confederation has been more important to the people of Canada then these Autonomy Bills. It would be presumptuous for me to discuss many features of the Bill, from the fact that it has occupied the attention of the best legal talent in both Houses, and it is fair to suppose that there is no better legal talent to be found anywhere in Canada. I find that in the House of Commons, as well as in the Senate, legal authorities differ as to the power of parliament to legislate on the lines laid down in this Bill. Opinions are about equally divided. Therefore, I do not pretend to deal with the legal features of the case further than to say that I believe, according to my own reading of the law, that the government has no right to coerce the people of the Northwest Territories as they propose to do by this Bill.

Now the first matter that is to be referred to, I presume, is the question of Autonomy—giving full rights and powers of legislation to the Northwest Territories. So far as I am concerned, I may tell the honourable House I have never been in favour of provincial autonomy being granted to the Northwest Teritories. Not that I believe that they are less capable of governing themselves than in any other part of Canada, but I felt that in this enlightened day, by a generous and fair treatment by the government we could do without the expensive machinery of self-government in that country for a while, until there were sufficient people located there to make the expense less than it would be with fewer people. I might go back to 1882, in the early history of the Northwest, because until that time there was really no government of any kind. We had a Northwest council appointed by the government of Canada to make laws, rules and regulations and generally to govern that country. There were no elected members, because there were no electors in the country. With two exceptions I think they were appointees of the government holding some position in the country. Two half-breeds held no position under the government, but all the other members of the Northwest council, if my memory is correct, were men holding some position under the government of Canada. The people were governed by those men until 1883, and in 1883 we had the first election for members for the Northwest council. There were six or seven members elected on that occasion; then they made ordinances for the good government of the country on a scale to a large extent resembling provincial legislation, and the country was governed in that way for quite a while. It was not until after 1882 that the country became populated by any considerable number of white people. That was the year in which the white settlement began to come into that country, prior to that time it was made up of police, Indians and half-breeds. The half-breeds and Indians were natives of the country so to speak and the others were sent in to govern. In 1882, I may say the first band of immigrants went into that country. They did not travel on any regular running train as they do to-day; they went in on a construction train. When I went to the Northwest in the fall of 1882, I travelled on a construction train from Brandon, and I found in the town of Wolseley two houses, one fairly well built wooden house and the other a shanty, and they were occupied by people who lived in the country. A large number of Canadian people, some English and some Scotch went into the country and located homesteads, others bought land. There was more land bought about that time, than was bought for a number of years afterwards, perhaps because a good many of people had inflated ideas regarding the resources of that country. I may say almost every man who went into that country for the first year or two went there with a speculative idea on his mind, and he looked at the great plains and thought they were capable of great results and he bought land and went to work; but he failed, as I will show the House later. Now at that time the government of Canada under the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald voted sufficient money to carry on the government of the country. While I had the honour of being a representative on the Northwest council in 1885, I found that Canada had given us $8,000 more money than we required for the support of the ordinary schools of the country; they had given us more money for roads and bridges, and we had abundance of money for every purpose for which we required it. We made a liberal appropriation for the support of schools, and we paid our teachers more money than was ever given to any class of teachers in any other country of the world. We gave the people all they required in some instances to support the schools, and they had a surplus. That showed the government was generous in giving them money sufficient to educate their children. That state of things continued for a few years, and presently as the population grew—and I may say it was difficult and hard to control because they were scattered all over the country. I do not hesitate to say that it was a wrong policy for the government to survey so much land and allow settlement to become so much scattered over the country. Every man had an idea that away off in some corner was a better place to locate than on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The people scattered all over the country and that necessitated a large expenditure of money to build the necessary roads and bridges, and they wanted schools and they required more money because the population was so scattered. Matters continued in that way for a few years, and in course of time it became a fact that the government at Ottawa did not give us enough money to carry on the schools and build roads and bridges and construct the other public works we had to complete. Mr. Haultain and his associates used to make an annual trip to Ottawa at the request of the government to lay before them the needs and requirements of the Northwest Territories as far as money was concerned; and it soon became apparent that they were not getting nearly enough money. The government was bringing in immigrants, encouraging immigration, and these immigrants had to go all over because the land was surveyed in far-off sections. The government allowed them to locate wherever they had a mind to, necessitating large sums of money to keep up the roads and bridges and efficient schools, and the result was that the government of the Northwest Territories was unable to secure sufficient sums from Ottawa. Mr. Haultain, a number of years ago—I think six or seven—announced his policy for provincial autonomy in a speech which he delivered at Yorkton. Mr. Haultain is a popular man there, and I may tell this honourable House—although some gentlemen may belittle Mr. Haultain—that he is a very able and clever man, and, with his associates, has administered the affairs of the Northwest in an able and efficient manner. He made a speech at Yorkton, in which he announced for the first time, if my memory serves me right, the necessity of provincial autonomy. I took exception to provincial autonomy on the lines laid down by Mr. Haultain. In making a speech at a banquet tendered to him, Mr. Haultain stated distinctly that the time had come when we must be content with poor roads and less schools, or else we had to get more money from the government of the country, or resort to direct taxation. There was just the one choice—poorer roads and poorer schools, or provincial autonomy by which he could get control of the lands and the government of our country, so that we could issue bonds or raise money to keep the roads up to the usual standard. I had no fault to find with Mr. Haultain in his desire to have better roads and better schools, to keep them up to the standard, but I felt an injustice was being done to the Northwest government in the fact that the parliament of Canada had not granted the money to them which they ought to grant. I say here that if you brought in 10,000 immigrants to any settlement they would not contribute one-seventh part of a cent to the local revenue of the country. The federal government receives all the revenue. There is an idea most men do not consider. You bring the immigrants into the country and let them go where they will, they begin to contribute to the revenue of Canada the very minute they land, but they do not contribute one single farthing to the revenue of the Northwest Territories. Consequently, I contend, and I think justly, that when the government of Canada brought those people in they had a bounden right to provide the Northwest government, who had to look after these people, with sufficient money to build roads and bridges and keep up the other institutions which belong to the government. In view of that fact, I said if the proper representations were made here, and if the government at Ottawa would give them sufficient money, there was no necessity of having provincial autonomy and incurring extra expense upon a new country. The roads and bridges and schools of that country had been kept up in a good and efficient condition, and the government since then, I am proud to say, have given us more money, but even yet we have not money enough to carry on the affairs of the country as they should have been carried on, and as it would have been in the interest of the federal government to have carried them on. I am also led now to the opinion that our separate schools would get to be more deficient if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had the full control of the country on the lines he laid down the other day, because he laid down the principle that we are serfs in that country, and he was going to tell us that we had no rights, and that we were there simply as creatures at the mercy of the government of Canada. That is the sum and substance of the doctrine laid down by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was not surprised in one sense and I was in another, because I may say here that it has always been the policy of the hon. gentlemen, while they were in opposition for so many years, to oppose the Northwest. I do not think he can point to one speech that was patriotic with regard to the Northwest Territories and looking to its future development and prosperity. And when he said the other day that we were not independent men and had no rights until the passage of this Bill, I contend he was not justified in making the statement. I can well understand why they did not give us that large grant of money which was justly due to us, and which was only what we had contributed to the public treasury. There is no portion of Canada which contributes more to the public revenue, in proportion to population, than the Northwest Territories; and when we ask for a large sum of money to carry on our affairs, we are only asking for that which we have already contributed to the treasury. Hon. gentlemen opposite take pleasure in stating that all the prosperity which we are enjoying is the result of the policy of the present government. Can any one show a solitary fact to justify that claim? Their course since their advent to power is enough to make any honest man blush. They adopted the policy which they had condemned strenuously and violently for eighteen years while they were in opposition. Some hon. gentlemen supporting the government demand that the exemption from taxation enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway should be abolished, or some concession should be made to the people of the Northwest if it is not. I quite agree that some consideration should be given to the people of the Northwest Territories in lieu of the exemption, but the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway granting that exemption was reasonable and fair at the time it was made. How could the government of Canada at that time be expected to make a good bargain when they met with such opposition? The ablest leaders of the Liberal party, men like Blake, Cartwright, Mills and others—great men, respected by their own party and by all who knew them, and whose word was law with their followers—not only denounced the Canadian Pacific Railway, but depreciated the Northwest Territories in every way. They cannot point to a speech made by any of these men, during the eighteen years they were in opposition, which represented the Northwest as a country of great possibilities.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has not up to the present time said a single word which bears on the question before the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That subject is connected with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No doubt the hon. gentleman now blushes for his colleagues, because he knows that what I am saying is the fact and he does not like to hear it; nevertheless I will not spare him because the hon. Secretary of State said I was to speak to the point and to be sharp. When the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was undertaken, every man of the Liberal party opposed the contract and ridiculed the country. The speech and portrait of Mr. Blake was scattered broadcast through the United States to show that the Canadian Northwest was no good. Everything was done to obstruct the government in making the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Mackenzie government had advertised in the United States and in England for men to take hold of the construction of the road and then had failed. Then Sir John Macdonald came into power, and it was with considerable difficulty that he succeeded in getting men to undertake the work. I admit the Canadian Pacific Railway took great chances because of the unknown character of the country and the manner in which it had been decried. How could the government or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company hope to get money on reasonable terms when such men as I have mentioned were continually representing the Northwest as a country that was no good? How could I hope to borrow money on my farm if I went to a money lender and told him it was no good, that it would not pay the expenses of one hired man. Had these gentlemen admitted, as they are now prepared to admit, that the Northwest Territories are the greatest country the sun shines on, capable of producing enormous quantities of the best wheat, the government of that day would have been able to make a better contract with the company and without doing them harm, because the company would have been able to get money at a lower rate of interest than they were obliged to pay. The gentlemen who are in power to-day, and who were the opposition when the contract was made, are responsible for forcing the government to make a bargain in which was not the best that might have been made under more favourable circumstances.

I come now to the financial terms of this agreement. I do not hesitate to say that it would have been very much better if the government had allowed the Northwest Territories to control the land. I have my own idea as to the policy which would be best in the interest of the whole country. If the government undertake to give away free homesteads to every one who enters that country, I would favour their policy of keeping the lands and of administering them from Ottawa. But it would be much better to hand over the lands to the local government. A better policy still would be to call a halt, and be more careful how they dispose of the free homesteads. A few years ago the government called a halt and ceased to give a second pre-emption and a second homestead. That was right, because the country has a character to-day and the result is they could afford to abolish that privilege. There is no country which presents better facilities for settlement than the Northwest Territories to-day. We have law and order and the highest standard of civilization; we have schools, churches, all the modern moral and philanthropic societies, and we have railroads penetrating the country everywhere. So it would be better for a man to buy a farm to-day than to get two free homesteads before we had such advantages. To give away homesteads, particularly to foreigners, is a mistake; it is much better to keep the land for our own people so that we would not have our country settled up with Russians, Poles and other foreigners while our own people have to go to other fields of labour. That is a question which requires a good deal of discussion, and I do not propose going into it in detail to-day, but if the government would come to the conclusion to adopt a policy of that kind, it would be much better for the Dominion. We are spending money to bring foreigners to the country; it is not necessary. Every foreigner in the Northwest is an immigration agent. They are bringing in their relatives as fast as they can and they tell me, no matter where they come from, that our Northwest is a better country than their native land. People with capital come to us to invest their money. I favour the immigrants who come with very little means, because the wealth of the country is not to be gauged by the amount of money a man brings with him, but by the character of the men who till the soil and develop our resources. Such men contribute to the wealth of the country. I am opposed to this government retaining the lands, but if that is their policy I am satisfied with the Bill, although the lands in the north are not as valuable as the lands in the south. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Davis) admitted that when he said the lands in the south are worth forty to fifty dollars an acre while lands in the north can be had at five dollars an acre. That, probably, is quite true, but to get capital that will give interest equal to the annual allowance for lands the government would have to sell a great many millions of acres at $5 an acre. It will be a long time before that is accomplished. I think the land would be administered in a much more economical way by the local authorities, because the people of that section would have to get their revenue out of the lands, and the Dominion government is not working with that object in view. The people of the Northwest know something about the lands and would administer them on a sound financial basis to the advantage of the new provinces and to the whole Dominion as well. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech the other day told us that we had no status and were entitled to nothing as a community, and that we would be no better off until we get this Bill. That is about what we might expect to hear from the hon. gentleman, judging from his former statements about the Northwest Territory. In 1871 the federal government gave us a Northwest council of appointed members, all but two of whom were educated men, and what kind of school law did they give us? When I went to the Northwest in the spring of 1883 I had two little boys, one of whom had no education while the other had been only three months at school, and it was natural that I should want to have them educated. I wrote to the lieutenant governor, the chairman of the Board of Education, and asked on what conditions we could have a school established in Wolseley. I was told that we must have an average attendance of 15 pupils to get a grant, and that we would have to pay the salary ourselves and after three months the government would refund 50 per cent of it. The average attendance demanded was higher than should have been called for. We could not have got that number of children in one thousand square miles, still there were some children to be educated and for the first two years I lived in Wolseley three or four of us maintained a private school under the educational system of the Territories. We had to rent a room and employ a teacher at our own expense. I was the first trustee and I had to swear that we paid the teacher the full amount of her salary, and she had to swear that she received the money before we could get the grant, and then we had to wait three months before we received it. If they had such laws as that now regarding other matters there would be less boodling and rascality, perhaps, but in this instance we found it necessary to change that law in 1885. I was a member of the Northwest council and was the means, to some extent, of changing the law and getting it amended so that people could educate their children. When the federal parliament gave us power to make laws did that not imply that we had some status? In 1887 we were given representation in the House of Commons, and soon afterwards representation in the Senate; yet we are told that we are nobody, that we are not fit for anything. From the time we were recognized in that country, we were entitled to all the rights of citizens of Canada and to have a say as to the terms and conditions on which provincial autonomy should be granted us. We had a right to expect that the government would not try to coerce us as they are doing in this Bill. There should have been an appeal to the people. What happened when the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill and the National Policy were submitted for the consideration of parliament? When those Bills were introduced the opposition of that day—the government now—implored Sir John Macdonald to dissolve parliament and get the opinion of the people. He did not consent, but that is what they demanded. Why did they not follow that course with this Bill and tell the people before the election what they were going to do. Why did they not say to the people of the Northwest: 'We are going to keep the lands and administer them, we will coerce in the matter of education, you are not fit to make a fair educational law.' Why did they not tell us that we have no rights—why did they not make the speech which we listened to the other evening from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If they had published that speech, there would have been no supporter of the government elected in the Northwest Territories. The people of that region are as intelligent as any people in Canada and know their requirements better than the government of Canada. The educational clause is the contentious part of the Bill. If the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, had incorporated in the Bill what they have stated in their speeches here, that clause, so far as the opposition is concerned, would have been disposed of in two minutes. What we object to is the attempt of the government to coerce the people of the Northwest Territories. They are not a people to submit to coercion. It is not in keeping with the spirit of the age, and with the Christianity and intelligence of the people of Canada. Who sent out the best contingent to South Africa to fight the battles of the empire? The Northwest Territories. Who contributed most to stand by the flag and the principles of the British empire?—Lord Strathcona. Will the parliament undertake to dictate to us and treat us as if we were Russian serfs who had no right to defend their own interests in the passage of this Bill. That is virtually what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the other day. Now with regard to religious education, if I had the power to make every man in this chamber a Protestant or Orangeman to-morrow I would not do it, because religion is a personal matter and every man must be responsible for his own character. I am not a bigot and I recognize that man must be guided in his religious views by his own conscience. The bigot who undertakes to coerce another in such matters is a different man from myself. There are intelligent men in all the churches; there is as much diversity in religious convictions as we find in the opinions with regard to this school clause. We do not agree upon any subject, and religion is no exception. We have good schools in the Northwest Territories; they are said to be the best in Canada. So far as religious instruction for half an hour is concerned there is nothing of that in the ordinances, it is in the regulations under which the schools are governed. The schools of the Northwest Territories are under regulations made by the board of education. I was appointed on the school ordinances committee of the Northwest Territories in 1875, and moved a resolution in the assembly to do away with separate schools and the Hon. Judge Rouleau, now dead, supported my resolution. The clerk of the council, now the lieutenant governor, who was sitting about five feet from him, rose and told him that he was doing wrong, and made two speeches, one in favour and the other against separate schools. We are working under the regulations made by the Board of Education, which provide for one-half hour of religious teaching in the separate schools. I listened to the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and they both distinctly and positively defined the character of the schools to be established under this Bill. I want the hon. Secretary of State to correct me if I am mistaken, but I understood him to say that in all the schools of the Northwest the teachers had to be certified teachers, that the text-books, the inspection and the examinations must be the same in all schools—that what are called separate schools will be to all intents and purposes public schools until half past three each day. Am I right or wrong?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Right.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—For the last half-hour you can have religious teaching by the minority and by the majority if they want it. He says that is all you are giving us. Where is the hon. gentleman in this House who is an employer of labour, having men working ten hours a day, who has the brazen effrontery to say to that man what he shall do the next half hour after his day is done. Why should the Catholics of the Northwest thank this government for saying that from 3.30 to 4 o'clock they will let them teach religion. The only concession they receive if I can understand it, is the use of the school-room where the children are convened, and there they can teach whatever dogma or whatever creed or doctrine they wish, according to the religious faith of the children.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman has made a mistake in one particular. He says the half hour instruction is under regulation. It is by the law of the Territories.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I will admit that. On that point hon. gentlemen have all disagreed. I have heard the most eminent lawyers in this Senate, clever and able men—and am proud to know that we have such men—disagree upon the meaning of that law, one hon. gentleman says it means one thing, and another says it means another thing. They have argued hour after hour explaining the Acts of parliament from confederation down to the present time, and nobody can understand it after all. It may be a piece of presumption on my part, a farmer, to undertake to frame an amendment to that section to make it plain so that any Galician in the country who can read the language can understand it. I think it is right and proper that parliament should make laws that can be understood. In this parliament the layman takes little interest in the framing of laws, but the courts of the country are kept going by the ambiguity of laws framed by eminent lawyers. Parliament is perplexed to determine the meaning of certain sections when it was the duty of these men who undertook the framing of the law to make it distinct and plain so that anybody could understand it. I am going to give notice that I will move an amendment to the educational clause when we go into committee that I think will cover the case, and worded so that every man who reads it will be able to understand it, and I am doing it in strict conformity with the law laid down by the government. Hon. members talk about the Northwest Territories not making any howl about it. It was known at the very commencement that the whole country was agitated. When I went home after the Bill was introduced in the House of Commons, I found the Reformers of Wolseley the most excited men in the country, but when they were told that it did not mean anything they were content. But the people of the Northwest are determined to oppose coercion. In that country we treat the Catholics fair in every respect. The Protestant community in the Northwest Territories wish to live in good fellowship with all the inhabitants, whether Doukhobors, Galicians or any other nationality, of whatever creed. There is a feeling which exists all over that country that nothing would tend more to the good of the land than to have the children brought up and educated in the same schools; and if the interpretation of the law is what the hon. gentleman says it is, although he is not willing to have us frame such a law, he wants in reality to make us do it and to say, 'You shall do it.' But if it is as he says it is, there will be no difficulty in regard to that. The amendment which I propropose to ask the government to accept—and they cannot do otherwise than accept it, because it is plain and fair and to the point—is as follows. I will move :

To strike out subsection 1 of section 17 and to substitute therefor the following :

In any Act by the legislature of the province it shall always be therein provided that the minority or majority in any school district, whether such minority or majority be Protestant or Roman Catholic, shall have the right to have the doctrines of their religious faith taught during the last half-hour of any school day to the children of parents professing such religious faith, always provided that teachers, text books, inspection of schools and examinations shall be under the control and direction of the provincial government.

That is a fair amendment which I intend to move, and if the government mean what they say they will accept it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope that the hon. gentleman from Wolseley did not think that it was because I did not take pleasure in listening to him that I raised the question of order. I always listen with pleasure to the discourses of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley. As a rule they are entertaining; but our time is supposed to be limited, and the early part of the speech was composed of material which we have listened to several times in this chamber already, not only from the hon. gentleman but from various hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I want the hon. gentleman to understand that so long as I have my health and strength and position in the Senate, unless the government has the decency to acknowledge that they are pursuing the policy laid down by the Conservatives, I will tell the same story.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am simply explaining why I raised the question of order. I did not think the hon. gentleman's remarks relevant to the question before the House. I do not propose to reply to the hon. gentleman's speech just now ; but I wish to refer to one subject which the hon. gentleman brought forward very prominently : the observation made the other evening by the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce when that gentleman was engaged in discussing the constitutional question whether or not parliament had a right to insert this particular clause in the Bill before the House. The right hon. gentleman, speaking from a legal and constitutional standpoint, said that parliament had a right to impose whatever conditions it pleased, to insert whatever provisions it chose in the Bill ; and that is perfectly true ; but the right hon. gentleman did not say that it was his wish that any unreasonable condition should be inserted in the Bill ; and the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has himself testified to the liberality with which the government have treated the Northwest during the past few years. He has had to admit that they have been treated more liberally than they had been under the previous administration. It is characteristic of our hon. friends opposite, that they are very prone to seize on some expression of that kind, to distort it, to take it out of its connection, and then use it afterwards as a war cry.

I propose, as briefly as I can, to discuss the measure before the House in a more or less practical way. The constitutional aspect has been dealt with by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, (Hon. Mr. Beique) and it would be undertaking to paint the lily to go over the ground which he has covered. In the first place, I feel that the hon. leader of the opposition in this House is to be congratulated for the way in which he has dealt with this Bill. He has not moved an amendment which expresses his own views or the views of any particular section. He has not done what was done by his leader in the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman has made use of the motion that the Bill be read the second time this day six months. That furnishes a broad platform upon which all sorts and conditions of opinion can find room together. The hon. gentleman from Montarville for instance, who represents what one may call the extreme Catholic view of the question, thinks that very much more should have been done for separate schools than has been done in this Bill. He can get on the platform——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—So could the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) who thinks separate schools are in themselves highly objectionable things, can get on that platform. The hon. gentleman who thinks that this parliament has no right to deal with the question, that it is a matter which should be left exclusively to the province, can get on the platform too ; and as I say the hon. leader of the opposition, if I may be allowed to refer to what took place in the other House, has shown a great deal more tact in dealing with this measure than was shown by his leader there.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad that my observations meet with the approval of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a place for the hon. gentleman from Halifax on the platform.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have had at various periods of the discussion on this matter a great deal of ancient history. That history was interesting, but really had not much to do with the measure before the House. I do not see that there is any object when dealing with this Bill in going back beyond the Act of 1875. Hon. gentlemen have dealt with what took place before 1875, but I wish to state very briefly why I think there is no object in going beyond 1875. In the year 1871 an Act was passed by the imperial parliament entitled 'An Act respecting the establishment of Provinces in the Dominion of Canada,' and the second section of that Act reads as follows :

> The parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may at the time of such establishment make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such province and for its representation in the said parliament.

That Act was passed after the British North America Act and over-rides all earlier Acts in so far as they may be inconsistent with it. Its terms are quite unrestricted, and it gives to this parliament the absolute power to make any terms it pleases when admitting provinces into the union. The union of the Northwest Territories according to the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) took place in 1870. I agree with the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) in thinking that that is not the case. There were almost none but Indians in the Northwest Territories at that time. There were very few white people there, and no organized government, and there could not be a union just then. So that we simply go back to the Act of 1875. I may say that that Act was introduced by the Liberal government, and passed without any opposition whatever. The Conservative opposition at that time offered no resistance to this Act, and I may be allowed in speaking on that point, to refer to one statement which was made by the hon. gentleman from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan) when the hon. gentleman was giving us ancient history, which as I say is interesting, he should have been accurate. He stated that the insertion of the 11th clause in the Northwest Territories Bill of 1875 was the result of a suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald. I had never heard that before, and I doubted it at the time. I have taken the trouble to obtain the debates on that measure in the Commons in the session of 1875 ; I have gone carefully through the debates——

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think I can put my hands on the speech made by Alexander Mackenzie at the time he introduced the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the 'Hansard' and will give it to the hon. gentleman, and if he can find any such statement I shall stand corrected ; but it is not to be found. I have gone over the debate carefully and Sir John Macdonald made no statement with reference to the matter. He did not dissent from the action of the government, but he made no statement with reference to the subject matter of the 11th clause of the Bill. But another hon. gentleman, the Hon. Mr. Blake, did ; and if any hon. gentleman is curious about the matter, if he will refer to page 658 of the Commons 'Hansard' for 1875 he will find the following statement by Mr. Blake :

> He regarded it as essential under the circumstances of the country and in view of the deliberation during the last few days that a general principle should be laid down in the Bill with respect to public instruction. He did believe that we ought not to introduce into that territory the heart-burnings and difficulties with which certain other portions of this Dominion and other countries had been afflicted. It seemed to him, having regard to the fact that, as far as we could expect at present, the general character of that population would be somewhat analogous to the population of Ontario, that there should be some provision in the constitution by which they should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those possessed by the people of the province of Ontario. The principle of local self-government and the settling of the question of public instruction seemed to him ought to be the cardinal principles of the measure.

Then Mr. Mackenzie, who had charge of the Bill, agreed to that proposition, and said he proposed to insert a provision to that effect in the Bill. At the time that this Act of 1875 was passed it was generally understood—and I am not undertaking to express any opinion on the constitutional question—it was generally understood, and that understanding was expressed by the hon. George Brown and by several other prominent men, that in passing the 11th clause of that Bill parliament was providing that there should always be a separate school system in the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No Act of parliament provides for anything for ever. It is only for the time being.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have great respect for my hon. friend as a constitutional authority, but I wish to direct his attention to the fact that the Acts of a subordinate parliament are always governed by the Acts of a superior parliament, and that the Act of the imperial parliament had decided that where separate schools had been once introduced they could not be abolished. There is something to be said in favour of that view.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman say that any Act of parliament provides for anything for ever? He cannot say that, and will not say it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether this Act can be repealed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Of course it can be repealed.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The understanding when the Act was passed was that the question of separate schools in the Territories had been removed from the political arena, and that the country would have a chance to grow up without the difficulties which had occurred in some of the older provinces. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley referred to certain changes which took place when the paternal government which first existed in the Northwest Territories gave way to a popular government, and one of these changes was with respect to the administration under the 11th section of the Northwest Territories' Act. The ordinances which the territorial legislature passed, while they did not go directly contrary to the provisions of the Act of 1875, did to a certain extent diminish the privileges of supporters of separate schools under the Act of 1875. The 11th clause of the original Bill became when the statutes were revised, section 14 of the Northwest Territories Act. It is as follows:

> The Lieutenant Governor in Council, by and with the consent of the council or assembly, as the case may be, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education; but it shall therein be always provided, that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the Northwest Territories, or any lesser portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same may be known, may establish such schools therein as they may think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor; and further, that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and that, in such latter case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they may impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

Then the second subsection is:

> The power to pass ordinances, conferred upon the Lieutenant Governor by this section is hereby declared to have been vested in him from the seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty.

As I said, the ordinances did, to a certain extent, cut down the privileges given by the section which I have read, but not very seriously. The ordinances which made the most decided step in that direction were passed, I think, in 1892. Now, hon. gentlemen, what was the duty of the government at Ottawa at that time? If the government at Ottawa, which was then a Conservative government, were keen about preserving unimpaired the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in the Northwest, what was the course which they should have pursued? I think I can indicate it. By section 17 of the Northwest Territories Act it is provided:

An authentic copy of every ordinance shall be transmitted by mail to the Secretary of State within thirty days after its passing; and if the Governor in Conucil, at any time within one year after its receipt by the Secretary of State, thinks fit to disallow the ordinance, such disallowance, when signified by the Secretary of State to the lieutenant governor, shall annul the ordinance from and after the date of such signification; and all ordinances so made, and all Orders in Council disallowing any ordinances so made, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament as soon as conveniently may be after the making and enactment thereof respectively.

Now, is it not clear that if the gentlemen who conducted the government of this country in 1892 felt, as some hon. gentlemen now tell us they did feel, they should have taken the natural, legal and constitutional way of preventing the occurrence of the evil? That seems a very reasonable proposition; but the fact is the premier of that day and the Minister of Justice of that time shrank from a decided action of that kind, just as they shrank in the case of Manitoba in 1890. The proper course to have taken with respect to the Manitoba Act in 1890 would have been to have disallowed it, and not taken the chances of what might happen in the courts. The hon. gentlemen in this House who supported the government of that day—I am speaking now of the hon. gentlemen who belong to my own denomination—in that action are the gentlemen who now claim that the government of the present day is utterly wrong in allowing those same ordinances to continue in operation for the future, for that is practically what the provision in this Bill is. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona asked: 'Why do you not disallow the ordinances now?' Under the statute the ordinances could only be disallowed within twelve months; they have been in operation now for thirteen years. Of course, they can be overridden by parliament, but the Governor in Council could not disallow them after twelve months. That is the history of the matter—I am looking at it, not strictly from the constitutional point of view, but from a practical point of view—until we got to the Bill before us. As I understand, under the ordinances of 1892, while at first there was some dissatisfaction, the people of the Northwest Territories have, on the whole, been fairly well satisfied. We have not heard of late years any serious complaint from the Catholic portion of the population, and the remainder of the population are satisfied with the present law. That is the position of things when we come to the Bill before us. When this Bill was introduced in another place, clause 16, with respect to education, read as follows:

16. The provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province as if, at the date upon which this Act comes into force the territory comprised therein were already a province, the expression 'the union' in the said section being taken to mean the said date.

2. Subject to the provisions of the said section 93, and in continuance of the principle heretofore sanctioned under the Northwest Territories Act, it is enacted that the legislature of the said province shall pass all necessary laws in respect of education, and that it shall therein always be provided (a) that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the said province, or of any less portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name it is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessments and collection of rates therefor, and (b) that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor, and (c) that in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessment of such rates as they impose upon themselves with respect thereto.

3. In the appropriation of public moneys by the legislature in aid of education, and in the distribution of any moneys paid to the government of the said province arising from the school fund established by the Dominion Lands Act, there shall be no discrimination between the public schools and the separate schools, and such moneys shall be applied to the support of public and separate schools in equitable shares or proportion.

One feature of this clause is that to a very great extent it ignored the action of the Territorial government and legislature between the passing of the Act of 1875 and the present time, and proposed to give in a more definite and somewhat amplified form the rights and privileges embodied in the 14th section of the Northwest Territories Act. Clause 16 as it was originally introduced embodied the feeling of the government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then what took place? In the country which was to be affected by this law nothing took place. There was no disturbance, everything was quiet; the people thought the Bill was very favourable to the territories. They raised no question about the minute difference which might exist between this educational clause and the system which they had in operation, and everything was quiet; but what was the course pursued here in Ottawa and in the neighbourhood by gentlemen who were opposed to the government? They did not follow the course pursued by Sir John Macdonald in 1875, and assent to what was proposed to be done. On the contrary, as soon as it was ascertained what the nature of this clause was, a systematic agitation was begun, the preparation of petitions—dictated from the opposition headquarters in the other end of this building—was set on foot, and an attempt was made to set the whole country on fire over this question. We remember there was a tremendous outcry then that the Bill should not go further; that nothing should be done, until there was an election in the territories. The election in the territories took place and we were given to understand then that there was something wrong about that election, that it did not represent the feelings of the people, and that the government would not be allowed to make any substantial progress with this Bill until elections had been held in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The election that took place in the Northwest was after the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It took place while the Bill was under consideration.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But after the second reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see that that makes any material difference.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY. It is a contradiction of what the hon. member said.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the Bill was highly objectionable to the people of the Northwest they would have expressed their disapproval of it after the second reading as well as before.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The second reading did not compromise the amended clauses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the amended clause was inserted before Mr. Oliver's election.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was because it was not in, that Mr. Sifton resigned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am willing to admit that the hon. gentleman is correct as to that. There was, as we all know, this agitation. The government stood firm. The petitions prepared by or at the instigation of leading members of the opposition, the diatribes, and most discourteous references made in leading newspapers of the opposition to dignitaries of the church to which I belong—these things did not weigh with the government. The government stood firm. Then came the defection of the Minister of the Interior, and, I may say, of the 'Globe' newspaper. I do not purpose saying anything about Mr. Sifton, but I wish to make an observation with respect to the 'Globe.' Some hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, when speaking the other day, undertook to say that the whole Liberal party are responsible for the utterances of the 'Globe,' and to speak of the 'Globe' as the organ of the Liberal party and government. That is not the case; that has never been the case within the last quarter of a century. The 'Globe' has on many occasions—and it has generally selected some particularly important crisis—shown its independence of the Liberal party by coming out in a manner directly opposed to the policy pursued by that party. There is not much more reason why the Liberal party should be held responsible for the opinions of the Toronto 'Globe' than there is why they should be held responsible for the opinions of the Toronto 'News.' What was the attitude of the Conservative party when the defection of Mr. Sifton and the defection of the 'Globe' took place, and this outcry was going on throughout the country? The Conservative party, we have been given to understand, was for about three-quarters of a century the true friend of separate schools. Did the leader of that party say, as Sir John Macdonald would have probably said under like circumstances to the government, 'We shall adhere to our old policy and support you in putting through the original clause 16 of this Bill?' Not at all. If the leader of the opposition had pursued that policy he and his party would have been—it is not my business, but I venture to say if he had pursued the policy which I am satisfied Sir John would have followed, Mr. Borden and his party—would have been in an infinitely better position politically than they are to-day, and it would not have been necessary, if the party had taken that ground, for the friends of the leader of the opposition in this House to go back to what the party did for separate schools sixty years ago. The thing is absurd. What the country has to look to is the policy of the Conservative party and its leaders to-day; not what it was sixty years ago. So far from taking this line the leader of the opposition in the other House and the bulk of his supporters there, and the press supporting him throughout the country, except in the province of Quebec, kept up the outcry against the government. Then what was the position of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, owing, as I say, to the defection of Mr. Sifton and some of his friends from the Northwest, and owing to the attitude assumed by the opposition? As I take it, there were three courses open to that right hon. gentleman. In the first place he could have adhered to the original clause 16 of the Bill. The result of this would have been possibly defeat in parliament. The Conservatives going against him, and Mr. Sifton and his friends and followers going against him, would probably have caused his defeat.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not at all. Prove that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows more about what was going on than I do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It looks like it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If there would not have been defeat, at any rate there would have been discontent and dissension in the Northwest. For years, Mr. Sifton has been looked upon as the representative of Manitoba and the Northwest in the House and in the government. If he and the parliamentary representatives from the Northwest had deserted the government on that issue it would have meant that if this clause had been passed in its original shape there would have been nothing but discontent and dissension in the Northwest, for one cannot tell how many years. That was the difficulty in insisting. Then the premier might have resigned his position as premier. Would it have helped the friends of separate schools in the Northwest if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had sent in his resignation and announced that he would advise the Governor to send for Mr. Borden who was moving against separate schools and any interference with the new provinces? Would that have been a desirable thing in the interests of the minority? It does not seem to me that it would. That course was open to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and perhaps his own personal feeling might have led him in that direction. He is not a man who loves continual turmoil and trouble. Then there was a third course open to the government, if the concession which was asked for by Mr. Sifton and his friends was not too great, if it did not interfere very materially with the rights which had been granted to the minority in the Northwest under the Act of 1875, there was a good deal to be said in favour of a compromise. It would be better for all parties, better for the government, better for the Liberal party, and, I think it can be shown, better for the supporters of separate schools in the Northwest. In the interest of the country at large the premier chose wisely, and in my humble opinion he chose wisely, looking at the interests of the Catholic schools in the Northwest. In order to show that I shall take the liberty of reading clause 17.

Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province, with the substitution for paragraph 1 of the said section 93 of the following paragraph:

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901.

(a) In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with the said chapter 29 or any Act passed in amendment thereof, or in substitution thereof, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in the said chapter 29.

(b) Where the expression 'by law' is employed in subsection 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said chapters 29 and 30, and where the expression 'at the union,' is employed, in the said subsection 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

The hon. gentleman from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan) stated that this was a mere gold brick, that it gave to the people who asked for bread only a stone, while the original clause 16 gave them everything they needed. Let us take up these two clauses and compare them carefully, and we shall see whether the hon. gentleman is right or not.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—We have read them over and over again a dozen times.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island is a fair-minded sort of gentleman. We have listened to speeches two hours in length being read, containing almost nothing that had not been stated more than once, and the hon. gentleman was not troubled about it. I compare these two clauses, the original clause 16 and clause 17 in the Bill; subclause 2 and 3 of clause 17 are identical with subclause 3 of 16 and with the first subclause and the difference is only between the early part of the second subclause of 16 and subclause 1 of clause 17. Let us see how much difference there is. I shall state what the difference is without going over the ground again. The essential difference between 16 and 17 is simply that under clause 17 of this Bill the Catholic schools are to be subject to inspection in the same manner as the other schools and the teachers to to be qualified in the same way. And there is this further fact, to which I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen, that in this first subclause of section 17 there is a provision made for religious instruction in the public schools which does not appear in clause 16 at all—a very important improvement in the clause. Hon. gentlemen have talked about the privileges given by the ordinances as amounting to nothing. In order to show just what they are, I shall read the provision in chapter 29 of the ordinances with respect to this matter. Section No. 41 of ordinance 29 reads as follows:

41. The minority of the ratepayers in any district, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish a separate school therein; and in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate school shall be liable only to assessment of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

There is the same power given in the Act of 1875 and in clause 16 to establish separate schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg pardon. The minority have no power to establish a separate school except where there is a public school.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does that give the right to Roman Catholic teaching in schools?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I never made any such statement.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—There is no use trying to mislead any one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not trying to mislead any one. If hon. gentlemen will only deal with facts and not according to their own vain imaginings.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We are dealing with the facts. Read section 173.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall make my own speech. Sections 42, 43, 44 and 45 read as follows:

42. The petition of the erection of a separate school district shall be signed by three resident ratepayers of the religious faith indicated in the name of the proposed district, and shall be in the form prescribed by the commissioner. C.O., chapter 75, section 37.

43. The persons qualified to vote for or against the erection of a separate school district shall be the ratepayers in the district of the same religious faith, Protestant or Roman Catholic, as the petitioners.

44. The notice calling a meeting of the ratepayers for the purpose of taking their votes on the petition for the erection of a separate school district shall be in the form prescribed by the commissioner, and the proceedings subsequent to the posting of such notice shall be the same as prescribed in the formation of public school districts.

45. After the establishment of a separate school district under the provisions of the ordinance, such separate school district and the board thereof shall possess and exercise all rights, powers, privileges and be subject to the same liabilities and method of government as is herein provided in respect of public school districts.

2. Any person who is legally assessed as assessable for a public school shall not be liable to assessment for any separate school established therein.

That seems to cover very much the same ground as the old law of 1875. The hon. gentleman made contemptuous reference to the educational council in the Northwest. Section 8 of the ordinance, chapter 29 of 1901, reads as follows:

8. There shall be an educational council consisting of five persons, at least two of whom shall be Roman Catholics, to be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, who shall receive such remuneration as the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall determine.

2. On the first constitution of the council, three of the members shall be appointed for three years and two for two years, and thereafter each member appointed shall hold office for two years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no right to vote there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, they cannot directly do anything, but we will show what they can do. Hon. gentlemen smile at these regulations, but I wish to call attention to the fact that for several years, under the administration which preceded the present administration, these ordinances were all they had in the Northwest Territorities and they were perfectly satisfied with them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We were never satisfied with them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman did not manifest dissatisfaction. Section 10 reads as follows :

10. All general regulations respecting the inspecting of schools, the examination, training, licensing and grading of teachers, courses of study, teachers' institutes and text and reference books shall before being adopted or amended, be referred to the council for its discussion and report.

That is a very important thing. Here you have a council composed of five members, two of them Catholics, presumably all intelligent, respectable men, and they have a right to consider any of these important matters and make their report to the Governor in Council, and undoubtedly the meeting together and discussing all these things by intelligent and respectable men must have a very great effect. Clause 11 reads as follows :

11. The council shall consider such matters as may be referred to it as hereinbefore provided or by the commissioner, and may also consider any question concerning the educational system of th eterritories as to it may seem fit and shall report thereon to the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the hon. gentleman admits that that report is simply a device that may be left aside by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Hon Mr. POWER—I understand from gentlemen who are familiar with the working of the system in the Northwest Territories that under that system harmony has been evolved out of the previous rather unsatisfactory state of things, and that any reasonable wishes of the friends of separate schools have been met. Sections 137,-8-9 provide for religious instruction.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think it would be well to read those clauses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To oblige the hon. gentleman I shall do so. Clause 137 reads as follows:

137. No religious instruction except as hereinafter provided shall be permitted in the school of any such district from the opening of such school until one-half hour previous to its closing in the afternoon, after which time any such instruction permitted or desired by the board may be given.

2. It shall, however, be permissible for the board of any such district to direct that the school shall be opened by the citation of the Lord's prayer.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That means either Catholic or Protestant schools?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not necessarily. The hon. gentleman from Alexandria has already stated in his speech that the privileges which were given by this Bill were really nothing at all. I take a very different view. In the first place, the Catholic minority—looking at it from the point of view of the Catholic minority just now—have a right to establish separate schools. Under that they have their own teachers, but the teachers have to be qualified and have to pass the same examination as other teachers. I may say from my own parctical experience that that is a wise provision. I think it is better for the separate schools that the teachers in the separate schools should pass the same examinations as the public school teachers. Then again, they are inspected.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Have they Catholic inspectors?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The inspection is no drawback at all. I wish to say that one has to consider when we are looking at this Bill and deciding what we shall do about it, that the people of the Territories are satisfied, and all their representatives at the beginning declared themselves satisfied and the people are to-day satisfied to have the present system continued.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I deny that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I refer rather to the people who do not belong to the denomination to which my hon. friend and myself belong, and they are the great majority of the people of the Territories. They are satisfied that the present system should be continued. We know from what took place in the House of Commons that they would not have been satisfied to have clause 16 in the Bill. I do not think the difference between clause 16 and 17 is of any material consequence, but those people were persuaded that there was a great difference and that they were being interfered with, that instead of the system they have had for the last fifteen years a new system was to be forced upon them by this parliament.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Mr. Sifton finds a great difference also.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If we had passed clause 16, what would have been the condition of things? We should have had trouble in the Northwest Territories I believe; and I state my honest conviction, not as a politician at all, but as a member of the Catholic church. I believe our people, the Catholics, are practically as well off under clause 17, or will be as well off, as they would have been under clause 16; and I say further, looking at the fact that we can rely with a great deal of confidence on the undisturbed continuance of the present system, instead of the strife and confusion that would follow from the introduction of another system there. I speak for myself only.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman speaks only for himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the city of Halifax, where I reside, we have a system which is practically the same as the system which they have in the Northwest Territories. There are none but Catholic teachers in certain schools in Halifax. The teachers have to qualify the same as in other schools. The schools are inspected the same as other schools; and our people are perfectly satisfied, and their Protestant fellow-citizens are thoroughly satisfied. There is no favour or discrimination. They all work together under one system, but we have practically separate schools, and that is the system as I understand in the Northwest. Now, I just wish to make one observation with respect to the question of provincial autonomy. Hon. gentlemen have thought—and that was one of the grounds taken by the hon. leader of the opposition—that this was an interference with provincial rights. Well, as the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says, the province has not any rights until it becomes a province. That is considering it from a constitutional standpoint. That may be true, but you have to do what is fair and reasonable by the people. This Bill does what I think is more than fair in the matter of the financial terms, but making a constitution involves essentially some limitations on the powers of the people who are being taken in or the state which is being taken in. I direct attention to the fact that sections 3, 7, 10, 16, 21 and 23 of this Bill all interfere with the absolute rights, with the unrestricted rights of the people of the territories. It cannot be helped. When a territory is becoming a province, some jurisdiction must be retained by the federal parliament. For instance, there is the restriction with respect to the lands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is a serious restriction of the unlimited powers of the legislatures. This talk of interfering with the unrestricted rights of the people of the province is not judicious or wise talk. There must be some restrictions on the rights of the people of the province. Finally, whether the Bill is quite satisfactory or not, whether or not clause 17 is quite satisfactory to hon. gentlemen who are supporters of separate schools, who look at the question in the same way that I do, I wish to ask those hon. gentlemen what will be the effect of giving this Bill the six months hoist, looking at it from the point of view of the friends of separate schools. If this Bill is thrown out, separate schools are left completely and absolutely in the hands of the people of the territories.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The same position as they are in now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. We know that if the present government were dismissed—although the vote of this House could not dismiss them, Mr. Borden would not give them separate schools. He declared that he would not interfere with the people of the territories. That is the policy laid down by the hon. leader of the opposition in the House of Commons. Can you expect the hon. gentleman, however agile he may be as a politician, to turn around and to-morrow swallow himself completely and say that he is going to press a separate school law for the territories.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I contend we would have more by the application of the British North America Act than we would receive from this Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We heard the hon. gentleman from Calgary—who was following the leader of the opposition in the other House—say that under the British North America Act we had no rights.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We did not say that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And I direct the attention of my co-religionists to that question; if they throw out the Bill what will the result be as to the Catholic schools in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They cannot be any worse.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They would be exactly as they are now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To an hon. gentleman like the member from Glengarry, who thinks that all these privileges which are given by the ordinances are of no value, it is useless to offer an argument.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I understood a little while ago that an understanding had been come to between the gentlemen on this side of the House and those on the other side, that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken at such length and so eloquently was not to speak on the present occasion, and on that understanding myself and several others on this side of the House agreed to forego any lengthened addresses, but at the last moment, when it had been arranged that a vote was to be taken before 1 o'clock to-day, the hon. gentleman comes forward and occupies the time of the House for one hour.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to be placed in a false position. The hon. Secretary of State said they hoped to reach a vote last evening, and asked me if under the circumstances I would forego the right to speak and I said I would be glad to. Nothing was said about the morning at all, but when I found an hon. member of the opposition had moved the adjournment of the debate last evening I felt I was not bound by my agreement.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I)—The hon. gentleman says that an understanding arrived at last night is not good in the morning. And I think I shall proceed to address myself to this question perhaps at some length, a course which I had not contemplated before.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m.

SECOND SITTING.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Routine proceedings.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS introduced Bill (Q.Q.), An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, as respects lotteries. He said: The object of the Bill is to permit organizations such as the London Art Union to operate in Canada. They are excluded by the operation of the present law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the present Speaker of the House introduced a Bill on that subject in a former session.

The SPEAKER—When we abolished lotteries.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am under the impression that the principle involved in this Bill was discussed at some length some years ago, and the proposition was rejected at that time. Perhaps this Bill may be of a different character from the one we discussed.

The Bill was read the first time.

DELAY IN PUBLISHING THE DEBATES

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to call the attention of the House to the irregularity in printing the debates. We have not yet received the unrevised edition of the debate of last Wednesday. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce brought this matter to the attention of the Senate yesterday, and I supposed we would have had the report this afternoon, but although twenty-four hours have elapsed it is not to hand. We are treated very unfairly by the Bureau, and this House should take some steps to remedy the evil.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The chairman of the Debates Committee is not present, but I understood him to say he would make inquiry as to the cause of the delay.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I understand that, so far as the reporters are concerned, they have been diligent in their work, and the delay is not through any fault of theirs, that the report was promptly prepared and sent to the Bureau, notwithstanding its volume; and that if the fault lies anywhere it rests with the Printing Bureau. It is only fair to those who are doing their work promptly that the blame should not rest on their shoulders when they are not responsible.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no intention of blaming the reporters. I know that the bulk of the report was sent to the Bureau Wednesday night and the balance the following forenoon. The whole of the manuscript was sent to the Printing Bureau by Thursday noon. It is now Saturday and we are still waiting for the unrevised edition.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—As a member of the Debates Committee, I have had occasion to look into this matter several times, and on every occasion have found that the reporters were not to blame. The Printing Bureau is at fault; we cannot have any satisfaction from them; they do as they like.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—This matter was up yesterday, and the House heard what the hon. Secretary of State had to say with respect to the enormous amount of work to be done at the Bureau. The promise was made that in future the printing would be facilitated more than in the past.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But we were given a promise yesterday which has not been fulfilled.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It will be next session.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the end of the present session we will have the papers we have asked for.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I hope so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because we will not prorogue before we have those speeches. More than that, on the 3rd of April last I moved for the production of certain papers in regard to a member of this House having sold some land in Quebec to the government. I have asked several times about these papers, and have had no satisfaction. I intend to obtain them before I leave, and the prorogation will not take place until I do so. The hon. ministers had better bear in mind that if they want to close the session they must produce those papers.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I shall call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that the papers have not yet been produced, and I am sure that they will be brought down.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the Day being called.

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for the second reading (Bill 69) an Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta, and the motion of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell in amendment thereto: That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) resumed his speech. He said: When the House adjourned at its last sitting I was about to reply to the hon. member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) and to refer to an understanding which had been come to on the previous night between the leaders on both sides of this House, an arrangement which all the senators on this side at least were cognisant of, and which I supposed every gentleman opposite also knew of and had agreed to. Since our adjournment I have seen the hon. senator for Halifax, who has explained to me that he was not aware of any such arrangement having been arrived at, and therefore the remarks which I made when I arose to address the Senate were perhaps uncalled for. I shall not refer further to that matter than merely mentioning the fact of it here, and I shall proceed as briefly as possible to consider the subject which is now before us and refer possibly to some of the remarks which have fallen from other senators who have preceded me. I listened with some attention to the introduction of this matter by the hon. Secretary of State, and I must say that I heartily coincided with a great part of his opening remarks, as to the belief entertained by all belonging to the same church as I do that something besides secular education should be instilled into the minds of our children, and that it was the inalienable right of all parents to enjoy the liberty which is accorded to all Her Majesty's subjects in the old country of bringing up their children in the fear and love of God in separate schools if they desire to do so. That right, I am sorry to say, is being minimized by the Bill which we have before us. We have heard from senators belonging to the Roman Catholic faith on both sides of this chamber that such is their belief also, whether they belong to the Liberal party or to the Conservative party. They all entertain the respect for spiritual instruction which is entertained by all members of the Roman Catholic church who are informed on the duties required of them by their religion. But we have not arrived at the same conclusion. The hon. senator from Halifax, spoke of the breadth of the platform of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. On that platform, not only the Catholic senators but senators of all denominations should take their stand and vote together on the motion in condemnation of the limited scope of the Bill which is now under consideration.

The hon. senator from Halifax in his speech referred to the opening remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition as ancient history; that he had gone back some sixty years in order to bring that history before the House because it was the record of the Conservative party during that time; and he rather found fault with my hon. friend for having taken that course. Now what led the hon. senator from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) to take that course, but the speeches of members of the Liberal party in the other branch of parliament, and throughout the country, in which they have taken credit for every enactment with respect to education, and for the liberality of the different laws which have been placed on the statute-book by the Conservative party. It was therefore requisite on the part of the leader of the Conservative party to place the record of that party on this question not only before this House but before the people of the whole Dominion, so that they might see what it has been from first to last. Then we had some remarks made deprecating the length of the address given by my hon. freind from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Bernier). Hon. gentlemen, that address will be engrossed in the pages of our debates and will be a history which will be of interest not only to the rising generation, but to all future generations in Canada. They can refer without fear of contradiction to the testimony which that speech furnishes on the whole question of education so far as the Northwest and Manitoba are concerned. It is very desirable, very necessary indeed to the people of this country that this history should be so recorded, and I am very glad indeed that the House spent some little time getting it into such a shape that it could be recorded in one place. At present if you want to find out the history of this question you have to travel through the debates of various years, and a great many publications before you can get the gist of it. Before coming to the Bill itself I should like to refer for a moment to a remark which was made respecting the position of education in the province of Prince Edward Island, from which I come. It was referred to by the hon. Secretary of State and my hon. friend from Montague (Hon. Mr. Robertson) gave him the information so far as he himself was possessed of it. I must say that it did not convey precisely to the House the exact position of educational matters in Prince Edward Island. It may be said that we have had no complaints from the people of that province respecting their schools. I might refer to various other places from which no complaints have come respecting the position of Catholic schools; but does it follow from that that the Catholic people of those provinces have the exercise of all the rights and privileges which are in the possession of people of other denominations. In the province of Prince Edward Island we are all observers of the law as it stands. You do not find us rising up in rebellion or making any great demonstrations against any law of the land. You do not find the Catholics of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories doing anything of that kind, but let me state briefly the position of education in Prince Edward Island.

We have what is called a free school law. The taxes are levied over the province generally and go into the hands of the government. The government in carrying out the law pays the teachers of the public schools throughout the province. Do they pay the teachers in the Catholic schools of Prince Edward Island? I should like if any one can point out to me where they pay anything to any denominational school in the whole province. Some hon. gentleman may think that possibly there is no such school there, but there are denominational schools in the province, schools paid for by the Catholic people apart entirely from the public schools, which are paid for by government. In the city of Charlottetown there is a public college maintained and supported by the government of the province. There is a denominational college supported by the Roman Catholic people of Prince Edward Island, who also contribute their share to the Prince of Wales College. There are in Charlottetown two Catholic schools maintained by the Catholic people, one in which there are several hundreds of pupils, a very large number of girls, who are instructed by the nuns who conduct that school; and is it to be supposed that that school is conducted without expense to the Roman Catholic people of the island? We all have to contribute towards its support. Many of the children educated there are poor children who could not perhaps get an education elsewhere, and some of them could not afford such clothing as would be required if they attended public schools, but they are all educated by the sisters, and the expenses of their education are paid out of the pockets of the Catholic people of the island. True, some Protestant people in Charlottetown contribute their mite also when one of these ladies or some person on their behalf goes around to make a collection. Some liberal Protestants in Charlottetown are generous enough to contribute towards the support of that school. There is also another Catholic school in Charlottetown, a large building. When you go into the harbour of Charlottetown what is the first thing that attracts your attention? You see before you the city, and on every elevation you will see the spire of some church erected by some denomination there. The next thing to attract your attention will be probably two or three large buildings, and if you inquire what they are, people will tell you that they are public schools. Then you ask what is this large one near the centre of the town, and you are told that is a convent, where not only many female children of the best Catholics of the province are educated, but many others coming from abroad. As the traveller passes through the province from one end to the other, there is scarcely a village, a hamlet or a settlement of any extent to which he can go, in which his attention is not attracted by some large building more imposing than the surroundings, and when he inquires what that building is, he is told that is the convent kept up by the ladies of some religious order belonging to the Catholic church. Do any of these places in which so many hundreds of the rising generation of Prince Edward Island receive a secular and religious training combined, receive anything from the provincial government which taxes all alike for the purpose of education? Not one cent. Now, hon. gentlemen, you do not hear any complaint from the people of Prince Edward Island. They do not bring this matter forward as a grievance, but since the matter has been referred to here, I just thought I should bring it to your attention.

Another matter came up incidentally in this discussion. An hon. senator who addressed you in the earlier stages of this discussion was pleased to refer in terms not certainly laudatory, but condemnatory, of religious training—I allude to the hon. senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) who was himself educated, as he told us, in a school in which religious training was given. He brought forward statistics to show that Catholic countries were less prosperous and enlightened, less moral than Protestant countries, or countries in which there was no religious training. I do not desire to take up your time in combating that view of the question at any length, but if I were inclined to do so, I might produce statistics, not from a Catholic standpoint, or by any one connected with the Catholic Church—because some might say that he was an interested person—but returns given by leading Protestant writers of the world, which would not confirm the conclusion which the hon. senator would lead us to draw from his remarks on this subject. I will just mention two or three of the countries to which he alluded. He referred to Spain as being a Catholic country. There is no doubt it is, for nearly all the people there are Catholics. The population of Spain is about nineteen or twenty millions. The birth rate in Spain, from 1886 to 1892 was 36 per 1,000. The percentage of illegitimacy was 5·4 per 1,000. Spain has ten universities, the university in Madrid is attended by 14,000 students. Then there are the universities of Salamanca and Valladolid of world-wide fame.

What need I say about those places? Every person who has read history knows that they were the most celebrated institutions of learning probably in the world many, many years ago. They are the institutions to which those people who belong to the Roman Catholic faith in Great Britain were obliged to send their sons to receive a religious and scientific training when it was made impossible for them to obtain it in the countries in which they were born. You cannot take up the record of any of the great men who have come to this country as missionaries without finding that although they may have been natives of Scotland or England or of Ireland, they have received their religious instruction, their training in all the sciences of which they were masters, from institutions of learning in Spain, which was once not only the most powerful empire, but probably had the greatest number of colonies throughout the world, equal to what Great Britain has at the present day. It is true that at the present time Spain may not be as flourishing, as rich, or in some respects as great as it has been in former times, but let any one read the record of those who have recently travelled in that country, and what will they say? They say there is no country in the world in which a stranger will be received with more open arms, in which he will receive kinder treatment from the people. It is true in that country secular education is not so general amongst the poor, and the labouring classes, but is perhaps more confined to the learned professions and to the highly educated; but in certain provinces of Spain you can scarcely find an individual, scarcely a landowner or farmer who is not a man of sufficient education to speak not only the Basque language, but also the Spanish. I doubt very much if any hon. members here believe the almighty dollar should be the greatest aim of people in this world. I conclude that most of your honours entertain the opinion if you are ready to express it, that there is something higher and nobler at which the human race must aim than the worship of wealth. If we are to compare Catholic and Protestant countries, let us compare them in point of something else than wealth. Where will you find the greater number of suicides in proportion to the population? Not in Catholic countries. Where will you find the greater number of illegitimate births? I leave that to some hon. gentlemen who probably will read statistics on this matter which I do not desire to introduce here, because they might not be creditable to countries that I should not like to disparage. So I might go through various phases of crime, suicide, infanticide and other things, and I can point to the record by unbiassed writers on this subject, which I think will convince you that a comparison to be drawn between the morality learning and wealth of Protestant and Catholic countries would give some instruction to the minds of many people if they would read for themselves instead of taking statistics compiled possibly from sources for which no authority is given and from which little reliable information can be obtained. There was a reference to the Latin countries of America. Have any of you ever read the history of Mexico, which is one of the Latin countries of America, and which is supposed to rank very low in civilization as compared with the United States of America? I need not refer you to other Latin countries in America, to Brazil, in which you will find some of the greatest monuments to religion and learning that can be found in any part of the world, some of the greatest in the whole of America itself. Take Peru; are we going to take the natives of Peru and the Indians of Mexico as the only examples we are to get from these countries? It is true many of these people may not be educated. They may not have gone to either Catholic or Protestant schools. Probably they could not go to Protestant schools. I do not know if there are any there, but although not educated in the sense that we look upon education, although possibly not able to read or write, they have been educated in what is more important than that. Their spiritual education has been directed by the missionaries, by the priests who have devoted their lives to Christianize the people of those countries, and although they may not be able to compare in point of wealth with the people of some Christian countries that have been referred to, still I believe in the sight of the One who judges all men, that they may perhaps stand on a higher plane than some of the billionaires of other countries of the world.

Passing on from that, I take up the subject which is more immediately connected with this measure, as it is understood that the first arrangement arrived at about taking a vote at one o'clock is not to be adhered to, we will have plenty of time to discuss this measure. I will refer briefly to the Bill which we have before us, more especially to the remarks of the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. If it is not considered egotistical I shall refer briefly to my experience in this matter of education. I had the honour to be one of the delegates, now called the fathers of confederation, assembled at Charlottetown in 1864 and afterwards at Quebec on the question of the confederation of the different provinces of Canada under British control at that time, and this very question of education and of Catholic schools came up. I can assure hon. gentlemen, as certainly as I stand here, that if that question had not been dealt with then and there confederation would not have been accomplished at that time. If it had not been that that question was dealt with by the people who were assembled there; dealt with, I may say, in a broad and liberal spirit, if Catholic and Protestants, Methodist, Baptist and Unitarian had not united there in passing a resolution to place the schools of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec on an equal footing, so that the minority in one province should stand on an equal footing with the majority in the other province, if they had not united on that question—and there were divers views on it when it was first discussed there—confederation would not have taken place, and the circumstances that led to the accomplishment of what was done then were such as might not have occurred for very many years after, perhaps not up to this date. I need not enter into the details of the circumstances. There were events taking place along the borders which are historical, which I need not refer to now, that made it absolutely necessary for the people of these provinces to unite on this question and to see that the government of each province would unite as one man to maintain British institutions on this continent. There were other causes that made that time very opportune for the consideration of that question. The provinces of Upper and Lower Canada had been almost in the throes of dissolution on account of the difficulty of carrying on the government, and the far-seeing statesmen of those days who met at Quebec from these two provinces, saw the necessity of a combination with the maritime provinces in order to carry on successfully the government of British America as a whole. On that occasion there was considerable discussion—and it is unfortunate that the utterances of the men who were assembled there were never recorded. There would be no more interesting historical paper to be found in the archives of the world than the record of what was said by the men who were assembled on that occasion, if that record had been preserved, but, unfortunately, there were but very brief notes indeed taken. Probably I was the only person who took any notes at all, and they were not consecutive, because I had other duties to attend to during the greater part of that time. But I may say that after the question of education had been discussed by the gentlemen there assembled, the Hon. D'Arcy McGee wrote out a resolution which he thought would embody the consensus of opinion of those who had previously addressed the delegates, and he submitted that resolution to me and asked if I would second it, and I had the honour of seconding that resolution at the Quebec conference, embodying the views of every hon. gentleman who was there assembled, although at the outset there was a wide divergence of opinion between them. I may say that, entertaining from my earliest years the opinion that religious instruction should accompany secular education in all schools, whether Catholic or Protestant, whatever denomination they belong to, I believe that it is more desirable that people should have a religious education, than a secular one, no matter what particular church they belong to. We are all trying to arrive at the same heavenly destination, and we should not allow our narrow views on any dogmatic question to separate us on the grand idea that religious instruction should permeate all education.

Entertaining that view, you can scarcely expect that I would be quite satisfied with the Bill which is now before us. I will say further that in my own family, at a time when there were public schools in the city of Charlottetown to which I might have sent my children, when it was not convenient to send them to a denominational school, I sent them for a time to a school established by the Church of England in Charlottetown, and my children received part of their education there until they could go to the Roman Catholic college, and I am satisfied that they are just as good citizens as they would have been if they had attended only the Roman Catholic schools from the first. But at the same time I believe that if it had been a choice between the religious and the public school, where even the books were such as would not be approved by any Catholic, where the history was taught from books such as no disinterested person would approve, where any Catholic historian, no matter what world-wide fame he might have, would have been tabooed—I believe that the pupils trained in a religious school will be much better citizens, and more imbued with patriotism, than if they had gone to a school in which there was no religious instruction, or in which the name of God would be unspoken from morning to night. I do not know that it is necessary for me to go very extensively into the matter of the different clauses of the Bill now under consideration. I might refer to some other matters which are legislated upon in this measure ; and in the very outset what does the Bill say ? It is enacted that the parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may at the time of such establishment make provisions for the construction and administration of any such province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such body and for its representation in parliament. If the parliament of Canada is empowered to make laws for the peace, order and good government, does that not include the right to make laws respecting education, to give to each denomination the right and power to have such a system of education as the parents of the child desire. I believe it does, and I believe that if the parliament of Canada had carried out the 16th clause of the Bill as it was first introduced they would not only have given satisfaction to their own side of the House, but they would probably have united all parties in carrying it to a successful and unanimous termination. But we have had the most conflicting opinions from learned members of the bar on both sides of the House and by members of the bar in the other branches of parliament, on one side and the other. There has been an attempt made to enlighten our darkened mind on the subject of the Bill which we have had before us, on the British North America Act, and on preceding legislation respecting education in the Northwest Territories and Manitoba. Have any two of these learned gentlemen come to the same conclusion with respect to the position in which we stand as regards past legislation on that point ? I have looked pretty carefully through most of what has been said. It would be impossible for any layman to read the whole of it, unless he devoted his entire time to it from the first day of this session of parliament until the present time, and it would have been impossible for him, if he had devoted all that time to it, to digest all that has been said during the past five or six months on this question. But I think I can gather from the consensus of all that has been said that it is the opinion—I would not say the opinion of the majority—but it is the opinion of a good many of those members of the bar, learned men who have graduated in the chief colleges or educational institutions in our country, that taking it in the concrete, the parliament of Canada has power to legislate for the new provinces of the Northwest in any manner which it deems just and equitable. Let me ask hon. gentlemen who believe in religious training in the schools, is it just and equitable to say that only from 3.30 until 4 o'clock in the afternoon is any reference to be made to religion in those schools which we propose to establish in the Northwest? I believe that the 17th section in the measure before us does not go as far as clause 16 in the original Bill, and that all that this does is to minimize the present state of that question by confining the religious instruction to one-half hour in the afternoon during the school days of the week. I must say that on that score alone, because this Bill does not give the people there anything like the rights they are entitled to as British subjects under the constitution under which we live, I am quite prepared to vote with the hon. leader of the opposition for the six months hoist. In conclusion I would just refer for one moment to the expression of one of the most eminent statesmen of Great Britain on this question of education.

The name of the hon. Mr. Gladstone has been referred to here, a name which we all honour. He was a man who stood in the councils of his country as one of our foremost statesmen. He represented one view of public opinion on the question of education. Allow me to quote to you the words of another statesman equally great and renowned, a statesman with whom those who perhaps will not pin their faith in political matters to Gladstone would be more in accord—Lord Salisbury. His words on this question were as follows:

> There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men, and that is, that a parent unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching which the child shall receive, upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects.
> This is a right which no expediency can negative, which no necessity ought to allow you to sweep away; and therefore, I ask you to give your attention to this question of denominational education. It is full of dangers and difficulty, but you will only meet the danger by marching straight up to it and declaring that the prerogative of the parent, unless he be convicted of criminality, must not be taken away by the state.

Such are the words of Lord Salisbury, one of the most eminent statesmen of Great Britain, who has been the leader of a great party and I might say of the empire. If the Reform party had adopted that course, if they had agreed to place all religious denominations on an equal footing, giving to all the right to have separate schools, they would have given effect to those brilliant words of an eminent statesman. In my opinion the legislation embodied in this Bill will cause as much disturbance in the Dominion as if you had given separate schools to every denomination in the country. When we come to look at what has occurred in the province of Manitoba, what are we to expect in these new provinces? The Act of 1875, when it was passed, was supposed by the statesmen of that day to be a final settlement of the school question. When we come to see the action taken against the Act of 1875 by people who were opposed to religious instruction in the schools, what may we not expect in the present day when the number of people who entertain that view has been augmented by immigrants. Doukhobors, Galicians and other foreigners from Europe, many of whom no doubt are atheists and anarchists? Are they likely to be our best and most law-abiding citizens? If their children had denominational or religious schools to attend in these new provinces and could be educated in religion, they would receive such instruction as would make of them good citizens and people with whom the inhabitants of the older provinces would be glad to fraternize.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I had not intended to speak on this question, but this debate having assumed a political aspect, as if it were a party question, I am compelled to explain my position. I have to congratulate the Senate and its leaders for the admirable manner in wich this question was introduced. The Secretary of State was exceedingly moderate; he inflicted neither a long speech nor a speech containing acrimony. No man in Canada is more conversant with the school system than he is, and if he had shown a good deal of feeling I would not have been surprised, because separate schools make some people, and I must put myself among the number, rather irritable. It is really a vexed question, and will ever be. Fifty years ago it was pretty bad, but it is worse now. There has been more excitement and more strong language over this Bill than over any other measure dealing with the subject in the past. For five months they have wrangled over it in the popular House, and now that it has come up here we are showing a good example. The hon. Secretary of State was followed by the hon. gentleman called the leader of the opposition, but I put him on a plane far higher than any leader of an opposition. He gave us a very interesting and valuable history of the educational system of this country. Such a history will be valuable. He was followed by a gentleman whom we all appreciate, who made his maiden speech on that question, and whose voice we hope we will often hear in this chamber. We hope he will give us the benefit of listening to the rounded periods and eloquent sentences which Sir Richard Cartwright is capable of delivering. I may say his voice sounds better in this chamber than it did in the House of Commons, and therefore I was more than ordinarily pleased to listen to him. I will not attempt to descant on the other gentlemen who followed in the same tenor as their leaders, and gave an example of a great deal of good feeling and a desire that this historic debate should be carried on in such a spirit as shall do honour to the Senate for all time to come.

I have tried often here to strike an independent note, but I tell you that independence is a sickly plant in this chamber. It should be relegated to the tomb of the Capulets. I shall not attempt any more—that is my present determination—to play that role, or urge any other gentlemen to do so, because I find it is impossible. I find the members are ranged here, with the exception of myself, on a strictly party basis.

Great excitement has manifested itself in the country, particularly in the city of Toronto, a city from which we ought to expect intelligence and toleration, a city which I admire in every respect, and of which every man in Canada ought to feel proud. Those who have read the first book of Virgil will remember that when Juno had been spurned by Paris in the contest for beauty, she in return determined to wreck the flotilla of Æneas when he was on his way to found the city of Rome. She went to the cave of Æolus, where the winds were kept, and induced that gentleman to let loose the winds and stir up the greatest storm ever known on the Mediterranean, with the result of wrecking the unfortunate Æneas. Toronto seems to be another cave of Æolus, a cave of anti-Catholic bigotry, which is let loose occasionally. Having been for some time in a state of quiescence, it is breaking forth, like a volcano, with great violence. I notice that a great many men, particularly Presbyterians, are very apt on such occasions to say that this is all due to the Orangemen. In this case it was not the Orangemen. I tell you the Orange Order had nothing to do with it, nothing to do with the great ebullitions of bigotry which came from Toronto or elsewhere. If I were to relate the evidence I have had of the humane and exceedingly noble and generous acts of Orangemen to myself I would astonish you. In my practice I remember going, one very stormy night, from where I live to the island opposite Kingston with two brothers named Donnelly, of the fifth generation of Orangemen. I would not have gone had I known how severe the storm was. Instead of going directly across to the island, they directed their course away up west. The night was dark and I could see hardly anything but the crests of the waves passing by, and I expressed my alarm. They said nothing, but their silence was ominous. After passing the dangerous point, they made for the island, and when I arrived there I found a poor woman stretched on a couch, and standing beside her was a priest, for whom these two Orangemen had gone to Long Island before going for me. The whole scene was impressed vividly on my memory, and I shall never forget the generous and self-sacrificing spirit of these two Orangemen, who went out that stormy night to bring the consolations of religion and the humane means that might be necessary for that poor woman. That is only one of many acts of that kind I could relate, and I am proud on this occasion to testify to the generous actions of these men, to whom every bad act against Catholics seems to be attributed.

It is the duty of the Protestants of this country, and especially of Ontario, to put an end to this anti-Catholic agitation. I was going to propose an amendment which would read this way: That not only would they grant the half-hour for religious instruction in separate schools, but that the same thing should be done for all schools, and that time be devoted to teaching the children politeness and courtesy. Whatever may be needed elsewhere, such instruction is needed in Ontario. Great as our common school system is, I am sorry to say it is lacking in that respect. You can scarcely get a boy in the public schools to give you a civil answer. When I was coming recently from Toronto, I saw at Port Hope a woman get off the cars to go to Lindsay. Three boys that I supposed were from these schools were laughing and jeering at her, and I said: 'Why don't you go to assist that woman? They only laughed and jeered at me. I tried to help her, and they only jeered at me. I was very angry, and I said: 'I think, anyway, you belong to the class called blackguards.'

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Perhaps those boys attended the separate schools?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They were lacking in the first elements of courtesy. You may teach grammar, geography and everything else, but if you have not got a civil, polite boy, what is the good of it all? If the Catholics can teach their children good behaviour and at the same time what is necessary to get along in life, that ought to be enough. If a boy is poor it is a mistake to educate him for a position he is not fit to occupy starting out in life. If a boy has the means or the intellect it is all right, but if he has neither the intellect or money it is a cruel thing to educate him for a position which will only make him an idler and a loafer.

I have never known the time when there was not trouble over the school question. It was a burning question when Sir John Macdonald carried on his second election campaign. I was a boy at the time. He ran against a lawyer named Mackenzie. Sir John Macdonald was in negotiation with the bishops, and promised them, if elected, to do the best he could, he did not promise separate schools himself, but he said, 'I will see you get them.' He kept his promise, though he did not get four Catholic votes on that occasion. With his nobility of heart he put that aside and carried out his promise afterwards, when our good friend Sir Richard Scott—he ought to be Sir Richard—brought in his Bill. The school system may have been established by Sandfield Macdonald, but take my word for it Sir John Macdonald was the man who gave the Roman Catholics of Ontario separate schools.

At confederation what happened? Sir John Macdonald gave us all he could. As the hon. Secretary of State has said, Sir A. T. Galt championed the cause of the Protestants of Quebec and did it well and thoroughly. We had no friends, no bishops or any one else that I could see. The two men that we sent down from our section, and of whose expenses I had to pay my share, came back without accomplishing anything. They gave two university charters, one to Regiopolis College, and one to the Ottawa University; those were good and generous grants, but the sweeping arrangements made for the benefit of the Protestants in Quebec were never imitated in Ontario. I know the Protestants get the best of us every time. I shall never quarrel with them for that or lose one of the noble band of friends I have amongst them. I could wish that my tongue fail me if I did that. Read the history of the country and you will find that they get the better of us always. When they had a majority of French Canadians and Catholics in the House of Assembly, and the Protestants were in the minority, they were taken in on the same level, but when they came to get ahead what did they do? They wanted representation by population and they tried and tried their best to secure it. There again Sir John Macdonald stood as a stone wall against every unjust entreaty. Of course it was a good thing in one respect, because it brought about confederation. After confederation some remedy was sought for the hardships surrounding the schools. I was on the school board at the time, and it was a very difficult matter to run the schools on the amount of Catholic money available and the small grant. The Catholics' taxes were higher than the taxes for the public schools and have been for some time. It is necessary, on account of the small number of Catholic ratepayers. However, during that time Mr. Meredith brought up the school question, and I wish to explain this particularly because it will give you an illustration of the way I intend to vote, the manner in which I was led to give the vote which I intend to give, and which may be a surprise to the House.

This matter was taken up by Sir William Meredith, a noble, generous man, and known to be a liberal man. I was told by the Bishop of London that a more liberal and fair-minded man than Sir William Meredith, or a better family than his, did not exist. However, the devil got into him, or somebody else got into him, as I was told by somebody last night, and he raised his hand against the Catholic church. This came to the knowledge of a man who was anxious for a fight, the controversial and much-lamented Archbishop Cleary. Archbishop Cleary attacked Sir William Meredith. He said, 'Sir William says he will drive a sword through the Catholic church; I will guard against it.' He came here to the city of Ottawa and did all he could to defeat the Irish Catholics, and succeeded in electing a Protestant. That is all the result of this war that Sir William Meredith raised. Here is the way I was situated at the time. I was anxious not to desert the party. The man running as the Conservative candidate, Mr. Metcalfe, came to me and said that his seconder, a Catholic, was retiring. I knew why he was retiring. I said: 'Do not ask me to second your nomination, you will get me into trouble, but if you cannot do better, I will act.' Whether he tried or not, he came to me again and said he could not do better, and I was forced at the eleventh hour to act; but I said: 'I will tell the audience that you are bound to vote against Meredith on that question.' I told that to the audience. There was another Senator in Ontario, a Catholic, who went to see Bishop Cleary and made his peace with him; and he always compared the goodness of that Senator to the paganlike manner in which I had acted, and I was almost excommunicated by the Bishop. That shows what was the opinion of the church with reference to the schools. I tell you the Catholic Church holds a position on that matter of which no Protestant is aware. It is not in the power of a layman, even if he wished, to depart from that. The church can bring her heaviest penalties on him if he does. It is considered by every bishop in the world that it is necessary to have religious instruction in the schools. You have the same rules everywhere no matter what the country may be. I did not know then, but I knew afterwards, how strong that feeling was; and that is the reason why on this occasion, I feel myself in a different position. My idea was to retire from this discussion altogether, and I would have done so had it not been that the debate here assumed a very strong party aspect. That being the case, I did not think it right to desert the party to which I belong, nor did I think it right to vote without giving an explanation which I shall give you now. I would be relieved from this if I could, but I cannot. The manner in which I give my vote is in favour of the principle of separate schools. I feel that if I gave a vote against the six months hoist of this Bill, I might vote for a modified principle. If I vote against the modified clause I run the risk of being classed with those men in Toronto who seem to be opposed to everything sacred. See how they attacked that learned and cultured gentleman from Italy, who came to assist the bishop. Previous to that you could not blame a bishop, but now a congregation can bring a complaint against a bishop and have it settled. It would have been well if the papal ablegate had been here before the Kingston diocese was led into debt. Instead of attacking him they should be gratified at his presence here. What did he do that those people condemn? Two men, one of them named Rogers, had a conversation with him. Rogers gave utterance to a statement, and the other man received it.

The receiver is as bad as the thief, and they are both equally guilty. That was a mean act to do, and to make anything out of that and to have the whole people of Ontario raised against the few poor Catholics that are here, I think is decidedly wrong. It is the duty of the Protestants to strive to do all they can to do justice to these people. What do they want? Is that the miserable boon they are to get for their services. You give more than that to the Doukhobors. If they asked for a favour similar to that they would receive it and not a word would be said about it. I do not see why Catholics should be put to the task of begging and praying and canvassing for these things until they make themselves miserable. I trust the day will come when there will be some compensation to them. I trust there will be a time when we will stand on equal terms and we will not be dependent on the favour and grace of our fellow Protestants. I have not read the Bill thoroughly, but all this vexed question hinges on the educational clause, and that educational matter is what has unhinged me, and therefore I advise and glorify the Protestant who bolted from his leaders on that question, and how could I consistently support this measure and advise a Protestant to take his life in his hands and do as he has done. I could not do anything of the kind. No man has canvassed me. I have not spoken to the hon. leader of the House nor to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I am simply acting as I feel compelled to do. I think the hon. gentleman from London retracted the statement that Sir William Meredith stated that he would destroy the separate schools.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—If I said that Mr. Meredith promised to destroy the separate schools I made a mistake; he never made such a threat because he could not do it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If he had said he would do that, I should not have voted for him, and I did vote for him. All good men will rejoice that he did not do that. Where a man gains by bigotry, it is a great blow to the country. I do not know what sort of men are in Toronto but they are ready to spring upon any imaginary or real advance in religion. I do not want to talk to you about Catholic claims. Every one knows that up to the time of the reformation in England there was nothing but Catholicism, and hon. gentlemen will remember the glorious time when the Archbishop of Canterbury, backed by the Barons of England forced King John to his knees and made him sign that greatest charter that was ever given to man, the Magna Charta—the basis of liberty. I hope this explanation will be received without any feeling towards me. I think that good will come out of the agitation. After this when people begin to reflect and think what it was all about, they will wonder why men got in such a state over it. Think of it; a miserable Bill like that, and look at the disgrace to the country. I did not think any country in the world would have had such a spectacle as that—its chief deliberative assembly soiled by the remarks which have been made in parliament.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—As one who since entering this honourable chamber has striven to vote upon Bills according to their merits, sometimes to the extent of momentarily separating myself from my political friends, I crave to be allowed, in justice to myself, to make a few remarks. I will not go into the legal aspect of the Bill, nor endeavour to ascertain which of the two Bills, the one first introduced or the one we have now before us is more favourable or unfavourable to Catholics. I will not try to throw any light on Bills which are likely to be impossible of illumination. I will not search to find out who are befooled in this matter, whether the Protestants or the Catholics. I have heard men of standing say that they have both been fooled. You know all men sometimes will be fooled, or will love to be fooled, and it is sometimes good that people should be fooled. I am not far from thinking that this Bill fools everybody. However as the Bill is before us to be dealt with, I will say a few words confining myself to my own experience in school questions. We in New Brunswick above all others since confederation have gone through the ordeal of a fight between Protestants and Catholics for separate schools. It began in 1871. We were fighting then in New Brunswick on what we thought were our rights to separate schools. The agitation rose high, so high indeed that civil war was rife. Men sent by the authorities to arrest people were killed. If there had been equality among Protestants and Catholics it would have really been civil war. That state of things lasted so long as there were promoters of the agitation, so long as there were politicians who thought they would benefit, and who did benefit by it for the moment. The result was inevitable : the majority got the best of it and the Protestants got their way. They passed their law, called by us a godless law; it still exists; not one iota of it has been changed yet. It needed no prophet to prophesy the result. When religious passions are raised, people go mad. In the name of religion, which is on their lips, but far from the heart, they will pray to God that they may cut the throat of their neighbours. That religion is no religion. The holy religion that we are taught, is to love our neighbours also; otherwise the love of God alone will be of little value. The whole law is contained in the love of God and in the love of our neighbours. The consequence was that we Catholics for four years had to keep our children away from school, for four or five years the Catholic boys and girls had practically no education. We were not allowed to send them to the schools, until at last there was a change and the agitation was over. Better counsels prevailed and we were tacitly told to send our children to public schools. But not one iota of the law has been changed. What is the result to-day ? The same intolerable law which in the eyes of an excited population was absolutely noxious to all Catholic interests, to-day, in its application, yields satisfactory results in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not the law, but the condition of things.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The law is as bad, from a Catholic point of view, as it can be. No religious emblem is to be seen at school. No one wearing any special religious garment can teach. Now what has brought about this change? Good-will among men. Give me the worst laws,—give me no laws at all and give me the good-will of men ; magnificent results will be obtained. In New Brunswick, we were on the eve of catching one another by the throats in 1871 and 1872 ; and to-day I do not believe there is a province in the whole Dominion where Catholics and Protestants go more hand in hand, simply as I said before because good-will had its way and to-day Catholics——

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Is it the fact that in New Brunswick the Catholics can go to an ordinary school and be satisfied with that?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is the case that in New Brunswick Catholics have practically separate schools. I was talking of the good-will of men as against the bad effects of even the best laws when the good-will does not exist.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I am asking if Catholics do go to godless schools, or have they Catholic schools?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I wish to qualify the expression of godless schools. I am far from saying that our Protestant schools are godless schools. I say that wherever the Catholics are in the majority or even in a minority, they come to an agreement with their Protestant friends or fellow citizens and have either separate schools or go to public schools, which I am far from saying are godless schools. As I said before, the word was given to us to go on, and the best of harmony now prevails. In Shediac where I live, the population is about equally divided. We have the grammar school and the convent. The convent is attended by whoever likes to go. Catholics almost exclusively go to that convent ; a few English students go there to learn French. Up to the age of 12 and 14 Catholics go there almost exclusively; but after that they go to what my hon. friend calls godless schools, but what I would call public schools.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman said godless schools.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I said godless school laws. There is no attempt at proselytism—trying to convert Protestants into Catholics or Catholics into Protestants. We come from the public schools as good Catholics as we were before and possibly better christians, because as I said before, we come out with a greater amount of love for our fellow citizens. I will simply ask my honoured and respected leader where his amendment will land us? If by carrying this amendment, the school question is to be opened next year again and if we are to pass through three, four or five months of agitation, dangerous agitation, vicious agitation, give me any law at all, or give me no law at all, if I can only shelve the question. Rather than have the question reopened again and go before the public with the result of having possibly worse laws than those before us, I will accept the Bill that is now before us. Gentlemen on this side of the House who are voting unanimously for the amendment, do not seem to see that when it comes to making laws to replace the law which we have now before us, we cannot possibly agree. Why pull down the edifice, if you can't build a better one ? I do not want to go into the merits of this law. It is certainly possible to make the law more advantageous and beneficial to Catholics on paper ; but hard to go any further. In the application, it will happen, there, in the west, as it did with us, the majority will ultimately rule, so the best way to be serviceable to the Catholics, to help them, and to help the extension and diffusion of Roman Catholic ideas is in my opinion, to be moderate indeed. Before long the same equilibrium that prevails in New Brunswick will prevail there. This law is many times more advantageous to Catholics than the laws of New Brunswick. Although the laws are, from our standpoint bad ; in their application they are satisfactory. They have brought about this effect, that we go hand in hand in New Brunswick ; that we are a united and happy people and that to-day even with our laws as they are, we are better off than we would be were we to agitate for better legislation. I believe that the Roman Catholic laymen and possibly clergymen too would say : let us live harmoniously with our school laws, bad as they are. Bad as they are, do not touch them because if you do you will simply be provoking another period of agitation which by all means must be averted. In order to avert another three or six months of the agitation we have just had, I will vote against the amendment of my hon. leader.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to say——

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I wish to draw the attention of the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think I had the floor.

The SPEAKER—If the same principle prevails as in the Commons. I may say that I noticed the hon. gentleman from Drummondville rise in his place several times.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I rise to a question of order. The hon. Speaker has decided that a certain hon. gentleman shall address the House and the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) has no right to interfere with that hon. gentleman's speech until he has proceeded with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have a right to speak to the point of order. And I say that in this House it is not the Speaker who decides who is to speak first and if hon. gentlemen study the rules they will find that it is not the Speaker's decision which governs on that matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I invited the Speaker's decision, and I have every desire to abide by it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I desire to say a few words on the second reading of this important Bill. Representing as I do a district in the province of Quebec which is largely Protestant. It would be out of place if I gave a silent vote. There are many important matters dealt with in the measure before us. I may say the two measures, Bill No. 70, which follows this one on the order paper dealing with the province of Saskatchewan deals with the same subject matter, viz. : the creation of new provinces in our growing Northwest.

The financial provision which has been made for these new provinces seems to me at least to be ample, and it needs to be, as the requirements are no doubt great to meet the necessities of development in these new provinces. And those of us who represent the east are anxious and willing that they should be developed at the earliest possible moment.

Honourable gentlemen, allow me to say if I am not misinformed it was the Protestant element of Quebec who urged the right to establish separate schools at the time of confederation that they might teach their children as they thought best. If so the very existence of separate schools in the Dominion of Canada, is a result of the action of our own English-speaking people at that time. Then why should we refuse justice to the minority in the two new provinces ?

The people of the province of Quebec have shown their broadmindedness and liberality by their calmness throughout all this at times irritating discussion. And in another place stood loyally almost to a man by the government of the day. The people of Quebec appreciate that under the wise leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier Canada has prospered as it never did before. The people of the province of Quebec realize that the volume of trade is gradually increasing from our western heritage. They also feel that the increasing trade which will flow through their province and with increased transportation facilities both by land and water, they will reap some benefit from the development of the great west. These are some of the reasons why the people of the province of Quebec gave their support and confidence to Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

These two Bills when passed will complete the chain of provinces from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I am sure I reflect the views of every hon. senator in this House when I say we are equally interested in their growth and progress as those representing the territory directly interested in these measures.

Hon. gentlemen, there has been some criticism in connection with these measures of our great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which in my opinion was unjust and unfair. I am satisfied the policy he and his government has laid down will be be found the best suitable for the requirements of these new provinces.

This same policy which has done so much to weld together the two different races of this Dominion, and in no part of the Dominion can we see the results to a greater extent than in the province I have the honour to be a citizen of.

The clause which provokes bitter criticism is the clause which deals with education. Again we see the broadmindedness and statesmanship of our honourable leader.

Having in view the circumstances and conditions existing, I am satisfied he has adopted the policy which gives fair-play to all classes and creeds, and which after all is the only sure foundation to build upon. In after years those of us who live to see it can look back to those provinces working out their destiny in peace and harmony so necessary in this great and growing country of ours, composed of different creeds and nationalities.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I do not want to cast a vote upon this important question without first offering my congratulations to the hon. Secretary of State and to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on the frankness they have shown in explaining the clause of this Bill relating to education. I have myself given a good deal of study and attention to the question. I have read and carefully studied both the original clause 16, and the amended clause which appears as clause 17 to-day, and I agree with both these gentlemen that practically there is nothing for the Catholics of the west in the amended clauses. These gentlemen have not hesitated to say that the half-hour given to the Catholic minority for the study of religion is no concession at all. If there is any concession it is only to permit God to enter the school-house at half-past three, and leave it at four o'clock sharp. I was somewhat surprised to hear some time afterwards the remarks of the hon. senator from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David), and the very able and exhaustive speech of the hon. member from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique). We all know that the hon. member from de Salaberry is one of the best lawyers from the province of Quebec. Instead of admitting frankly as the ministers I have mentioned did, that the clause as it stands to-day deprives the Catholic minority completely of their rights, the hon. gentleman devoted one-half of his speech, which occupied two hours and one-half, to an argument and defence of a clause which without meaning to be offensive, I would call splitting hairs. He has tried to explain to the Catholics of Canada that there is no difference between the two clauses, and that practically they have the same rights to their schools under clause 17 as if the original clause 16 had been adopted. As to the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles, he had another reason to be satisfied. His reason was that everything was going smoothly, the law could be passed without hesitation; that the arrangement made in the past prevented the embodying of the original clause 16 in the Bill. The arguments of these hon. gentlemen led me to make an inquiry as to how things were passed in the other House and that inquiry has convinced me that in the whole cabinet as constituted to-day there is only one single Orangeman, and we have never heard the Minister of Railways and Canals say a single word against clause 16 in the Bill as presented. I further learn that the first cause of objection to clause 16 was when Mr. Sifton, the Minister of the Interior, resigned on that very question, because he said he had never been consulted and he had strong objections to granting to the Catholic minority of the two new provinces any rights at all. I found moreover that the same Mr. Sifton, who was the organ of the opposition in the other House to clause 16, was the same man who exerted himself in Manitoba to deprive the Catholic minority there of their rights. I found that the same Clifford Sifton was the man who was rewarded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier with one of the most important portfolios in the present administration—why?—for having deprived the Catholic minority of Manitoba of their rights. It was not the Orange Order as a body who opposed clause 16; it was Mr. Sifton and after him Mr. Fielding who threatened, I am told, to resign if clause 16 was not removed. We know very well what Mr. Fielding's position on that question has been. In 1896 he declared publicly at a meeting held in Nova Scotia that the Remedial Bill prepared by Sir Charles Tupper was a slur on his career—that Sir Charles Tupper had been much respected by the electors of Canada, but the fact that he had tried by a Remedial Bill to give satisfaction to the minority in Manitoba was a slur on his character. Amongst the Orangemen there may be some extremists, as there are among all large bodies of men, but Catholics as a whole have no right to cast reflections on Orangemen as a party. We have in this very House a man who enjoys in the province of Quebec amongst right-thinking men, the highest reputation for uprightness and desire to render justice to everybody. He has given evidence that the Catholic minority have no reason to fear that they will be interfered with by the Orangemen. I have only to name the leader of the opposition in this House (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), and I say without fear of contradiction that if there had been one Orangeman of his high character in the present cabinet, clause 16 as it appeared in this Bill originally would be still a clause of the Bill to-day.

I was not surprised at the remarks of the hon. member from Mille Iles casting reflections on the Orange order of the whole Dominion, because during the last 25 years we have often heard such remarks in the province of Quebec. Every time the Liberal party has been in difficulty, every time it has found the ground slipping from under its feet and there was reason to fear that the electors would turn against them, the Liberal press has been filled with strong articles against the Orangemen under whose thumb the people were told the whole Conservative party of Quebec were kept, and that they were men whose sole aim was to destroy the Catholic religion. We have heard this often, but I was not prepared to hear the hon. member from Mille Iles repeat these accusations in the Senate when they were so completely uncalled for. We have been told by different supporters of the government, with the exception of the two ministers, that there is hardly any difference in the meaning of the two clauses, 16 as proposed and clause 17 which replaces it in the Bill. I have already stated that to my mind and in the opinion of several gentlemen there is nothing for a Catholic minority in that clause; nothing to protect their rights, nothing which any Catholic would feel satisfied to support. I go further, I would rather see this whole clause struck out and the minority rest their claims on the provisions of the British North America Act. We have heard so many legal opinions on both sides that I think I am at liberty to offer my view of subsection 1 of clause 93 of the British North America Act which provides that every province entering confederation shall enjoy all the rights and privileges they possess at the time of the union. My contention is that to-day the Catholic minority, or any minority in that great Northwest, is under the law of 1875 entitled to the same rights as the minority in Ontario and Quebec. It is true that ordinances have been passed by power created by this law of 1875, but it goes without saying that a council created by a law has no right to pass ordinances in conflict with that law. I submit and I believe there is no contradiction on this question, that those ordinances being completely illegal, if instead of having clause 17 we said only that the Catholics or any other minority in the west would be under clause 93 of the British North America Act, they would hold a much better place than at present, and I have no doubt that if a case were presented before the courts the interpretation I am giving to the law would be upheld. That is the opinion expressed by high legal minds and by most men of good sense.

I go further; even if the law decided that the Catholic minority has no such right in the west under the British North America Act there is another subsection of section 93 which provides that any privileges granted to a minority, after a province has been admitted into the confederation cannot be removed. The Catholic element will always be an important portion of the population of these provinces, and no party will be able to govern without their support. I am satisfied that even if no mention of the minority were made at all, before many years elapsed they would succeed in having all their rights. By this Bill they are deprived of them completely. Clause 17 is called a compromise. If it is a compromise I have never understood perfectly the meaning of the term. I have always understood that it meant mutual concession on each side in a dispute and if this were a compromise I submit that there ought to be a new definition of the word. I will suggest that the general definition of 'compromise,' as we have always understood it be kept, and that there should be a new definition of a Laurier-Sifton compromise, which would mean that one side yields everything, and the other does not give any compensation. As to the fear expressed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that there would be a rebellion in the west if the rights of the minority were sustained, it is an insult to the western community. It was my good fortune to take a trip west in April last. I was amazed to see the progress there, and the immensity of those rich lands in the west. I had read a good deal of the west before, but what I witnessed was beyond my expectation and I was gratified exceedingly with the population we have there. They are people of the highest intelligence, of whom any country would be proud. We have in this House some representatives from the west, and I believe if they are a fair sample of what the west can produce, we may be satisfied that the population of the new provinces will be law-abiding citizens ready to submit to the law of the land rather than rebel. Why should they rebel in this instance? Would there be any reason for a majority to rebel if clause 16 as originally presented had been passed? Did clause 16 deprive the majority of their right to educate their children in their own way? No. Is there any obligation by that clause to force the majority to pay for the schools of the minority? Not at all; and when I hear some hon. gentleman say there would have been a rebellion had the law been passed, I say the only effect of such a statement is to condemn the good sense of the people of the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I had intimated to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that I did not intend to make a speech on this question, and a few minutes will suffice to state all I have to say. I would not have arisen were it not that I wish to refer to an explanation which I consider to be somewhat sophistical in the remarks made by the hon. member from Halifax, on observations addressed to this House by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I refer to the argument of the hon. gentleman that we had a right to enforce a system of education such as this House thought proper on the Northwest, because we had acquired that country at a very great expense, because we had laid out a great deal of money there maintaining law and order, opening up the country and extinguishing the Indian title. The hon. gentleman from Halifax made the explanation that the remarks of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce were on a constitutional line, and that it was simply because we had not given autonomy so far to the provinces that they had no provincial rights. My hon. friend made that statement, but he deliberately laid down the doctrine from which I wish emphatically to dissent, that we have a right to deal with the Northwest in the matter of education, or in any other way, differently from what we would otherwise deal with them, simply because we have expended a large sum of money, acquired through the taxation of the older provinces, in purchase, development and maintenance of the territories. That view, to my mind, is altogether unsound and untenable, and when my hon. friend announced it to the House I was reminded of an incident recorded in Uncle Tom's Cabin. Uncle Tom was a pious old slave who had been bought in the slave market in New Orleans by a planter named Legree, whose ideas of religion were entirely different from Uncle Tom's. He wanted Uncle Tom to work on Sunday, but Uncle Tom replied that he could not do that conscientiously. 'Why,' Legree said, 'I bought you, and you must do it.' Uncle Tom replied: 'You bought my body, but my soul is not yours.' Then Legree said: 'Didn't I pay $1,000 for everything in your cursed black hide, and yet you tell me that your soul is not mine' I was reminded of this incident when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said we had a right to impose this legislation on the Northwest, because we had expended a great deal in acquiring and maintaining the territories. The very same doctrine that my hon. friend advances to the House was the one which the British government employed in its dispute with the thirteen colonies. They said they had spent a vast amount of money in defending them and prosecuting wars against France, and on that ground the contention of Grenville and North and other British statesmen was that they had a right to tax the colonies in order to make up that loss. The doctrine is identically the same, that because the Northwest Territories cost us a large amount, we have a right to treat them differently from what we would otherwise have done in regard to education. In answer to that I say the Northwest Territories owe us very little in that regard. The enormous development and wealth that Canada has obtained to-day is largely due to the Northwest; and, apart from that, the increase in the number of shoulders in the Northwest to pay the burden will amply pay us in that regard. There is, therefore, no foundation whatever for the argument my hon. friend has addressed to this House.

I want to make this additional point in connection with that subject and to refer to the very excellent legal argument addressed to the House by my hon. friend from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique). I was delighted to find that the hon. gentleman placed himself on record most distinctly on a point which most entirely refutes the legal contention set up by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he introduced the Bill in the House of Commons. Sir Wilfrid's contention was that we were under obligation by the constitution to do what he was proposing to do in section 16 of the original Bill. My hon. friend from de Salaberry, who is an excellent authority on such a subject, took almost precisely the view that was taken, in fact agreed with Mr. Christopher Robinson, who we all know is also an eminent lawyer, that we were not legally under obligation to pass clause 16 either in the original Bill or clause 17 as it stands in the Bill now before the House. That being the case, that no legal obligation rests upon us to impose any restrictions upon the territories in dealing with the matter of education, and in view of the address that has just been made to the House by my hon. friend from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) detailing what happened in New Brunswick, and putting that side by side with what we all know with regard to Manitoba, how does it stand with regard to these two provinces? The hon. gentleman has told us, and told us truly, that they had great strife in New Brunswick in passing their educational law. It led almost to bloodshed. The majority triumphed and a strict law was placed on the statute-book enforcing education on non-sectarian lines. Yet when the trouble was over, and good feeling again prevailed, by degrees and by a desire to do what is right, they have in New Brunswick a very fair educational system. They enjoy greater advantages than the minority in Manitoba, where the wisdom of the federal parliament, on both sides was concentrated in passing a law in 1870 which it was believed would secure separate schools in Manitoba for all time. Yet in the face of the Act, Manitoba is to-day without separate schools, without any substantial advantage for the minority, while in New Brunswick where a different course was pursued the minority are better treated. With the lesson we have before us in the past, I am strongly and firmly of the opinion that we will never secure peace on this subject nor secure privileges for any minority by stirring up bad feeling and strife. I have come through this contest myself and have a right to speak strongly upon the subject. I was one of the Protestant majority in my province who stood with the Catholics in 1896, in trying to give them reasonable consideration. I endured obloquy and persecution which I shall not very soon forget for the course I then pursued. The storm passed over; I lived through it. I was for a time made the object of strong attack by the Liberals of the province, because I had taken that action.

Let me say further that on that occasion, and I am speaking in the presence of senators from the island of both political parties, there was not one prominent Liberal in Prince Edward Island who stood up for the minority in 1876. Every man who faced a constituency in support of payment for results was a Conservative, and it was the Conservative Prostestants who gave the support which was given to the Catholics in every constituency of the province on that occasion. I make this statement without any fear of being contradicted by any of my hon. friends in this House. That being the case I am strongly and firmly of the opinion that it would be infinitely better for the Dominion of Canada to have left this matter to the territories, seeing that no obligation rests upon us to deal with it. If we had left it to the people of the territories I have not the slightest doubt that in the end the minority would be fairly and justly treated. Hon. gentlemen may make some comparison between the present agitation and discussion and that which took place in 1896 with regard to the Manitoba school question, but the two questions are not on a parity in any respect. In 1896, the question was whether solemn terms made with the people of Manitoba in 1870 and crystallized in an Act of the Canadian parliament and an Act of the British parliament should be carried out. It was not a question of what kind of schools we were to give to Manitoba, but whether the schools we have given them by solemn Act of parliament should be retained to them. The contract with the people of Manitoba was broken, and by whom ? By the political friends of gentlemen on the government benches, supported by the leader of the government himself and by his friends and political supporters in the province of Quebec. In this case what are we doing ? We are ignoring the people who live in the territories. They have as good a right to be consulted as the handful of people who lived in the Red River Valley in 1870. When we are constituting the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, there will be a deep sore remaining with the people there if we pass these Bills, as we are proposing to do, without consulting them, and the fault of the government in pursuing the course they are doing is more than likely to fall on the shoulders of the Catholic minority there, who will probably be blamed and suffer on account of the action of the government. If the opposite course had been pursued and the people of the Northwest had been allowed to frame a school system of their own, it would not be very long till there would be very little ground for complaint. This is the only point to which I wish to refer, and therefore I will take my seat, having kept my promise not to make a long speech.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It was my intention to give my reasons for supporting this Bill, notwithstanding the fact that it is insufficient and incomplete with regard to educaional matters. I was determined to do so in the interest of the minority in the Northwest, but under the circumstances and condition of things at the present moment I reserve my right to give the explanation in the committee stage. In the meantime, notwithstanding the inefficiency and incompleteness of the Bill, I shall vote for the second reading.

The House divided on the amendment which was lost on the following division :

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the main motion is put, I wish to make a suggestion on behalf of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed). Business called him away and the suggestion has been made that the pairs might be entered in the debates. It will then place every member pro and con on record upon the question. That is done in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I concur in the suggestion. The pairs were as follows:

The motion for second reading was declared carried on the same division reversed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that one hon. gentleman intimated his intention to discuss the question in committee. We know that if the rules are strictly adhered to, the debate must be confined to the clause immediately under consideration. Can it be understood that when considering one clause, the whole matter can be discussed? I should like the opportunity of explaining a little more my position and of replying to remarks made by other hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will be open to any hon. gentleman to do so because we have the sister Bill which has to be read the the second time. The speeches may be all repeated again, but I trust we will let that Bill go without discussion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Any hon. gentleman has a right to express his opinion on clause 17.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Thanks for the opinion. Under the circumstances I shall take the opportunity of expressing my opinion when the motion to go into committee is made.

PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN AUTONOMY BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (70) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Saskatchewan.

The motion was agreed to on the same division as Bill (69).

THIRD READING.

Bill (162) An Act to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894.—(Hon. Mr. Scott).

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (52) An Act to amend the Franchise Act, 1898.—(Hon. Mr. Scott).

REPORT OF TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAL COMMISSIONERS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the map or maps, and the further reports from engineers, referred to in the interim report, made on the 26th April last, by the commissioners of the Transcontinental Raiway.

He said: It will be remembered by hon. gentlemen that the original scheme for the construction of the Transcontinental Railway did not provide for any new line of railway between the Quebec bridge and Moncton, N.B. The provision in the Act of incorporation of the company was inserted in the Railway Committee of the other House, and it was inserted, I have understood, at the instance chiefly of the members representing the province to which I belong. At that time, in the session of 1903, it was alleged that a railway could be built from the Quebec bridge to Moncton which would be very much shorter than the existing Intercolonial Railway between those points. Some gentlemen stated that the road would be 150 miles shorter than the Intercolonial Railway; but the allegation which was made with the most confidence and which I think was accepted by the majority of members of both Houses, was that a road could be built which would be 90 miles shorter than the Intercolonial Railway; so that it would have been worth while, with a view to rapid transportation of freight between the Pacific and the Atlantic to build this road.

The common point is really a place called St. Chrysostôme, on the Intercolonial Railway, close to Chaudière Junction, but I take the Quebec bridge, because that is an important point. When the legislation respecting the National Transcontinental Railway was passed in 1903 and the amending legislation in 1904, it was with the expectation that a great saving in distance would be made as a result of the construction of the proposed new road from Quebec to Moncton. I do not think that any member of either House would have advocated the duplication of the Intercolonial Railway if there was not to be some substantial shortening of the distance between the two points which I have named. Within the last few weeks there has been laid upon our table an interim report of the commissioners appointed for the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway, which in my humble judgment shows that the expectations formed by the majority of the members of both Houses in 1903 and 1904 have not been realized and are not likely to be realized. I am not going to worry hon. gentlemen at this stage of the session by reading many extracts. I shall content myself with reading one extract from the report of Mr. M. J. Butler, assistant chief engineer, who took charge of the eastern part of the survey. The statement to which I desire to call the attention of the House will be found at page 75. Speaking of the length of the road he says:

> 1st. The distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostôme, by way of the Intercolonial Railway is 493.5 miles.
>
> 2nd. The distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostome via the preliminary survey lines as run for the Transcontinental Railway, is 504 miles.

That is the National Transcontinental Railway is to be ten and one-half miles longer than the Intercolonial Railway, instead of 90 miles shorter. Then he says:

> 3rd. The estimated shortening of the preliminary line that will be secured by the final location is 18 miles, making the distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostôme by way of the Transcontinental line, 486 miles.

Now this estimated shortening is an estimated and uncertain thing. It depends upon the results of further surveys. I have asked for these papers because at page 79 will be found a statement from the engineer—not the same engineer—that further reports would be sent in early in April, and I think those reports should be laid before parliament before any final decision is come to with respect to this matter. Then at page 15 there are references to various maps and plans. It is very difficult to get a clear idea of the position of things without these maps and plans; and it appears that there was a map sent with the report, of which we should have at least a tracing. It seems to me that the report which has come from these commissioners puts another face on the question of the construction of this road from the Quebec bridge to Moncton. I notice the engineer—and of course engineers who are proposing the construction of a public work, never overestimate its cost—estimates that the road can be built for $33,000 a mile. The road being 500 miles in length, that would involve an expenditure of something over $16,000,000. Probably we would be safe in saying that when we come to construct that road it would cost nearer $20,000,000 than $16,000,000. The proposal is to spend this money for the purpose of building a road from St. Chrysostôme to Moncton, which would be substantially of the same length as the existing Intercolonial Railway ; and then, under the terms of the contract of 1903, this new road built by the government would be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. If it were possible for the government when they did this to close up the Intercolonial Railway, I admit that something might be said in behalf of that proposition, but such is not the case. There is a very considerable population served by the Intercolonial between St. Chrysostôme and Moncton, and the government could not close up that road. The effect would be this ; the cream of the traffic would go over the new road, leased to the company, and the deficit on the working of the Intercolonial would be made a permanent thing—the country would always have to pay a very considerable sum for the running of the Intercolonial. I submit that the position of things as we find them after the presentation of this report, calls for further consideration from the government. I think that this report alone shows that it is the duty of the government to pause and consider before they make up their minds to proceed with the construction of this new railroad.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What is the hear, hear about?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That they should not build the Moncton section of the road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not saying whether they should or not. I am giving some reasons——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman means simply for the government to pause?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—To pause before undertaking to build the whole line or merely that section?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That section. I have always been an advocate of the construction of the road from Quebec westward. At the time the Intercolonial Railway was built the standard road was a road upon which the gradients did not exceed 52·80 feet to the mile. That is a grade of 1 per cent, and this gradient, as I understand it, is exceeded at one point only from St. Chrysostôme to Moncton, and that is near Metis station east of Lake Metapedia. I am satisfied that if careful surveys are made the gradients which have been decided upon for the Transcontinental Railway—that is the gradients of ·4 coming east and ·6 going west—can be obtained on the Intercolonial Railway without any substantial lengthening of the line. In fact, I have seen a report, which I am unable to lay my hand on just now, of a survey made from Metapedia station on the Intercolonial Railway—a station some distance north of Campbellton—to some point not very far from Rivière du Loup, which got rid of the objection to gradients and also shortened the distance very considerably. I submit as a citizen of Canada that the wise course for the government to adopt now would be to have surveys made in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and if it is found that the desired gradients can be obtained on the Intercolonial Railway without seriously lengthening the road, and without very great expense, they should arrange to lease the Intercolonial Railway from the Quebec bridge to Moncton to the Grand Trunk Pacific rather than build a new road at a cost of $16,000,000 to $20,000,000 and lease that new road to the company. I have no doubt the company would be quite willing to take a lease of the Intercolonial Railway from Quebec to Moncton instead of the lease of a new road. If it turns out on investigation, that the gradients of the Intercolonial Railway could be reduced to the proper figure without seriously lengthening the line and the government were to lease the Intercolonial Railway from Moncton to Quebec to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company they would save a large part of the proposed expenditure and they would get rid—and that is a very important matter—of the yearly deficit on the Intercolonial which occurs on this section of the road.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That will depend on the hay crop in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not seriously. The company would not carry hay for nothing, probably. With respect to the reason which actuated parliament in providing for the construction of this new road, the object would be attained in this way; the improved Intercolonial Railway from Quebec to Moncton would serve all the purposes of Nova Scotia even better than a new road between the same points.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to make one observation. Of course the information is not complete with regard to the survey in New Brunswick, and it seems to me premature to express any individual opinion as to what should be done. There is a route by the River St. John which we would be glad to see adopted in place of the route which the hon. gentleman suggests, but I do not intend to take advantage of the present opportunity to point out the advantages of that route, because we hope the engineers now on the ground will find a route that will answer all the demands made with regard to gradients and curves.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—This matter has come up unexpectedly, and I heartily concur in a great deal that has been said by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. The adverse report to which he refers confirms to a very large extent the predictions or statements which I made with regard to this proposed new Transcontinental Railway, or the eastern section of it. We cannot, however, until those reports are brought down, say definitely whether this road will be any improvement upon the present Intercolonial Railway or not. I have very grave doubts myself as to whether they can shorten the distance to any appreciable extent, and I have very grave doubt also whether they will be able to get a line with gradients very much better than we have on the Intercolonial Railway at the present time. The hon. gentleman at the close of his remarks asked the government to take into consideration the propriety of leasing this portion of the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I scarcely think that policy would be popular in the maritime provinces, but I should like, if the government are to consider these phases of the question, to call attention to a suggestion I have made at different times in the discussion of this question before the House. In previous sessions I have suggested that the government might take into consideration the idea of opening the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Great Northern, or any other of these great lines of railways that connect with it; that an arrangement should be made by which trains should be run over the Intercolonial Railway either by the companies themselves or taken charge of by the Intercolonial Railway management, and that the Intercolonial Railway should be a sort of common highway to convey the cars and the freight which might be offered by all these different companies from one point to the other. The advantages of that arrangement over the proposal of building a new line and leasing it, would be that the companies would have no rent to pay. They would only have to contribute a small sum for the maintenance of the line. They would have no interest to pay on the cost of construction; they would not have to pay as rent to the government the three per cent on the the cost of the construction of this line, and any trifling saving in distance would be more than overbalanced by the saving thus effected. I merely rise again to call the attention of the government to this suggestion. The more I have thought of it, the more I am convinced that it is the most practical and feasible way of solving the question of the Intercolonial Railway and its connection with the other important railways of the country.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I am sure the majority of hon. gentlemen in this House will agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax as to the advisability of the government pausing before incurring any very great expense in building this new road. It will save us from undertaking the expenditure of $20,000,000, and not only that, if the suggestion he has made that the government lease the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk and other roads is adopted, it will save us from the vast burden of the deficit which has been put upon the Dominion year after year. My hon. friend from Westmoreland says that the maritime provinces would not approve of it, but even if the maritime provinces do not approve of it, I am sure the rest of the Dominion would. The rest of the Dominion has been saddled with that immense cost year after year; and I am sure it would be no injustice or hardship to our friends from the maritime provinces if this road was handed over to one of the great corporations, who would run it on business principles and make it pay, and relieve the government of that annual burden. I only regret that the hon. gentleman from Halifax did not go further and extend his inquiries to the part of the line from Quebec west to North Bay. He would find in connection with that part of the road that we required a report from the engineers before proceeding further with the work. So far as we have heard independently of government reports, that section of the road is going to cost nearly $100,000 a mile. There is going to be no local traffic—nothing to justify that expenditure. Nobody asked for that section of the road. The Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific only asked for connections with their road from North Bay west. The experience we have had in the surveys so far, I am sure, is sufficient to justify the government in saying, 'Pause,' for that part of the road also. I do hope that the government will take that matter into consideration before incurring any further expense from Quebec west. We know that the portion from North Bay west will serve the western country, it will serve the whole Dominion in so far as present interests are concerned for the next twenty years; and I have reason to hope that this matter will be taken up seriously by the government.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I earnestly hope that the matter to which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has drawn the government's attention will receive very serious and careful consideration at their hands. When the question of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was first mentioned and the proposition was made to continue it from Quebec to Moncton, I gravely doubted myself, in looking over the maps, whether it would be possible to save the distance that it was stated could be saved by the construction of what was supposed to be called the straight line. Any person who will look at the map will notice that the State of Maine juts very far in towards the St. Lawrence.

The fact is that after you go about one hundred and ten miles out of Quebec to the point where you would turn south-east, you are not then more than about twenty miles, perhaps not that, from the boundary on one side and the St. Lawrence on the other. If that is the fact, I cannot see how by the proposed route it is possible to save one hundred or one hundred and ten miles of distance, and if it is going to dwindle down to fourteen or fifteen miles, I entirely endorse the view that has been expressed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I earnestly hope the government will call a halt and not invest $20,000,000 in a road that will only shorten the distance a few miles between Quebec and Moncton. I admit there is a section in the province of Quebec that requires a railway, but a line could be subsidized that would give all the necessary accommodation, because the business of that section goes to Quebec. The Intercolonial Railway could be utilized, as it is, from Quebec to Moncton. I can well remember when we were asked by Sir Charles Tupper to sanction the building of a line from Oxford to New Glasgow. He intimated to the House that the construction of that line would save 40 miles as compared with the roundabout way by Stellarton. He represented that from New Glasgow a large amount of coal is taken to the west, and that there was a very heavy grade at Stellarton over which it was impossible for an engine to draw anything like an ordinary load; and that by the construction of the Oxford and New Glasgow branch that grade could be overcome and the distance shortened by forty miles. I dare say he was honest, and that he was led to suppose that that would be the result. The House was persuaded to sanction the construction of that line, and what was the result? When it was built, it was only some four and one-half miles shorter, and the certificate of the engineer showed that the grades were actually heavier than the grades of the Stellarton route.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will my hon. friend inform the House between what two points this extraordinary discrepancy occurred.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Between Oxford and New Glasgow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It must have been between Pictou and New Glasgow.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It was stated afterwards that owing to the road having been diverted in order to give accommodation at several points on the route the line was lengthened, and the saving was only four and one-half miles instead of 40 miles in distance, while the grades were as heavy or heavier than on the old line. I hope we are not going to have a repetition of that experience in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific from Quebec to Moncton. One experience of that kind is enough. We do not want to have a second, and I hope, before a sod is turned for the construction of that road, that the government will take great care to see that a thorough, careful, accurate survey is made and a very careful estimate furnished of the cost, the saving of distance, and the character of the grades. I earnestly hope that until that is done not a single sod will be turned nor any attempts made to proceed with the construction of the line.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I regret very much that I was not in the chamber when the hon. member from Halifax addressed the House, but I doubt very much if this is the time to discuss the merits of the proposed line. The arguments I have heard since I came into the chamber had better be deferred until the reports are laid on the table of the House. We do not know whether this proposed line will be longer or shorter than the present line. We are not seized of the facts as to the character of the country through which the road is to pass or how much its construction will cost. The object of the minister is all right, to get all the information we can with regard to this great subject. When we have it all before us, we will be in a position to discuss the matter on its merits. We cannot discuss it on its merits now. Everything said within the last half hour was stated when the National Transcontinental Railway Bill was before the Senate for consideration. It seems to me until the parties who are surveying this line make their report and we have the facts before us we are not in a position to discuss the matter on its merits.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The remarks I made were based on the report of the commission and of their engineer.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman was speaking.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a pity the hon. gentleman was not in the House when the remarks were made. One thing we must not forget; the eastern division of the road is to be constructed by government. So says the contract, and clause 5, adds, 'Upon such location and according to such plans and specifications as it shall determine, having due regard to directness and favourable curves,' and further on in section 8 it says:

> The construction of the said eastern division shall be commenced so soon as the government has made the survys and plans and determined upon the location thereof, and shall be completed with all reasonable despatch.

This is binding upon the government, but in the law which made good that contract, there is a section, No. 21, which says:

> The Governor in Council may at any time suspend the progress of the work upon the eastern division until the next session of parliament.

So the government has the power to suspend the work at all times until the next session of parliament. I think this is the proper time to tell the government that they should not be hasty in undertaking the work, that they should wait for the reports and see that the public money is not expended in a foolish way. If the government would double-track the Intercolonial Railway, and put part of the money they are going to expend on this line in making improvements on the Intercolonial Railway, it would probably meet all the requirements of traffic. As the hon. gentleman from Halifax has said, three companies have been incorporated here, any one of which would be very glad, if subsidized, to construct a railway from Quebec bridge to near Moncton. This would be done by private enterprise and they would be feeders to the Intercolonial. All this should be taken into consideration by the government, and I am in accord with the hon. gentleman from Halifax when he says that the government should pause before going any further.

Hon. Mr. MACKEEN—The motion is very opportune, more especially as I believe it is the intention of the Minister of Railways to proceed immediately with the construction of this so-called short line railway. If such is the intention, without making proper comparisons and giving the country an idea of the surveys that have been made and the probable length of the road and its cost, it is important that the attention of the House and country should be drawn to the statements which have been made by the hon. member from Halifax. I would almost think that the government, as represented in this chamber, should take cognizance of what has been said, and see to it that the construction of the road is not proceeded with until all the necessary data have been obtained, and comparisons made as to the cost of building that road and the cost of putting the Intercolonial Railway in a condition to carry all the traffic that will be brought to it by the new transcontinental line. I have heard railway experts and others who are not influenced by political consideration say that the Intercolonial Railway, for a comparatively trifling cost, could be put in a position to do all the business that is likely to be brought to it from the west for the next fifty years. It is contended that the Intercolonial Railway can be double-tracked between Quebec and Moncton if necessary, and that the heaviest grades on it can be overcome by diverting the line. For a distance of about twenty miles on the Intercolonial Railway the grades are heavy, because the line was constructed with a view to having it straight, and it is said that by a slight diversion of that straight line the grades could be reduced about one per cent, so as not to exceed the maximum gradients all over the line. That asset of the country, the Intercolonial Railway, should not be subjected to the competition that is likely to arise from the construction of the proposed line. We ought to pause and be very careful to understand all the contingencies in connection with the subject before the construction is commenced. There is no politics in this, because the political stage has been passed. The proposal to lease the road from Quebec to Moncton to the Grand Trunk Pacific does not strike me as feasible. If the road is to be leased at all it should be leased from Montreal. I do not see how you could lease the middle of the system and retain control of the two ends. I doubt if it could be worked economically under such conditions. I repeat the Intercolonial Railway is capable, in my opinion, of doing all the work that will be demanded of it for many years to come. The roadbed is excellent, there is good rolling stock on it, and if necessary a large part of it could be double-tracked, and we would then have a line equal to or better than the proposed line would be. With regard to the Oxford and New Glasgow road, the hon. gentleman from Wellington was right to a certain extent. I remember being in the House at the time that matter was brought up, and we had to confess that we were greatly surprised. I believe the explanation made was that it would be so much shorter to Pictou without going to New Glasgow, and that was the impression that was conveyed to the government. There is no doubt—in fact, I am sure, from conversation I heard among the members of the government at the time—that even Sir John Macdonald, who never misrepresented anything in matters of that sort, believed that the road was going to be shortened that distance between Oxford and Pictou, and so it would have been, but being extended to New Glasgow, where it connected with the Intercolonial Railway, the distance was not shortened as was expected. The road afterwards was connected with the settlements of Wallace, Pugwash, and River John, and thus it was lengthened considerably. The fact remains, however, that it is a very popular road.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I have listened with a great deal of interest to this discussion. Had I not done so, I would not have occupied the attention of the House for a moment at this late hour of the session. The hon. gentleman has a very incorrect idea with regard to the shortening of the Intercolonial Railway from Oxford to Pictou and New Glasgow. Forty miles was an excessive estimate; perhaps it would be something over thirty miles, between Oxford and Pictou. The saving in distance from Oxford to New Glasgow would be something about 14 or 15 miles.

I have taken considerable interest in the project to build this road from Quebec to Moncton. When it was first mooted by the government, I looked at the geographical position of the country, and failed to see how the statement made with regard to the shortening of the distance could be correct. I considered it impossible. Some newspapers, which of course are not always responsible, estimated that the saving in distance would be 100 miles. As the hon. gentleman from Wellington has said, the road cannot be very much shorter than the Intercolonial Railway. Taking a practical business view of the situation, having the financial condition of the Intercolonial Railway in view, when the Intercolonial Railway must be maintained as a condition of confederation, the great object to be attained, would be to secure all the traffic possible and try to make it pay. That should be the first consideration. It also would suggest the idea in connection with this other road, that if the traffic of the country is going to be diverted from the Intercolonial Railway in a greater degree than at present, it would not be more profitable than it is now. Therefore it strikes me as being a matter requiring a good deal of practical consideration before undertaking such a large expenditure. In reference to the argument of opening up new country, either in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, it seems to me when we travel through those sections of the country and see the fields growing up into wilderness again, and the trend of settlement altogether towards the west, we must conclude that we have as much land opened up in the east as the country requires at the present time. I do not attach much importance to the opening up of new country beyond providing facilities to market the timber. I have held the opinion for some time past, from information gathered in conversations with engineers and others who understand these things, that if 25 per cent of the estimated cost of the new line were expended on the Intercolonial Railway, it would make the road just as valuable for traffic as the other road. Perhaps there are points where it would be difficult to double-track the line, but it could be double-tracked, and if the grades were reduced, it would be equal to the road that is proposed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does my hon. friend mean 25 per cent of the amount estimated for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific should be expended on the Intercolonial Railway ?

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I mean 25 per cent of what it would cost to build the new road from Quebec to Moncton. I say if that amount were expended on double-tracking and improving the Intercolonial Railway, that line would be sufficient to accommodate all the traffic for, if not half a century at least a quarter of a century. Some people anticipate that the great west will soon be so immense that we will require extraordinary facilities to accommodate the traffic between that country and the sea. Some hon. gentlemen have also ventured the assertion that in either one of these new provinces which we are creating there will be in a very short time a larger population than in any other provinces of the Dominion. I do not share that view. Ontario has not passed its growth, and it will be a long day before either of these western provinces will be able to compete in wealth or population with Ontario. I am willing that my words should be taken down, and I take the responsibility of making that prediction.

We are told there are no politics in this House. If the day has come when that is practically the case, I am very glad to join my hon. friend from Cape Breton in expressing satisfaction that it is the case—that we may divest ourselves of all political prejudices, and view these questions in a practical manner. But the point has been raised that this road is to be built in the interest of the maritime provinces, and our friends in Halifax have a strong impression that it will do a great deal for the shipping port of Halifax. I am surprised therefore that this practical view of the question should have emanated from the hon. gentleman from Halifax and that these two politicians should join hands on this great question. I have reason to question whether this road would be of material benefit to Halifax or to the maritime provinces in any way. I think that it would be better, in order to remove the stigma that is now placed by our western friends on the Intercolonial Railway because of the cost of maintaining it, to improve that highway. According to the terms of confederation we will have to keep it going, unless our western friends break faith with us. I think we could remove that stigma by having one first-class road instead of having two. I agree with my hon. friend from Lunenburg that a more extended discussion would perhaps come appropriately when we have a fuller report on this road and that it is well to sound a warning note at this particular time in a sort of supplementary way that will put us in a position to look carefully at the subject as it proceeds and be more ready, when we do take hold of this question, to deal with it in a practical and reasonable manner.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I take up the last words of my hon. friend—a warning note. We in New Brunswick are pleased to get that warning note, especially as my hon. friend from Montebello advocated the giving away of the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now if it is to be given away, why should it not go to Mackenzie & Mann, or the Canadian Pacific Railway, as well as to the Grand Trunk Pacific? If it is going to be an acquisition to traffic or to produce traffic, why should not our own road, built largely by our own money, before we had a connection with Halifax, before we had the section running north, get the advantage? Before confederation we had our own road, the European and North American, running from St. John to Shediac. The people of New Brunswick in those days contributed about one million a year to govern the country. They had a militia of 25,000 and four adjutants general, and the expense of governing the country was less than one million dollars. To-day we are contributing possibly $4,000,000 a year to the public revenue directly and indirectly and have been doing so continuously. Had the $3,000,000 which we have been contributing annually, over and above what we would have required for our own purposes, been funded with the interest accruing on it, we would have one hundred million dollars in the treasury to-day and would not have to plead for favours here; and we would not have had suggestions made to give away the railway built by our own money. When we entered confederation it was understood that the Intercolonial was to take the northern route to be a military highway and this policy was endorsed by the imperial government, which is not always right as to military highways or military lines of demarcation. We were told that it could not be constructed on the southern route because it would be too near the frontier. When that argument was laid before the people and New Brunswick accepted the constitution and entered the federation, it was understood that the Intercolonial was to be a great road of our own. Now why should that road be given away? Our people should know that their line is in jeopardy. I see that the policy is endorsed to a certain extent in Nova Scotia, but our people will ask why should the Intercolonial pass out of their hands. Why should they lose a railway in which their money is invested just as the money of Ontario is invested in the canals. I can imagine the argument would be used that it would be good policy because its revenue does not cover its expenses.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the reason.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Why should it go in debt all the time? My hon. friend says there is no politics in this debate or in this House. We do not want to add more than we can help, but we stand up for our own people whenever it is necessary. Now, the first thing to find out is, why the Intercolonial does not pay. It did not pay under the Conservatives; it does not pay under the Liberals, but by implication if that road is to pass out of our hands to either one of these railways, it will pay in private hands. Now why should that road, which should be kept open for all the railways coming from the west, be given away? I maintain it should not be locked up against any one railway, but kept open for all, with certain restrictions and with a fixed tariff.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Running powers.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—And with running powers. If the government of the day cannot manage it properly, then it might be placed under a commission. Some system might be thought of that would keep the road in the hands of the people. I cannot accept the view of my hon. friend from Nova Scotia that it will accommodate the traffic of this country for half a century or even a quarter of a century. I believe its capacity will be taxed in ten years. Halifax, I know, is a little jealous of St. John, but that has always been the way. Some hon. gentlemen in this House found fault with me because I said the harbour of Halifax sometimes froze up.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I did not name St. John at all.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Some hon. gentleman said the harbour of Halifax was never frozen. I have driven across the harbour on the ice on two occasions. Now, the harbour of St. John is never frozen—cannot be frozen.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro)—Does the hon. gentleman say that he drove across the harbour of Halifax on the ice ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Yes, I assert it—I drove across it on the ice.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro)—I must take the hon. gentleman's word.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman must accept it. I say I drove across the harbour of Halifax on the ice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The harbour of Halifax has been frozen over twice in fifty years and the hon. gentleman happened to be there on both occasions.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I hope I shall always be present on such occasions, because it gave me great pleasure to see the numerous vehicles driving on the ice and hear the ringing of the sleigh bells.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I have been in Halifax in the coldest weather every winter for the last twenty or twenty-five years, and I have never seen persons crossing the ice on foot.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There is a difference between the hon. gentleman and the hon. member from Halifax, who says that the harbour has been frozen over on two occasions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In fifty years.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman admits that it occurred twice within his own knowledge. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Black), who is a much older man and who has attended the meetings of the legislature in Halifax, has never heard of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps the hon. gentleman is speaking of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—No, not of Quebec; however, let that all go. I say that in ten or fifteen years, from my knowledge of that country, it will be pouring out exports. Not that Halifax will be jealous of St. John or that St. John will be jealous of Halifax. It will be more than both of these towns can do to take care of the freight that will come down and afford proper facilities for it in the harbour. Some hon. gentlemen have said that if after thorough consideration it is found that the Intercolonial will answer all purposes no sensible man would ask to have a road built through central New Brunswick—because I believe that was the demand from Nova Scotia that it should not go down the river St. John because it might take the trade from St. John instead of giving it to Halifax. Moncton is some 80 miles from St. John and 120 miles from Halifax, and naturally St. John would get her share of the trade and you could not get that trade away from the port. I take a liberal view of the matter, and I do not think my hon. friend is adding to the genearl information of the country or helping the government or the people of the country to build up the west. English money is pouring in and people are coming in from all directions, because people look upon the west as a marvellous producer. All that the western country produces is sent to Europe, and although my hon. friend has thrown out a suggestion that the production is so small that it will be fifteen years before there is any appreciable effect on the Intercolonial Railway, which according to his doctrine will be the highway, I cannot agree with him that 25 per cent on the cost of construction of the proposed road through central New Brunswick would place the Intercolonial Railway in such a position that it would answer all requirements. In the first place you cannot double-track that line of railway, 1,800 miles long, you cannot build bridges and lay road-beds on $5,000,000. I do not think any railway would advance the proposition that even $25,000,000 would put the Intercolonial in proper order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in the province of Quebec the bed of the road is secured for two tracks.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I say in my place here, as coming from New Brunswick, and there are other hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick sharing the same opinion—that we will not allow the bald statement to be published that the intercolonial Railway is in jeopardy and would receive any advantage by taking it out of the hands of the people to place it in the hands of any one corporation. I limit it to one corporation. I will put it this way: it could be made useful by three corporations. It could be run by a commission, and run without loss; I should be willing to join with my hon. friend in the endeavour to see whether there would be any thing in such a proposition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman want a rival line ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It would not be a rival line in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax). My first duty is to express my emphatic denial of the statement about the harbour of Halifax being in ruins. I have been a resident of Halifax for 30 years, and during the most of that time I may say a week never passed without my visiting the front part of the city and seeing the steamers running up and down. I do not wish to say anything unkind about the troubled waters of St. John, because it is impossible that they should freeze. They are troubled up and down all the time and are never at rest. It is evident that we are not the representatives of the people, that we are not the representatives of the province of Nova Scotia, otherwise some of the utterances which have been made here to-day would not have been made. If my hon. friend from Cumberland ever expected to appeal to the people he would not have spoken so unkindly and so discouragingly about the new line of railway. The representatives from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have watched this subject with keen interest before the railway committee, and we were given the assurance that this new line would be built; and I hope the government will carry out that assurance. I have no doubt that they will. I think it is taking a discouraging view of the subject to hold that the opening of this road is not going to open up a new part of the country that is going to be serviceable both for lumbering and for settlement also, and it is creating a discouraging view about the growth of the produce from the west for the next few years. I believe the new road in 20 years will require to be double-tracked from Quebec to Moncton, and then the Intercolonial from Moncton to Halifax and St. John. We have very narrow ideas of the future progress and prosperity of this country if we suppose that the Intercolonial Railway in its present condition, or an improved condition, would be sufficient to carry the traffic that would be offered to it. The Intercolonial Railway was to some extent a political hack up to the year 1896. It was not, in the first place, built in the proper location. Sir Charles Tupper, from considerations which it is not necessary to mention, wanted to have the road built up near the coal mines, and Hon. Peter Mitchell who is dead and gone, wanted the railway to be constructed near the lumber mills about Newcastle, and in that direction. I think I have the authority of Sir S. Fleming for stating that if he had been free to locate that road, it would not be in its present location. He made the statement that from Moncton to Amherst, say about 90 miles, perhaps not as much as 90 miles, the road could be shortened 12 miles. If the new road from Quebec to Moncton will be 90 miles shorter, that is a matter of great importance. What is wanted on the Intercolonial Railway is to lower the grades. The grades and curves are not favourable even to the present traffic. An eminent engineer stated to me that the powerful engines at present in use on that road would have to go to the repair shop in about ten years, whereas they would have run for 20 years or more if the road had been levelled and the heavy grades taken out. All I have to say is that I know public opinion in the province of Nova Scotia, perhaps as well as any representative of that province, and that public opinion is certainly in favour of the new line being built ; and it will look to the government to carry out their promises in the future as they have done in the past.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. Secretary of State was about to rise on one or two occasions, and we should certainly like to hear from the government what their intentions are under the circumstances. I think the House and the country are indebted to the hon. gentleman from Halifax for bringing the subject before the House. I have not yet read the report from which he quoted, and consequently cannot speak positively as to its contents.

But what the hon. gentleman read verifies to a great extent the position taken by the opposition when this question was before the House. I might say parenthetically that I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the Intercolonial Railway at the present moment; we should confine ourselves to the subject before the House. It was contended when the matter was previously before the House, that so little was known of the route upon which the new road was to be built from Lévis or Quebec to Moncton, that it was altogether impolitic to pledge the country to the construction of that road until more could be learned of the character of the country and also the length of the road. Now to my surprise in the report which has just been read, Mr. Butler, who I know stands very high in his profession, states that the portion of the road from Quebec or Point Lévis to Moncton is some ten miles longer than the Intercolonial, notwithstanding the roundabout manner in which the latter has been constructed. That is very important. Those who have paid any attention to the subject will remember that the premier in his propositions made for the construction of that road stated that it would be from 80 to 125 miles shorter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—120 to 140 miles.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—However, that there may be no mistake in that matter, I will read that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. It was contended by those who were opposing the scheme at the time that no evidence had been laid before either branch of parliament to justify a statement of that kind. In discussing the question, I pointed out that there was a proposition for building a road from one section on the Intercolonial Railway—I forget the name of the locality now—to tap it at another point, which would save from 50 to 60 miles; and the statement at the time was—and I believe it was generally believed by many who opposed the granting of that charter—that it was a scheme for the purpose of making money for the promoters, and that the road would be sold to the government ultimately in order to accomplish the object which they had in view. I remember the view which I expressed to the House at the time was that it would be much better for the government to spend about $2,000,000, which we supposed it would cost to shorten the road and lower the gradients, rather than spend $16,000,000 to build what was supposed to be a shorter road from Quebec to Moncton. It is a matter of gratification to those who took the position we did upon that point to hear the remarks made by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and who formerly supported the government in their proposition. I was very much pleased by the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Cumberland (Hon. Mr. Black). Whether we act upon it or not, I am not going to take any particular credit to myself for having done it—it is the correct principle that should actuate the Senate. The hon. gentleman from Victoria, N.S., said it was a good thing that the hon. gentleman had not to appeal to a constituency, or he would not have given utterance to the sentiments which he did. That is the reason why there is a Senate, in order that hon. gentlemen shall give expression to opinions which they believe to be in the interests of the country independent of the party to which they belong or to which they are opposed; and if we would all act upon that principle a great deal more than we have done in the past, it would be better for the country and more creditable to the Senate. I am glad the hon. gentleman from Halifax has acted in that spirit in bringing the matter before the Senate. I will read an extract from the premier's utterances when he introduced the measure in the House of Commons on the 20th July. It will be found on page 7662 of the official report of that date. The right hon. gentleman said:

If it were possible to have a line of railway in a direct course from Lévis to Moncton it would be possible, I believe, without any exaggeration, to abridge the distance almost one-half, but, unfortunately, and I say it frankly to the House, it is not possible to have an absolutely direct line, or the shortest line possible between Moncton and Lévis, and if you will know the reason you will find it by a glance at the map, and you will find it in the blunder that was made by British diplomacy in settling our boundary line, by the Ashburton-Webster treaty. No one can look at that map without feeling a sentiment of anger, almost akin to indignation. But it is no use to go back to what has been done. We have to take facts as they are, we have to submit to the inevitable and to the fact that the boundary line of the state of Maine has been projected through our territory within a distance of about forty-five miles of the St. Lawrence. We have to follow the line of the state of Maine, and following that line we believe we can abridge the distance between Moncton and Lévis by from 120 to 140 miles.

That is the basis upon which the hon. premier at the time urged upon the parliament of Canada the construction of this line. So far as this interim engineering report shows, the estimate made by the premier has not been realized, and in view of the fact that the distance, if the report of Mr. Butler be correct, so far as they made a survey, is actually longer than the route by the Intercolonial Railway, it is well that the government should call a halt before spending money upon the construction of that road. As there is power given in the contract, I take it for granted that the government will, when these facts are laid before them, act upon the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Cumberland and the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I do not propose to enter into a discussion as to the reasons which induced the government to build the Intercolonial Railway upon the route upon which it was constructed. That has been discussed here almost every year for the last thirty years. Those who are conversant at all with the facts know the reason and the difficulties that present themselves, but I say that if the shortening of the Intercolonial Railway by forty or fifty miles can be accomplished by the expenditure of a million or two millions and save the expenditure of sixteen millions in order to reach——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Twenty millions, the hon. gentleman says.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The estimate of the government was $16,000,000, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax says it would run up to $20,000,000. I have no doubt it would. That was predicted some time ago. If by the shortening of the Intercolonial Railway you can reach the objective point, Moncton, by a line fifty miles shorter than the present route, and save the expenditure of constructing that road, it is the policy that should be adopted. I am not going into the question of whether St. John or Halifax is the best winter port. Long experience has taught the whole of us, I think, that St. John is the only available port in winter, if you are to consider distance and the expense of getting there. Instead of going to Moncton, this route ought to run down the valley of the St. John by Chipman until you reach that point.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know that for 25 years we were fighting the battle of the winter port, and it was a contest between these two points. Now, as senators representing the whole Dominion, we should cease to think of our discussing the question of localities. Until the Canadian Pacific Railway bought their short line and constructed the shortest route to get to St. John, we never had anything even approximating a winter port, but since that time a line of steamers was subsidized by the government of which I was the head at the time. Through that line of steamers, and by the aid of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the shortening of that line, we have had to a certain extent a winter port, and with further facilities and a little more aid I believe we can have a port there the whole year round. Whether the harbour fills up and empties itself every 24 hours, I do not know.

An hon. MEMBER—Twice every 24 hours.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it does not take so long for ships to enter the harbour and get away again. I have no doubt about the propriety of the course suggested, and I can only again express the hope that it will be acted upon. Parliament has affirmed the principle of a second Transcontinental Railway. The people have approved of that principle, and have returned the Liberal party to power. Now, let us try and have that line built in the most profitable way for the country. The great west may not progress in wealth as my hon. friend says it will. While it may be a long time before it can show as much wealth as the province of Ontario, I believe the time is not far distant when it will exceed the population, and as it exceeds it in population so it will exceed it in the volume of its products. As that western country cannot consume all that it will produce, it is necessary that we should have not only the most feasible but the most practical and cheapest possible way of getting at the product of that country at every season of the year in order that it may be shipped to Europe, and I believe that so far as the present routes through Ontario are concerned, St. John is the best port in Canada for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think we have sufficient information before the Senate at the present moment to come to any final conclusion, I have no objection to the address being carried. All I can do is to call the attention of my colleagues to views the senators have expressed on both sides of the House.

The motion was adopted.

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to:

Direct the attention of the government to the present financial position of the different provinces with a view to establish and strengthen their claims to a readjustment of the financial terms arranged when they became federated thirty-eight years ago under the name of the Dominion of Canada.

The revenue of the year following the federation was a little over thirteen millions, and the population about three millions five hundred thousand.

The conditions applicable at that time are no longer so. The increase in population, the expansion of commerce, and the consequent requirements of the provinces for education, the administration of justice, the necessity for hospitals and homes for the poor, and many other charges, all point to the justice and necessity for the readjustment of the present financial conditions not being delayed.

I now produce a comparative statement of the population, revenue, subsidies and the per capita contribution of the seven provinces to the Dominion, including a comparison of the subsidies to be paid the new provinces with that paid the other older provinces :

Ontario and Quebec.

For the sake of brevity I have grouped Ontario and Quebec as the most populous and largest revenue producers.

Population last census	3,832,000
Revenue year ending June, 1904	$36,362,315 00
Subsidies	2,426,000 00
Per capita contribution	9 49

Nova Scotia.

Population last census	459,574
Revenue year ending June, 1904	$ 2,786,829 00
Subsidy	432,805 00
Per capita contribution	6 07

New Brunswick.

Population last census	331,120
Revenue year ending June, 1904	$ 1,717,257 00

I have taken the revenue of the Northwest Territory for the year ending June, 1904, at $898,464, without reference to land sales, the proceeds of which may be considered as capital and partly a fund for school purposes.

In this calculation the two new provinces are taken as one.

Subsidies first five years, based on population of 500,000	$2,248 250
Subsidies when the population reaches 800,000	2,200,750
Subsidies when the population reaches 1,600,000	3,315,750
Subsidies when the population reaches 2,400,000, the limit mentioned in the provincial Act	5,080,750

In addition to these subsidies the provinces will have all the provincial taxes.

It will be seen from these figures that the two new provinces for the first five years will receive annually more than the five provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia—by $251,295; although they produce annually a revenue of $11,768,356, and only receive subsidies of $1,996,955.

When the population of the two provinces reaches 800,000 they will receive more than these five provinces by	$ 303,795
When the population of the new provinces reaches 1,600,000 they will receive more than these five provinces by	1,318,795
When the population of the new provinces reaches 2,400,000 they will receive more than the five provinces by	3,083,795
When the population of the new provinces reaches 2,400,000 they will receive annually in excess of Ontario and Quebec	2,654,750
The seven old provinces receive annually subsidies, with a population of over 5,000,000	4,422,000
The new provinces when the population reaches 2,400,000 will receive	5,080,750
Which is more than all the old seven provinces receive by	657,795

Unless a readjustment is had before the population of the new provinces reaches 2,400,000.

British Columbia.

I will now direct attention to the province of British Columbia, and will show that it is the largest revenue producer of the seven provinces, according to population.

The population at the last census was 170,000.

The revenue year ending June, 1904, $3,688,511; equal to $20.60 per head of the population, which is $11 more than Ontario and Quebec, $14 more than Nova Scotia, $15 more than New Brunswick, and $7 more than Manitoba contributes per head.

This province receives an annual subsidy of $308,184; of this sum $100,000 is in lieu of 12,- 000,000 acres of land granted the Dominion in aid of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The said $100,000 should not be charged as a subsidy to the province, as the Dominion receives a large income from the land grant, amounting in the year ending June, 1904, to $112,958, or about 113 per cent. So that the subsidy properly charged to the province is not more than $208,184.

This province contributes to the Dominion revenue $20.60 per head of the population, and receives $1.72.

Commencing with 1885, and up to 1904, the treasury has received from the railway belt in British Columbia, from sales and leases of land, $1,117,817.79. This has paid four per cent interest on the $100,000 annual grant for twenty-three—the last sum on which interest has been paid is $2,300,000—leaving a balance of $13,817 over the interest paid for twenty-three years.

A province which contributes so much is fully entitled to more generous treatment than it has had, and deserves consideration on account of the heavy necessary expenditure for various purposes.

The total provincial expenditure in British Columbia for all services comes to $12.61 per head per annum, whilst the average expenditure of the other six provinces comes to $2.62 per head.

I have not given the cost of collecting revenue and other charges which come to 2⅛ per cent; nor is the other expenditure by the Dominion in the provinces given, this statement being confined chiefly to the contributions controllable by the provinces. Nor is it necessary to deal in detail with the Dominion expenditure, it being sufficient to show the advantageous position of the Dominion to grant substantial increased subsidies to the provinces, and more particularly to British Columbia, whose revenue is so large and subsidy so small—proportionately.

The following statement will show the financial position of the Dominion in June, 1904, exclusive of the public debt:

Revenue..	$70,669,816
Expenditure for all purposes	55,612,832
Surplus..	15,056,984

A portion of which could be well and justly be applied to increasing the provincial subsidies.

I beg to recommend that a commission of nine persons be appointed to consider all questions touching revenue, subsidies, population, local and physical conditions, with authority to consider the special claims of any particular province as may be submitted by its commissioner.

The Dominion government to appoint two commissioners, and each of the seven provinces to appoint one commissioner.

The commission to sit in the city of Ottawa on a day to be named by the Dominion government.

The commission to report its finding and recommendations within sixty days of the first sitting, duplicates of which shall be delivered in written documents over the signature of the chairman of the commission, witnessed by the secretary, to the Dominion and provincial governments.

The Dominion shall appoint a secretary,

All expenses in connection with the commission to be borne in such proportions as the respective governments may deem proper.

And to ask if the Dominion government will agree to such a commission if invited to do so by the respective provincial governments.

He said: When I had the pleasure of bringing up this question two years ago I had the support of the hon. Mr. Speaker and other members of the House, and I hope—although perhaps the Speaker cannot take part in the discussion—that his sympathies and views are with me in this matter. I do not think any one will attempt to say that these terms which were settled or fixed 38 years ago are applicable to the province now. The province has grown in population, and its expenses have increased enormously in the matter of education and in a hundred other ways; so that I think the time has arrived when there should be a rearrangement financially of the relations between the province and the Dominion. I have put down the figures of all the provinces. I do not intend to go over these figures; hon. gentlemen can see them for themselves. I have not placed them on the minutes for any invidious comparison. I have extracted them from the government blue book very carefully, figure for figure. I have taken the customs revenue, inland revenue and post office revenue and any other revenue I found, and I have put them down carefully. Hon. gentlemen can see for themselves the result. I have made a comparison of the new provinces with the old provinces and hon. gentlemen will be surprised when they look at these figures to see the very liberal allowances made to the new provinces. It is true the new provinces have not the land, but they have what is better than the land. They have hard cash; no trouble about surveyors and surveys, no trouble about collecting the money from the land, and they have the taxation of all the land sold. Any government or Canadian Pacific Railway land which has been sold can be taxed by them, which in time will bring them a large amount. Compare the condition of Manitoba with the new provinces. She receives $432,805. Then we are told she has some of the land. Manitoba did get some land from the Dominion, and the revenue last year from all sources, from the land from leases and title deeds and everything of that kind was $444,000. The revenue from the land and the subsidy from the Dominion would altogether amount to $872,000, whereas each of these new provinces get $1,124,125 to commence with. In this calculation the two new provinces are taken as one. The subsidy for the past five years on a calculation of 500,000 population is $2,248,258; when the population reaches 800,000 the subsidy will be $2,300,750. After the first five years $93,750 is taken off the subsidy on account of the cessation of the grant made for public buildings. That is only given for the first five years. When the population of the new provinces reaches 1,600,000 the subsidy will be $3,315,750 and when the population reaches 2,400,000 the limit mentioned in the Provincial Act, the subsidy will be $5,080,750. It will be seen from these figures that the two new provinces for the first five years will receive annually more than the five provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia by $251,295. Although they produce annually a revenue of $11,768,316 they only receive $1,996,955. When the population of the two new provinces reaches 800,000 they will receive more than these five provinces by $305,795 and when it reaches 1,000,000 they will receive $1,318,795 more than the five older provinces.

When the population of the new provinces reaches 2,400,000 they will receive more than the five provinces by $3,083,795. When the population of the new provinces reaches 2,400,000 they will receive annually in excess of Ontario and Quebec, $2,654,750. The seven old provinces receive annually subsidies, with a population of over 5,000,000, amounting to $4,422,000. The new provinces when the population reaches 2,400,000 will receive $5,080,750, which is more than all the old seven provinces receive by $657,895, unless a readjustment is had before the population of the new provinces reaches 2,400,000.

I will now call special attention to British Columbia, and if I am called the champion of that province, I am here for that purpose. I was not placed in the House to be a dummy, but to look after the interests of my province and the Dominion at large. So long as I have health or strength left, I intend to follow that course. I want to give the hon. Secretary of State a very pleasant surprise. When I brought up this question last year and told the hon. gentleman he had given away land in the railway belt of British Columbia, the hon. gentleman said that it was all rocks and of no value. The figures which I have given in my notice show that in the last 23 years it has produced $1,117,850. Now that shows that the railway belt has paid the allowance given to British Columbia in lieu of the land, so that really that allowance should not be charged against us, because we have been paying it back year after year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When British Columbia came into the confederation the terms that we granted to her were exactly similar to the terms granted to every other province of the Dominion. One of the principal reasons that British Columbia has not received as large a proportion as other provinces is due to the fact that until lately the population was small. British Columbia came into the union in 1871 and the population then was 36,247; in ten years, it had only increased by 13,000. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway led to a more rapid increase of population. Then, in addition to that, British Columbia gets in compensation for her lands, $100,000 a year. My hon. friend has dropped that little item. I will show from the Auditor General's Report what British Columbia gets from the Dominion. First, allowance for government, $35,000. Now in proportion to population the allowance for government is larger than either Alberta or Saskatchewan will receive. The subsidy of 80 cents per head of the actual population at the end of each decennial census is precisely the same as the other provinces receive. The compensation for lands given to the Canadian Pacific Railway is $100,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We pay that back again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no, you get $100,000 out of that. You do not take into account the cost of management, which is very considerable. Then you get on the debt allowance interest at 5 per cent on the balance of debt on which you came into the Dominion, just as the other provinces are receiving. That was increased in 1884. British Columbia is really one of the richest provinces of the Dominion. Her timber lands are very valuable, and the agricultural lands in her valleys are probably as rich as any in the world. They are being utilized now for growing fruit. It has been found that they can produce fruit equal to any grown in the Dominion or even in California. The reason British Columbia is hard up is because of her extravagance; the people will not look at a copper coin. If you offer such coin in Victoria or Vancouver, they refuse it. They will take nothing less than a five cent piece.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is the same in all the country west of Lake Superior.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If British Columbia had been as economical as Prince Edward Island for instance, which takes all the coppers and is glad to get them, it would be the wealthiest province in the Dominion. British Columbia would be the richest of all the provinces, if the government of the province exercised proper economy in the management of their affairs. Take as an illustration the extreme liberality with which they have given away valuable lands. Take the Crows' Nest concession; I have forgotten the number of acres granted, but a vast area of the most valuable lands on this continent was given away as a subsidy to the railway, and I do not know but that some cash was given in addition. You have made a lot of millionaires by it no doubt. If British Columbia chooses to be as extravagant as the history of the past shows she has been, necessarily she wants a larger subsidy, but I doubt whether the people of Canada are prepared to give a larger amount per capita to British Columbia than to any other provinces. It would not be reasonable or fair. Of course if any new arrangement is made hereafter with the provinces, British Columbia will be treated on the same basis as every other province but at the present time my hon. friend can scarcely hope that we will issue a commission for the special purpose of inquiring into the question whether British Columbia has been extravagant or economical.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Right Hon. the Premier, when some member brought up a similar question to this in the other House, said he thought a readjustment would be necessary in a short time. Of course British Columbia was extravagant in land grants. That has been the history of every young country. Look at Australia, where millions of acres of land were given away to the sheep farmers, and now they have to take them back. It has been the same in Ontario and the east where clergy and other reserves have been granted freely. British Columbia is not alone in that respect. We are not more extravagant than the other provinces. If we ask for money it is part of our own money. We are entitled to every consideration, and I hope we shall receive it.

THE ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WOOD inquired:

What has been the result of the experiment of landing the English mails at Sydney, Cape Breton?

How much time can be saved under ordinary conditions in the delivery of mails at Montreal and other commercial centres in Canada and the United States, by landing mails at Sydney instead of Rimouski?

Will the government make further experiments with this route?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—While the experiment has certain interesting features, so many incidents have occurred that were not expected or provided for, that no conclusion can be drawn as yet as to the possibility of delivering mails with regularity at an earlier date then heretofore. The only thing that has been pretty well demonstrated is that there will be no difficulty, I think, in carrying the mails from Sydney to Montreal well within 24 hours.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to:

Call the attention of the government to the necessity of giving due consideration to any contract they may enter into, for the purpose of securing a more powerful ice-breaking steamer for the maintenance of winter communication with Prince Edward Island, and to inquire whether the new boat will be available for service next winter.

He said: This notice expresses all that is necessary for me to say; but I will just add this, that there is $175,000 voted in the estimates of the present year for procuring an additional boat to navigate the straits of Northumberland. What I want to impress on the government is that in procuring this boat they should not limit themselves to any particular sum, but while they are about it get the best, the most modern and powerful boat that can be procured for the purpose of ice-breaking. About eighteen years ago the steamer 'Stanley' was placed on the route by the former government. That steamer has done some wonderful work indeed. About five years ago the present government put on another boat called the 'Minto,' built on the same lines, to a large extent, as the 'Stanley,' and she has also done good work; but there was not that improvement in the 'Minto' over the 'Stanley' that twelve years should have brought about. It seems that all they did was to copy the 'Stanley,' and not very successfully either, because, although the 'Minto' is a much more powerful and larger boat and has more horse-power, she is scarcely as good an ice-breaker as the 'Stanley,' although the latter has her boilers reduced after eighteen years of very hard work in the ice. A boat has recently been built on the Clyde for the Russian government, called the 'Ernack,' and there are reports I think well authenticated, of the wonderful operations of that steamer. I want to impress on the government that when they are procuring another boat, which ought to be procured, without any doubt, they should look well into what is being done in ice-breaking in other parts of the world, and procure if possible a powerful boat that will solve the question of winter communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I may say that wonderful things have been done by these winter steamers, things that would have been regarded twenty years ago as absolutely impossible. It is true that last winter there was a very serious failure, but the conditions were abnormal. Such a winter the oldest inhabitants never saw. The cold was intense and the storms were frequent during the greater part of the winter. Leaving last winter out of the question, these two steamers have done wonderful things in effecting communication between the mainland and Prince Edward Island, and they have established a conviction in the minds of a great many people that there are possibilities in that connection, by putting on a much more powerful boat than either of these have been, or a boat with a better design, such as the 'Ernack.' I want to warn the government before they expend this money not to be satisfied with getting a boat that will be merely something like the other two boats we had. It will be throwing money away. These two boats, as far as they go, are doing very well, but what is wanted is a more powerful boat than either of them. My hon. colleague from Montague, I am sorry to see, is not in the House at this moment, but if he were here he would be able to state the views of Captain Brown, the captain of the 'Stanley.' Those views are in the line of my observations and, if I understand my colleague right, Captain Brown is of opinion that a boat of 6,000 or 7,000 horse-power ought to be procured, and that a boat of that power would be almost certain to effect the desired object. That is his opinion after having had many years' experience of navigating the straits as captain of the 'Stanley.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman has himself called attention to a point that I was going to make; that is to say, that there was a vote in the estimates for the purpose of obtaining a better service. He has also mentioned the fact that the conditions of last winter were extraordinary, as was very well seen from the extremely prolonged blockade on the mainland. It is hoped that it will not be repeated for a considerable term of years. I shall convey the hon. gentleman's views to the government. I may say that I am myself of his opinion that this is not a case in which a trifling sum of money should be allowed to interfere with procuring better communication.

SUPERINTENDENT OF INSURANCE AND DIRECTOR GENERAL OF PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (200) An Act respecting the Superintendent of Insurance and Director General of Public Health.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time at the next sitting of the House. He said: Those two gentlemen, Mr. Fitzgerald, of the Department of Finance, and Dr. Montizambert, are in the position of deputy heads of departments and they want to be recognized as having the status of deputy heads. It carries no money with it.

The motion was agreed to.

FALSE REPRESENTATIONS TO IMMIGRANTS BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 120) An Act respecting false representations to induce or to deter immigration.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time at the next sitting of the House. He said: The title of the Bill explains itself. As hon. gentlemen will have noted by newspaper reports, parties leaving Europe have been brought to Canada under misrepresentation, and it is for the purpose of punishing, if we can reach them, the parties who mislead emigrants coming to Canada by making false representations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think there will be any particular objection to the Bill, but I am very much inclined to think that the misrepresentations which have been made to mislead emigrants are much exaggerated. No doubt some immigrants come to this conntry, as there always have been ever since I can remember, who do not find half sovereigns about the streets waiting to be picked up and they have growled and grumbled at the representations made to them, but as to there being any real ground for a grievance I doubt very much. I am not prepared to say that the Bill may not be all right, making it an offence to do anything of the kind mentioned, but at the same time we should be very careful how far we legislate in restricting immigration for which we are paying so large a sum. We are doubling and quadrupling what we used to pay for immigration, and no law should be put on the statute-book which would have the effect of deterring available and proper persons from coming to the country. I believe the Labour Council and the manufacturers have come to an understanding and neither of them has any objection to the measure, but I am afraid it will lead to a good deal of trouble in the future in the way of fancied wrongs which will lead to litigation and trouble. However, if the government are willing to accept the responsibility I have no objection.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—While I entirely agree with my hon. friend that there has been gross exaggeration as to the extent of these representations, there is a particular class of misrepresentation which may be reached through this Bill, which I think he will agree with me it is desirable we should endeavour to prevent. It has come to our knowledge that some people in England have been inducing men of more or less means to come out here under the pretense that they would receive certain advantages and be educated in a particular way here for the purpose of taking up farms. This has been practically a swindle, and it may perhaps be reached by this legislation in a better way than under the ordinary procedure for obtaining money under false pretenses. Some very curious cases of that kind have come to the notice of the Emigration Department.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called I want to call the attention of the government to what has been done, and what has not been done, of late. I have several times asked the hon. Secretary of State to be good enough to produce the return to an address that was voted on the 11th April, which was as follows:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all despatches, letters, telegrams and other correspondence and communications received by the Department of Public Works, or any officer thereof, or by any department of the government, or by any officer thereof, from the Honourable Senator Philippe Auguste Choquette in any way relating to lot 4438-A of the official plan and book of reference of Montcalm ward, of the city of Quebec, and to the purchase thereof by His Majesty King Edward VII, and of all despatches, letters, telegrams and other correspondence and communications sent by any and all such departments and officers to the Honourable Senator Choquette relating thereto; also copies of all plans, if any, filed for the purpose of expropriating said lot in the registration division wherein said lot is situate, and copies of any other expropriation proceedings authorized or required by law to be followed in connection with the expropriation of lands for public purposes and which in any way relate to the lot aforesaid;

copies of all appointments of valuators regarding said lot; copies of all applications for the appointment of such valuators, and of all correspondence, letters and telegrams relating to such appointments; and copies of any valuations of said lot made by any valuators; copies of all Orders in Council relating to said transactions and to the purchase of said property; copies of all deeds, powers of attorney, reports and Orders in Council executed, made or passed relating to the purchase or acquisition of said lot by His Majesty King Edward VII.

I have asked the hon. Secretary of State and he has promised several times, to bring down that return. He asked me for a memorandum, and I gave him one. Then when I asked for the return he asked for another memorandum, and I gave him another. Last Saturday I called the attention of his hon. colleague to the necessity of bringing down that return. For three months I have been asking for it, and if I cannot get it in any other way, I will keep the House here until it is produced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have asked for it repeatedly. On Saturday I asked Mr. Pope to go himself and see about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister must realize the expense it will be to the country if I have to keep the House here two or three days more. I must have that return before leaving Ottawa.

TRADE WITH ARGENTINA.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I wish to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to an article in 'Events,' in the hope that the government may before long be in a position to promote trade with Argentina. The article is as follows :

The marvellous material, economic, educational and social development of North America has blinded the eyes of a goodly portion of its citizens to an appreciation of what is going on beyond its borders. They often rant about European interest in South America and European effort to surpass us in the competition for South American trade and friendship, without remembering that European nations, merchants and travellers know far more about South America than we do and expend treble our effort to build up closer relations of commerce and comity.

A summarized statement of some facts about Argentina confirm these premises and conclusions. The Argentine Republic, as it is named, is to-day one of the most prosperous and progressive countries. Its foreign commerce for 1904 reached the immense total of $451,463,000 in gold. This was greater than that of any other Latin nation, not excepting Mexico and Brazil. It exceeded the foreign trade of Japan, of whose marvellous progress we now hear so much, and it went far beyond that of China, concerning which there is general discussion. In other words Argentina, with only 5,000,000 people, showed a buying and selling capacity in excess of Japan with 40,000,000 people, and China with 400,000,000. My comparison is no reflection on these latter countries, and I have always been an earnest advocate of the importance of our commercial and political interests in the far east, but these should not overshadow or hide what we have at stake in South America.

That Argentina is moving with proverbial leaps and bounds is provided by the fact that her foreign commerce, the best thermometer of a country's prosperity, increased $90,000,0000 in 1904 over the total for 1903, which was $360,000,000. Estimating her population, as before stated, at 5,000,000, she has in the present total of $451,463,000 the remarkable average of nearly $90 per head, or a far greater average than the United States or any of the principal European countries. If this lusty young giant of South America keeps progressing at this rate, it will be difficult to estimate her trade and wealth when she has a population of 25,000,000.

I bring the matter to the notice of hon. gentlemen in case there may be something done to encourage trade with that country.

TUBERCULOSIS COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—If hon. gentlemen will refer to page 692 of the journals of the Senate, they will find that after a joint report had been presented and agreed to, the Senate appointed a committee to act with another committee of the House of Commons, but the House of Commons has not made any return of the acceptance of that suggestion. They have adopted the report, striking out the 7th section, which was a section recommending the expenditure of money, as it was held by the Speaker of that House that the recommendation should not be made; and now in view of the decision of the Speaker what is to be done? I should not like to be committed to the tower in this warm weather at this period of the session. Has the committee a right to wait upon the government in view of the fact that the House of Commons did not make any return? I refer to the Tuberculosis Committee, and I have a note from the secretary that we are to meet in the tower room at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the report had been adopted with the exception of the paragraph which recommended the expenditure of money. My recollection is that that was struck out.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—They have not concurred in our suggestion for a joint committee to present the address.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Have they refused, or merely neglected to take action?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I understand, not speaking authoritatively on that point, that it is not the practice for a committee of that House to wait on the government with an address of this character. Addresses are made in a different way in that chamber. I should like to know whether it is safe for the committee to go.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that arrangements have been made with the right hon. Prime Minister for the committee to be received to-morrow at 10.30, and the only difficulty I see is that the House of Commons have neglected to appoint a committee. They may appoint a committee. At any rate that would not prevent the committee carrying out the directions of this honourable House so far as presenting a report which has been adopted by this House, whether it be done jointly with the other House or not. Supposing that they appointed a committee for the purpose and that members of the committee failed to attend, would it prevent the committee appointed by this House carrying out the wishes of this House?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think there is more than that in the position. It is a question of courtesy in the relations between the two Houses. If a message is sent to the House of Commons surely we should hear something of it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is not the question raised by the hon. senator.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are in the position now of people waiting for an answer.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Will it be safe to attend? That is the only question.

Mr. SPEAKER—I do not suppose that this is a question for the Speaker to decide. The Senate has adopted a resolution conveying a message to the Commons and it is in order for the Senate to decide by motion what they will do.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand there was a clause recommending that there should be an appropriation by parliament and it is on account of that that they declined.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did they not say so?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (69) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said I would take the opportunity when the House was going into committee to make some remarks upon this subject, but upon reflection I shall forego that right, and when speaking on the different clauses I shall take the opportunity to reply to some of the remarks by some hon. gentleman recently.

The motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I believe that this clause might be made a little clearer. It has been contended in this House by some hon. gentlemen that this does not take away any rights which belong to some classes of persons, in the new provinces. I therefore move that the following proviso be added to the clause:

> Provided always that no provision of the present Act shall be construed to restrict in any way the rights and privileges heretofore granted to any class of persons in the North-west Territories.

I believe with this proviso there will be no difficulty, and the clause will be clearer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The opinions expressed in this amendment have been the subject of discussion for about five months. I do not think it would be profitable to re-open it, as no possible good can come of it. It is quite clear that this is not germane to this particular clause but to another one. it is a compromise arrived at with the approval of the representatives of the two provinces, and it would be very unfortunate if we were to take up the discussion here with a view of making any changes. The opinion of this chamber was expressed in a decided vote given on the second reading of the Bill, because practically that is the only controversial clause in the whole Bill, and I say clearly that the proposition should not be accepted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY--Do I understand that the government have decided to refuse any amendment whatever to the Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not any amendment based on sound policy. That amendment is not based on sound policy, because the clause is founded on a policy which has been adopted after the fullest inquiry and discussion, and after the various parties had agreed on it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand from the Secretary of State that it is not a sound policy for the parliament to adhere to the rights and privileges which have been bestowed upon the minority. We are told it is not a sound policy. What is asked by this amendment ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would it not be better to discuss it when we come to the proper clause.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, we will discuss it now. We can discuss that amendment with clause 17, if the government agree to do that. But if not, we will not deprive ourselves of the right to consider this clause now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not germane to clause 17.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will make it germane. I will ask the hon. gentleman or any member of this House if they are willing to infringe on the rights of the minority and are willing to take away what has been already given. If so let them vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—This provision would crystallize into the constitution all rights and privileges arising from any ordinances that are now in force in the Northwest, which would lead us into an absurdity. A class of persons may have rights or privileges granted to them, which are in no way germane to what my hon. friend has in his mind; but these would be crystallized into the constitution by this amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I believe the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry is completely mistaken. The object of the amendment is not to crystallize into law all the ordinances which were passed, but I say that by this amendment all the rights possessed by any class of persons which have been created by law, are to be maintained. That is the only object of the amendment, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should be mistaken. For instance there are not only the educational conditions which exist. There is also the case of the language. By the Act of 1875 the French language was permitted in the Northwest Territories and the only aim of this amendment is with reference to the French language, and the clause relating to education.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am surprised at the hon. gentleman from Lauzon who is generally judicious, and knows what he is about. But I scarcely think he realizes the effect of his amendment. The fact is this might involve any sort of absurdity. For instance at certain times there were certain privileges accorded to the Northwest Mounted Police. This amendment would crystallize those, and take them from under the jurisdiction of parliament for ever afterwards. In the same way, there were dealings with the Indians in the Northwest Territories and if we adopt the amendment, the law with respect to Indians must remain as it is and there can be no alteration. The hon. gentleman must see that this is not the place to make the amendment, and as to the suggestion that he has made now that it applies only to the language—it does seem to me while I admire the beautiful language of France, I think inasmuch as the speakers of that language are only about 4 per cent of the population of the Northwest Territories, that it is not reasonable that the legislature should be put to the expense of duplicating their proceedings. The Germans and Russians have I think really as strong and practical a claim as the French in the Territories, and I think if amendments are to be moved in connection with educational matters, the better way would be to move them to the 17th clause when we come to that.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. gentleman seems to be quite mistaken about the Russians and those coming from other European countries. There are two classes in this Dominion who have rights which others have not, the British race and the French Canadians. The French Canadians have rights because they were the first occupants of the soil, and the discoverers and pioneers of the country, so that they have the right to have their privileges respected. As to the British race, they have also the right to their language, having taken the country by arms; but as to all others they have no right at all. They came here knowing that this is a British country. They must know, or they should know, when they come here, what are the laws of the country, and they must come here prepared to submit to those laws. Consequently they cannot claim any rights for their language. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Bolduc) would meet the objection of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) and the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), if he were to add to his motion: 'with regard to schools or languages.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Although not prepared to vote for the amendement, I as one coming from the province of Quebec, hesitate very much to accept the argument placed before the House and country by Hon. Mr. Power, as regards the privileges and rights demanded by the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Bolduc.) The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), as the hon. senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Bernier) says, has no right to put our French Canadian people on the same plane as the Doukhobors or Russians or any other class who have been introduced into this country. That is not a proper thing to do. Let our friends representing the French Canadians make their fight, but let us not tell them that they are on the same plane with these people. I heartily endorse the sentiments put forth by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, although I am not supporting the amendment; but in view of the fact that the statement has been made that they have no more right than the Doukhobors and Russians, I must say that I disagree with that statement. Our people speaking the French language are entitled to more rights than they are.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not take exception to the object which the hon. gentleman has in view, but I take exception to the form of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—So do I.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is his right to propose any amendment and it will be for us to support it or vote against it. We have a right to expect that the amendment which he proposes will carry out in terms the object which he has in view, but an amendment of that kind will have the effect of crystallizing, as I have said, languages which we dare not crystallize.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is very fertile in expedients when amendments are suggested, and I thought he would have some amendment ready.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I will content myself by voting against it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Inasmuch as the hon. gentleman is not prepared with an amendment, I move that the following words be added to the amendment: 'In matters of education and language.' That will bring the amendment quite up to date, and it should be acceptable to him as a French Canadian. He surely will not record his vote against an amendment designed to perpetuate in the Northwest the use of his mother tongue.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I am prepared to accept the amendment. I go further; if the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry has anything to add to make the amendment clearer, and render its passage easier, I have no objection to changing my amendment, providing the change will leave the effect unaltered.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman accept the amendment?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because it is an absurdity?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; not by any means an absurdity.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Question, question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman wants to prevent me speaking, he is losing his time. The question will be put when I have done. I do not want to be threatened, and if any one threatens me I will speak until to-morrow morning. This Bill occupied the time of the House of Commons for five months, and I want to have a little time to discuss it here. We have liberty of speech in this House, and I will not submit to any attempt to choke off discussion. We have a government here that will not allow that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We understand the hon. gentleman is ready to carry out his threat.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I made no threat. The question is this : Have the government decided to resist all amendments proposed here ? If that is their policy, if they have decided that we cannot amend or improve the Bill in any way, we may as well ground arms. Will the government tell us if that is their policy ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I rise to a question of order. I ask that the hon. gentleman be directed to confine himself to the clause now before the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly I shall do so. An amendment has been moved, and the leader of the government has answered by saying that it is an absurdity, and that at this time of the session he would not allow any amendment to be made to the Bill. Did I understand the hon. gentleman aright.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; I did not make use of the word absurdity. I stated a particular policy had been agreed upon by the friends and opponents of the Bill, and I did not think it was wise or prudent for the Senate to undertake to amend it now, because it would not carry in the other House. Of course, when the government submit a Bill to parliament it is open to criticism and amendment at every stage ; and if the opponents of the Bill have a majority, they have, of course, a right to make a change.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am very glad to hear the explanation ; but, if I understand him, the principal objection to any amendment here is that it would not be carried in the other House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is one reason.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we do not need a Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the amendment would be carried in this House either.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That would be settled by the vote ; but if an amendment carried here is not to be accepted by the other House, what is the use of this House?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We would have a conference, as we had before on the Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will try that conference just now.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—An amendment has been moved to which the hon. gentleman has moved an amendment himself, and I should like to hear it put from the chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My amendment has been accepted by the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc).

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hon. gentlemen when called to preside over your deliberations I decided to take no part in the debates nor to register my name on the division list, but this measure is of such permanent importance and has agitated the electorate to such an extent that I deem it my duty to make an exception to the rule I had laid down for my guidance.

Perhaps if I closely analyzed the reasons that prompted me to speak I would find that the determining one is the following : The question which is submitted to us is a very delicate one in more than one of its features and most difficult of a satisfactory solution. The educational clause finds the people irredeemably divided.

Legislation can only be enacted through the action of one of the two political parties which divide public opinion in this country.

Both parties through their leaders have laid down their respective policy on this educational question.

It has been stated by some of our parliamentarians that both of those policies were unacceptable to the Catholic minority and that one belonging to that faith showed very little pride indeed if he accepted by his vote the very small pittance contained in this Bill.

If I have the least doubt as to what is my duty in this connection I would have an easy refuge in eluding all responsibility by abstaining from voting.

Some members of the parliament have even gone further. They have accused of cowardice those who differ with them. It is because I felt that one displays more courage in following the policy of reason which we call in French 'la raison politique' when it is opposed to the popular reason that I have decided to record my vote in the present instance. It will be an easy task, needing no special courage to go to Catholic Quebec and tell its electors: I have asked more freedom for the Catholic minority and greater rights for the French language.

We of this chamber need not the endorsation of the electors but I hold that one owes them an explanation as to what we conscientiously believe to be the right path to follow on such a momentous question.

What are the policies we have to choose between? The Conservative party asks us to enact no safeguards in favour of the minority except the ones to be found in the constitution of 1867. What are those safeguards to be found in that Act? In the same breath the Conservative leaders, Mr. Borden and his friends in the other House and the hon. gentleman from Calgary (the Hon. Mr. Lougheed) in this chamber inform us that the minority has no rights, no protection, whatever, in virtue of that constitution inasmuch as those rights would date from 1870, when the territories were acquired, and they affirm that at that date the minority had no rights that can be preserved to them now.

Hon. gentlemen, even if we disagree with that legal interpretation of the Act of 1867, what would the minority obtain by the adoption of that policy of the Conservative party as a binding guarantee for the future? If the policy prevailed the legislatures of the new provinces would themselves interpret the constitution. If they adopted Mr. Borden's interpretation then the minority would be without any protection whatever. If they accepted the contrary doctrine, propounded by the Minister of Justice and the leader of the government, then the minority would remain with the rights and privileges they enjoy to-day and these are the privileges which would be granted them. At all events nothing less could be given them. It has been stated here that the minority would be better off if solely protected by the constitution of 1867, because then it could claim before the courts the restoration of the rights given them by the Act of 1875. My answer to this pretension is: First, that it is legally untenable. Secondly, that even if it prevailed before the courts it is very doubtful if the minority would be then in a better position than under this Bill—as clearly shown by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry. Third, that the legal interpretation given to the Act of 1867 by Mr. Borden and many of his friends, which would deprive the minority of all rights, would at the same time go before the tribunals with all the risks of the glorious uncertainties of the law. Fourth, that this matter would be unsettled for the next five or ten years to the very great detriment of the country. For these reasons I am unable to accept the policy offered us by the opposition.

Is this Bill acceptable in its present form? I will not preface my answer by discussing our legal or historical rights to a better treatment—speaking always as one of the minority—nor will I ask myself, at this stage, if we could have obtained more from this parliament or the next parliament. I have lived through the agitation this country has just emerged from. I have drawn some lessons from the present crisis. I have realized that in this mixed community one cannot always govern according to his ideals, but in conformity with the conditions that face him. The man who, in this country, adopts as his motto: 'Everything or nothing,' is valueless as a force for good and at times a very dangerous citizen. This Bill contains all that the minority can have and expect from the federal parliament. Of this I am certain.

Has the minority under this Bill, a sufficient measure of protection, a sufficient latitude to be able to conscientiously make use of it? The hon. gentleman from Montarville has answered in the negative and he has stated his reason. He does not want a school that will give the child but half an hour of religious tuition when the ten preceding half hours may have been employed in poisoning his mind with heterodox doctrines. With all due respect to the hon. gentleman I must state that this argument is absolutely worthless because it is foundationless. The Catholics will either be the majority or the minority in a school district. If in a majority they elect the school trustees, if in a minority they have a right to secede and to have a separate school. In both cases they choose through their trustees a Catholic teacher and that Catholic teacher will not poison the mind of his pupils.

The hon. gentleman from Belleville cited with some surprise a law passed under the union of Upper and Lower Canada, the Act of 1843, which provided:

> 2. That where the teacher of any public school was a Protestant a separate Catholic school shall be formed on the application of ten or more freeholders, and vice versa if the teacher was a Catholic.

The hon. gentleman could not understand such a provision and treated it as an absurd one. The seconder of the hon. gentleman's motion for the six months' hoist (Hon. Mr. de Boucherville) understands this enactment thoroughly because it represents the doctrine of the Catholic Church.

This Bill gives the Catholic minority the right to have their children educated by a Catholic teacher and I claim that this privilege contains the essential principle the Catholics contend for. Whatever the books selected by the state may be, I venture to affirm that they can do no harm in the hands of Catholic children if explained and taught by Catholic teachers.

It has been said that half an hour of religious teaching per day was not enough. I will in answer state the fact that to my knowledge the religious tuition in the Catholic separate schools of Montreal is much shorter than the time given by this Bill. I am satisfied that with the measure of protection to be found in this measure the minority will be able to work its own salvation. That is so far as this educational clause is cerned. As to another part of the amendment of my hon. friend from Lauzon which covers the rights that the French-speaking minority in the Northwest may be entitled to, I want to add a few words. The French minority up to 1890 was entitled to the use of the French language in the proceedings of the council or house of assembly and before the tribunals. There was nothing whatever in the Act of 1875 concerning the French language in the schools. The Act of 1890, proposed by Sir John Thompson, gave the power to the Northwest Council to abolish one of the languages, or in other terms to use the language which the council or the assembly should decide upon in the proceedings of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the hon. member forgot to tell us that in 1877 the French language was introduced in the law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In 1890 this parliament gave the right to the council or assembly of the Northwest to do as they pleased as to the language to be used in the proceedings of the House. Taking advantage of this right given by the federal parliament, the French language was abolished in the proceedings of the House. This amendment is not for the purpose of restoring that privilege to the French-speaking population which was abolished in virtue of that law. So that all that remains to-day of the privileges of the French Canadians which they have had up to this day is the right to address the courts in their own tongue. The hon. gentleman wants this privilege maintained by this amendment; that is the extent of the hon. gentleman's demand. By the census of 1901 the French speaking population of the Northwest was found to be 4 per cent. In the last four years hundreds of thousands of people from abroad have invaded those prairies. What is to-day the percentage of the French speaking population in the Northwest Territories? My impression is that it is below 3 per cent. Knowing that the French language has not been once used before the tribunals of the Northwest according to the statements of judges who preside over those tribunals, would it be the part of prudence for our people in the province of Quebec to raise an agitation for the purpose of giving an empty right to their French Canadian brethren in the west? This Bill so far as the educational privileges are concerned gives the minority of the Northwest a chance to live in a way that is quite satisfactory to them; and on the whole I feel that we of French Canadian descent who have many privileges and advantages, to which we are entitled it is true, because of our exceptional situation, should be slow in rushing into the fire for things that are not worth fighting for. Occasions will arise when it will be time for us all, in this chamber, more especially, where we should be the custodians and defenders of the just rights of minorities, to appeal for fair-play, to all of our colleagues from the other provinces on large and important questions. I think that on the whole this Bill as a compromise, should be acceptable and will be acceptable to the province of Quebec and to all men of good will.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I take very grave exception to the manner in which His Honour the Speaker has stated the position of Mr. Borden, of the opposition in the House of Commons, and of myself on this Bill. The hon. gentleman has sought to leave the impression not only upon the minds of this House but upon the public mind that the conclusion arrived at—or, to better state it, the policy arrived at—by the Conservative party, with reference to the intervention of the federal parliament, is owing to the fact that certain opinions exist that the minority have no rights under the constitution, and that therefore we object to the intervention of this parliament in the passage of clause 17. I give an emphatic denial to any such statement. My hon. friend, by the statement of the case made by him, is leaving an erroneous impression on the mind of this House, and endeavouring—I will not say wilfully—to create a public opinion which is contrary to the facts. The position taken by Mr. Borden and those of the House of Commons who supported him and by myself is practically the same position taken by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, practically the position taken by the Minister of Justice in the other House, that section 93 of the constitution makes provision for the conservation of all the rights either of the majority or of the minority, and it is not by reason of the fact that some of us may hold a legal opinion, based on constitutional law, that the rights of the minority may be different from those that are represented by my hon. friend that we support that view of the case. We say positively and without fear of successful contradiction that the British North America Act of 1868, the Act of 1871 and the Act of 1886, all of which are to be construed together as part of the British North America Act—and this is specifically stated in the Act—provide a constitution for these new provinces immediately they are called into existence; that whatever may be the difference of opinion as to what the construction to be placed upon section 93 is—and they are only the differences of lawyers—whatever that difference may be, it must be decided by a judicial tribunal and not by a party majority in a parliament assembled for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion decided upon beforehand. I say it would be fatal for the Conservative members of this body or of the House of Commons to urge that a constitutional interpretation should be placed here on section 93, and I appeal to the sense of justice of my hon. friends on the other side that where a substantial difference exists in regard to the fundamental law, as to what the constitution means, should that interpretation be placed upon it by a political body that has been whipped into line by any political party? I say that no tribunal short of the Privy Council can place a proper interpretation upon that Act, and I say that these two provinces which you are calling into existence by these Bills, will never rest satisfied until the interpretation of the Privy Council, the highest court of the realm, be placed upon it to decide what are the rights of the minority. That is the position which the Conservative party has taken upon this subject, a position which has been practically denied by my hon. friend, and which I take this opportunity of setting right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I did not draw the conclusion that the hon. gentleman was opposed to separate schools. I simply stated that the views held by my hon. friend on the interpretation of section 93 of the British North America Act would have the fatal effect of depriving the minority of all their rights. I do not say because it deprives the minority wholly of its rights, that we should leave the question to the provinces; but as a natural and necessary conclusion, I have spoken as I have.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

SECOND SITTING.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at eight o'clock.

MORNING SITTINGS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that when the House adjourns this evening it do stand adjourned until 11 o'clock to-morrow, the sitting to be from eleven o'clock until one—an independent sitting.

The motion was agreed to.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (69) An Act to establish and provide for the government of Alberta.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to ask the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Bolduc) if the part of his motion referring to education is intended to crystallize into the constitution—as I understand it would do if it was carried—such matters as the rights that pertain to the association of teachers in the Northwest, or such things as may have reference to high schools, or making education compulsory ? I could enumerate a dozen different subjects which would be perpetuated for all time to come by this amendment, because this amendment is altogether general in its language. Therefore I think the same objection applies as in the case of the first amendment. It does not cover as many subjects, but it covers much more than the hon. gentleman intends. I desire to say one word in answer to what the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) said before the adjournment. The hon. gentleman lectured the government for attempting to legislate on what he called a constitutional question, and he tried to give his own interpretation to the constitutional clause. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that that is what he tried to do. I wonder if it occurred to the hon. gentleman that this would apply equally to the hon. leader of the opposition in the House of Commons, when by his first motion he sought to have it declared that the legislature had the exclusive privilege of dealing with education. The only difference is that in one case it was sought to give an interpretation to the constitutional Act which would not be in harmony with the letter or spirit of the constitution. Whereas the interpretation the government has tried to give by the Act now before us is an interpretation which I claim is altogether in accordance with the letter and the spirit of that constitution, and the government is merely following in the footsteps of the legislation passed by parliament in 1875, as I showed the other day. But I may go further, the power which is sought to be exercised by the government by this measure is either within the powers of this parliament or in excess of its powers. If it is in excess of its powers, what would take place ? That part of the Act will be declared ultra vires by the courts, as took place in dozens of instances when the government was presided over by the Conservatives. It is well-known that the late Sir O. Mowat and the Hon. Mr. Blake were employed almost continuously for fifteen years in having Acts of parliament passed by Conservative governments declared illegal and ultra vires of this parliament. Whereas, if it is within the powers of parliament, as I claim it is, the government is merely dicharging a bounden duty in putting a clear construction upon the powers of the minority, which is according to the promises which were made by this parliament in 1875, and which is according to the constitution—and according to the constitution as admitted by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, because he admitted that the intention of the constitution was that section 93 should apply to all the provinces, whereas the interpretation which he is seeking now to have imposed is an interpretation which would in effect have the Act apply as if the constitution applied from 1870, the time that the territories were taken into the union.

It seems to me it is perfectly plain that the objection which is taken by the hon. gentleman has no foundation at all. I wanted to add another word to the member for Lauzon. As far as the language is concerned, I will recall to his mind the following facts: in 1877, it is true this parliament declared that the French language should be one of the official languages in the Northwest; but in 1890, on the vote of the hon. member for Lauzon, and on the vote of several of our friends in this House, power was given to the legislature to change that law, and I find that on a motion moved by the Hon. Mr. Dickey and seconded by the Hon. Mr. Lacoste, the hon. Messieurs Bolduc, de Boucherville, Casgrain, Guevremont, Masson and Robitaille, all leading Conservatives, voted in favour of giving the territorial legislature the power of abolishing the French language; and it was in virtue of that vote that the motion was passed. The only members that voted against it were Armand, Bergeron, Bellerose, Chaffers—he was a Liberal—Girard, McMillan and Paquette, who was also a Liberal.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I voted for the French language.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—After having the French language abolished in 1890 the hon. member wants parliament to go back to that date and reinstate what he helped to destroy at that time.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I do not agree at all with the meaning the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), gives to the amendment which I had the honour to move at the last sitting of this House. But at the same time, as I am very anxious to please the hon. gentleman and would like very much to see him supporting this motion, I will agree to add to my motion, if it will satisfy him, the words, 'according to the Federal Act of 1875 or its amendments.' I may say at the same time that if I voted as he mentions in 1890, it was only giving the right to the council to remove one language or the other from that Assembly—not at all from being used before the courts, because I believe that it is only just and right to permit the poor French Canadians who may be there, and who are not able to speak the English language, to express themselves before the court in the only language they know. I regretted very much a little while ago to hear the hon. member for Halifax saying that if the French had the right to use their language he did not see why the Doukhobors or the Germans should not have the same right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me, I did not say Doukhobors.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Yes, or Galicians or Russians. I will remind hon. gentlemen that the Doukhobors, Russians or Galicians were not the discoverers of that great northwest. The discoverers of the great Northwest were French Canadians and it was French missionaries who began the civilization there. That is why I believe that a little consideration ought to be given to the French element. I was very much surprised at the same time to hear the expression of opinion given by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, as being president of La Societe de St. Jean Baptiste. I thought he would try to favour his compatriots a good deal more than he has done to-night.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from de Salaberry said that the interpretation placed on the Act by the Premier in the House of Commons was not a political interpretation, but that it was a natural explanation coming from the Act itself. I think the hon. gentleman did not read the explanation given by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons. If he had read those explanations he would not have come to this conclusion. The Prime Minister said: 'Here is the Act of 1875. That Act of 1875 grants to the minority separate schools, and to the majority in each school district the schools they think fit,' but, added the Prime Minister, 'since that Act of 1875 was passed, we have had ordinances passed in the Northwest Territories by the legislative assembly of these territories, and what do the ordinances accomplish? They take away the separate schools from Catholics.' The late Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, and the present Minister of Justice, agreed that such ordinances were unconstitutional, and the Prime Minister of this Dominion in reporting the opinion given by Sir John Thompson, said:

'We are now facing this position. You have on one side the Act of 1875 which has not been amended, but on the other hand you have those ordinances, though they may be unconstitutional, to which of them will the British North America Act apply ? Will it apply to the Federation law of 1875, or will it apply to the ordinance of 1901.'

The Prime Minister solved the question. He decreed by this law that the ordinances though unconstitutional, though robbing the Catholics of the Northwest of their rights to separate schools—he decreed that these ordinances should be taken as the basis of the rights to be given to-day to the Catholics of the Northwest, and not the law of 1875. I say that if the British North America Act should apply automatically to-day, the Catholics would be in a far better position in the Northwest than they will be under the law which is presented to us to-day. The Autonomy Bill does away with the rights of the Catholics, and for my part, I would have more confidence in the automatic application of the British North America Act than in the application of the law as it is at present. My hon. friend spoke of the French language. What became law in 1891 was this : Up to 1891 the law of 1877 was the law of the country and read thus : Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the legislative assembly of the territories and in the proceedings before the court, and both these languages shall be used in the records and journals of such assembly, and all ordinances made under this Act shall be printed in both these languages.' Such was the law up to 1891, in that year an amendment was made which was merely a proviso, which read in this way :

Provided, however, that after the next general election the legislative assembly may, by ordinance or otherwise, regulate the proceedings and the manner of recording and publishing the same, and the regulations so made shall be embodied in a proclamation which shall be forthwith made and published by the Lieutenant Governor in conformity with the law and thereafter shall have full force and effect.

What was the effect of this amendment to the law ? It yas simply to permit the legislative assembly of the territories to regulate their own proceedings, to say whether they should be in both languages or in one language. That law was confined to the legislative assembly only ; the right of the people to have their laws printed in both languages, the right of the people to have the ordinances of the Northwest Territories printed in French and to have the French language recognized as an official language in the courts of the country—those rights were maintained ; and what do we see to-day ? We see those rights swept away, and I am sorry to see men like my hon. friend from Mille Isle (Hon. Mr. David) and my hon. friend from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) voting for a law which does away with the French language in the territories. I should have hoped that men who every year parade before the people and make grand speeches before their fellow-countrymen in the city of Montreal, as members of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, as president or ex-president of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, telling them to stick to their language and to their mother tongue, and to all their laws and privileges—I should have hoped that such men would not have taken this course, and I am surprised that following immediately those days of patriotic utterances they should come here and vote against the maintenance of the French language. That is the spectacle we have here to-day. These facts will be recorded and put before the people. Those hon. gentlemen say, 'Oh, we don't need courage to go down to Quebec and to address the people of that province and make patriotic speeches ; no, there is more courage in coming to this House and resisting the government and voting against the government for the maintenance of the French language.' That courage everybody does not possess.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to say a word or two in answer to my hon. friend who has taken his seat. I deny that the invocation of the British North America Act would give anything like the privileges that are conveyed in the Act now before the committee. The invocation of section 93 of the British North America Act would, as the hon. gentleman admits, leave the whole subject to the court.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For interpretation only.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For interpretation. In the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) if I understood him aright, in the course of his argument he spoke, although not very positively, of the territory entering confederation at the time the imperial order in council was passed, transferring the government to Canada; and although he did not say so positively, he intimated and foreshadowed that possibly the British North America Act would apply at that time. If it applied at that time, what rights and privileges do the minority enjoy? There were in the Northwest denominational schools; they have a right to support those schools. They got no aid from the government, they got no outside assistance of any kind. In the fullest interpretation it would give them the right to establish schools and to pay for them. Then if the courts were to hold that the Northwest properly came into confederation at the time it got a provisional system of government,—which was practically under the Act of 1875,—under the Act of 1875 their privileges were very much akin to that. The proviso reads as follows:—

> And further that a minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestants or Roman Catholics, may establish separate schools therein, and in such latter case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to such rates as they may impose upon themselves or to assessments in respect thereof.

That conveys no more than the right to the schools and the right to assess for them —ergo, the right to be exempted from taxation for public schools. That certainly would not give them the privileges and rights that are conveyed under the clause now before the committee.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Is that the Act of 1875?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. It is simply the naked right to assess themselves for their own schools and therefore to be relieved from any assessment for public schools. It conveys no authority or injunction to allot to the separate schools any share of the public moneys which are annually granted towards the support of education.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Will the hon. gentleman tell us if a section of the Roman Catholics in Alberta or Saskatchewan establish a denominational school, will they, under the Bill we have now before us, have a right to any grant from the government?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I call it denominational; it is either denominational or separate, one or the other; but I think it is an absolute conclusion. I do not think it is open to argument, and I am quite sure if the clause were submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—hon. gentlemen know how they have whittled away the rights of the minority in another very important case to which I need not now advert—they certainly would not enlarge the privileges the minority might claim. Now under the Act of 1875 they would certainly not come in for a share of the government allowance for schools, nor have any share in the revenue arising from school lands. I regard that as the most important asset that the schools of the Northwest Territories, whether public or separate, can possibly enjoy, and I will tell you why. We know that throughout the whole of the Northwest and Manitoba two sections in every township are set apart as school lands. We had a return brought down at the instance of the hon. member from Calgary a few days ago, giving particulars as to the sales of those lands up to the present day. I speak now subject to correction, but I think some hon. senator, referring to that return, put the average value of the school lands as high as $10.80 per acre. I estimate $7.00. In many cases I know the upset price—they are sold by auction—was $7.00. I estimate the value of the lands when sold at no less a sum than $50,000,000, the most magnificent asset any country could have at the beginning. It may possibly be more, because my estimate is based on an average price of $7 per acre. Now neither under the Act of 1875 nor the conditions under which the territories came in, would they have a share in those lands. I will read the statutes under which these lands are allotted. It was enacted in 1886, and the clause has never been changed. It provides that the school lands shall be sold at auction, &c. They are sold on very liberal terms and there is this peculiarity about them that they get what is known as the unearned increment. That is, school lands are never sold until the population arises in the locality which gives value to them. If the school lands were sold in advance of settlement, they probably would bring two or three dollars an acre. If they are sold after settlement has gone in, there is no difficulty about their bringing a high price. In days to come I have no doubt that school lands will be sold as high as fifteen to twenty dollars an acre. At the low average I put the value of those lands, I do not hesitate to say that if judiciously administered —and I trust they will be administered for all time by the central government—these lands will form an asset of $50,000,000 for the two new provinces. That is something of such immense value that it would be a matter of very great regret if the minority in that country were not to get a share of those lands. In all the discussions and amendments drawn on this very much vexed question, I have constantly had that in my mind, that no arrangement would be complete which would have the subject open to doubt whether the minority should share in that magnificent asset. I will read the law about the school lands .—

All moneys from time to time realized from the sale of school lands shall be invested in securities of Canada to form a school fund, and the interest arising therefrom, after deducting the cost of management, shall be paid annually to the government of the province or territory within which said lands are situated towards the support of public schools therein.

Not separate schools. This Bill provides:

(2) In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with the said chapter 29 or any Act passed in amendment thereof, or in substitution therefor, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in the said chapter 29.

The law we are now placing on the statute book, which is to be the constitution of the province, provides that there shall be no discrimination in the distribution of the valuable asset which I have described. It is specifically set forth there in language which no court can set aside. So that hon. gentlemen will see they will make a very great mistake in urging the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the hon. gentleman say that a public school cannot be a Catholic school in the territories.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was one of the peculiarities existing there. It may be a public school, but there are separate schools in the territories and where there is a majority of other than Catholics they establish the public school. Where Catholics are the majority they establish a public school also, but at any time they are liable to be out-voted and they can fall back on the separate school. Whether the school is called a public school and governed entirely by trustees of the Roman Catholic faith, or whether it is a separate school per se under the direct control of the Act, in either case provision is made that they shall share, not alone in the sum arising from the sale of lands but also in any moneys that the legislature may vote. The schools are all on a par whether called public or separate schools, and share equally in the distribution of public money. If that amendment were carried it would set aside that asset. No court could decree that they are entitled to any share of that money ; it is only under this statute they have a share. Apart altogether from the fact that we are now dealing with that modification, we are adopting an Act which the territories have imposed upon themselves, an Act which Mr. Haultain when he came down here in January last said openly, and publicly repeatedly to the reporters,—his statement which appeared in an interview with the ' Globe,' was that if he were the autocrat of the Northwest Territories he would not change the school law one iota. He was made use of afterwards, I will not say why, but he lent himself to an agitation against adopting it. Not that he ever said that if it were in the power of the territories to enact a school law, he would change one particle of it. What he did say was that for the federal parliament to interfere was an assumption of rights which properly belonged to the province.

There can be no forcing, no coercion. The word coercion has been made use of over and over again ; there can be no coercion where we say we are willing to take exactly what you have, to accept just what you yourself have decreed, if fair, just and reasonable. Now I say the very fact of our accepting the law of the Northwest Territories made by the people in a tolerant and generous spirit, is infinitely better than any law we could make ourselves here, which would not receive the support and assistance of the people of the territories in carrying it out. There are ten members representing the territories, and we have seven of them in support of this Bill in its present form. I say that a Bill that is sustained by the representatives of the people, that has their cordial support, when they are unwilling to admit the right of this parliament to enact a law, is far more valuable than a law which would be far stronger and more in favour of the minority. Because my experience of school laws is this, that it is a matter of administration. It is possible to embarrass the administration of the school law, because it has to be carried on through the agency of the municipality under the machinery furnished by the provincial authority—so that unless you have the provincial authority on your side it is absolutely impossible to administer it completely and satisfactorily for the benefit of those for whom it is intended. There are in the British North America Act, as we know, the appellate clauses, but I have never valued the power of appeal to this parliament, for the reason that the parliament of Canada has not the machinery, has not the ability to coerce a local legislature into doing what they do not want to do. That power of appeal, I believe, is adopted from the Act that I passed in 1863. At that time we had no Minister of Education. The supreme power in the administration of our school law was the Superintendent of Education, the Rev. Dr. Ryerson—a very good man he was. He is gone and I am not calling in question his judgment, but a prejudice had arisen in the minds of the people who supported separate schools that he was hostile; that in the various questions that came before him, and as to which there was no appeal from his decision, he took a view adverse to the rights and interests of the minority. To meet the feeling of that time, I put this clause in the Act of 1863, that there should be an appeal at all times, from the decision of the Superintendent of Education to the Governor in Council. The idea of an appeal was borrowed from the existing law at the time. I do not know whether there was a similar appeal in the province of Quebec; I doubt it very much, but there was in the province of Ontario. Therefore I say that this Bill, having, as it has, the approval of so large a proportion of the members from the Northwest, is ten times more valuable than concessions which would be ten times greater with a hostile attitude on the part of the people of the Northwest. If I am well advised, if I have read aright the public opinion of that country—and I have certainly endeavoured to form a just and sound judgment on the views of the people of the Northwest—I have myself had evidence which has satisfied my mind, at all events, that the law, as we have framed it now, will be accepted and worked out cordially by the people and the governments of the new provinces. Now if that is the case, and I think there is ample justification for so believing, is it not better to have a certainty than an uncertainty? rather than to say we will pass a clause here which will have to be settled by lawyers in the courts. It would take eight or ten years before you could get a final decision, and then perhaps not a decision which would satisfy those who expected a different judgment from the court. It certainly would cut them out of a share in that valuable asset of $50,000,000 which I have mentioned. I appeal to my hon. friends who are honest, no doubt, and influenced with an anxious desire to secure for the minority all they can give them. No one can be more desirous of this than I am myself; but the proposition first brought down met, as hon. gentlemen know, with the opposition of the representatives of the territories. The whole ten were solidly arrayed against it, and it would have been folloy for us to attempt to press it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thought it was the Orange people that were against it; now it appears that it was the members from the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never heard the Orangemen were connected with it. I do say that with a solid front of the representative men of the territories opposing it, it is perfectly idle to talk in this age, of imposing a law on a country with democratic institutions, with a local legislature who could thwart and defeat any law in reference to the schools which we might pass here. Supposing there were an adverse government in the province of Quebec, and an attempt was made there to embarrass the minority? Would they not be able to do it? And would not the same argument apply in Ontario, if opposition was made to separate schools. Would they not be able to thwart them in every way? Hon. gentlemen know that from time to time concessions are made to the minority which the law does not give. Take for instance the collecting of the rates; the municipalities lend their assistance. Municipalities are small democratic bodies; supposing they choose to strangle the separate schools, they have many ways of doing it besides withholding any grant the law would compel them to give. Therefore what you get with cordiality is worth a great deal more than any thing the law will give you without it. I am one of those who never believed in getting the pound of flesh. I believe in peace at any price, and I have found it the best policy to make arrangements. Do not fight for all you are entitled to get, if your opponent is willing to concede anything fair. It is on that ground I am appealing to my hon. friends who naturally take a warm interest on behalf of the people of the Northwest, believing they are going to get constitutional concessions by the line they are taking. I have come to the conclusion that it would be a terrible mistake, that the carrying of the amendment of that kind, even if parliament were to adopt it, would be fatal to the best interests of the people of the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman tells us not to display any great vehemence on this question. Did he not himself fight for separate schools?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Did not the hon. gentleman obtain separate schools?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Then we are only following in his footsteps. The hon. gentleman has cited the 11th clause of the law of 1875, and told us there is nothing in that clause decreeing that the separate schools can get any money from the government. That is what the hon. gentleman says?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Can the hon. gentleman find anything in that statute which says that the government shall give money to schools, public or separate? He will not find it there. He will find it in another statute, that they should give money to public schools. The hon. gentleman has said that separate schools are not public schools—is not that what the hon. gentleman says?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are some public schools controlled by Catholic trustees.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I will quote the opinion of a colleague of the hon. gentleman who I am sure deserves his respect—I refer to the late Minister of Justice, the Hon. David Mills. Mr. Mills said: 'The fact is, the separate schools in Manitoba, like the separate schools of Ontario, are public schools.'

I suppose the hon. gentleman will not dissent from the opinion of a former Minister of Justice, and a colleague with whom he served. This is to be found at page 1285 of the 'Hansard' of 1898.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Any school in the Dominion receiving public assistance from the government is a public school. Call them whatever you like, call them dissentient schools as they did in Quebec, call them separate schools as in Ontario, call them what you like in the Northwest, the moment they receive government assistance they are public schools, and consequently entitled to their share of all the assets which may exist for the support of schools. The hon. gentleman is only giving an evasive interpretation of the statute respecting school lands, and he is just pursuing the course which will deprive us of a share in the assets of those schools. If the amendment we are proposing were adopted, we would get our share of those assets; but the course followed by the government will lead the Catholic population on to establish private schools for the support of which they will have to pay in addition to their taxes for the support of public schools, and they will be deprived of their share of the school lands. That will be not only a spoliation of our rights, but also of our share of the public property.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I want to put on record the motion supported by the hon. gentlemen from Lauzon and Montarville in 1890. When the motion for the third reading of the Act to amend the Acts respecting the Northwest Territories was made, Hon.

Mr. Bellerose moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Paquette that clause 32 of the Bill be amended as follows :—

32. Section one hundred and ten of the said Act is hereby repealed, and the following is substituted therefor :—

110. Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Legislative Assembly of the Territories and in the proceedings before the courts, and both those languages shall be used in the records and journals of such assembly ; and all ordinances made under this Act shall be printed in both those languages : Provided, however, that after the next general election of the Legislative Assembly, such assembly may, by ordinance or otherwise, regulate its proceedings, and the manner of recording and publishing the same, and the regulations so made shall be embodied in a proclamation which shall be forthwith made and published by the Lieutenant Governor in conformity with the law, and thereafter shall have full force and effect.

By striking out the proviso contained in the last lines, and which proviso is in the following words :—

Provided, however, that after the next general election of the Legislative Assembly, such assembly may, by ordinance or otherwise, regulate its proceedings, and the manner of recording and publishing the same, and the regulations so made shall be embodied in a proclamation which shall be forthwith made and published by the Lieutenant Governor in conformity with the law, and thereafter shall have full force and effect.

The Hon. Mr. Dickey moved in amendment to the amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Lacoste,

That all the words after 'That' be struck out, and the following substituted :—

In the opinion of this House it is inexpedient to renew or continue previous agitation by rejecting the solution of a grave difficulty which is offered by the said proviso, and which has been approved by the people through their representatives in parliament ; and that the said proviso stand part of the Bill.

The question of concurrence being put thereon, the House divided and the names being called for, they were taken down as follows :—

Chaffers,

So it was resolved in the affirmative.

That is exactly the situation which we occupy to-day. If there is a difference it is because the agitation now has been ten times greater than the agitation with regard to the use of the French language in 1890; nevertheless the hon. gentlemen opposing it were of opinion in 1890 that it was inadvisable to strike out the proviso permitting the abolition of the French language from the Bill, because it would tend to renew the agitation. To-day the same hon. gentlemen are asking us to renew this agitation by going back to 1890 and undoing the work which they themselves did at that time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the question were put as it really should be put, it would not be put in that way. In 1890 when that motion was made, was it proposed to take away altogether the use of the French language ? It was not. The French language was to be left in the courts, in the Legislative Assembly and in every place in the Northwest Territories, except in the framing of the records of the Legislative Assembly. That was the only thing that was sacrificed at the time. In what position do we stand to-day? We are asked to-day to give up the use of the French language, wherever it may flourish, and we are asked to do that by whom? By a president and an ex-president of the St. John Baptiste Society in Montreal, by men who every year go before the people and proclaim their love for the French language. It is those men who are opposed to the use of the French language to-day in the Northwest. I congratulate my hon. friends from Montreal, the noble couple in this House who are trying to choke off the use of the French language in the Northwest. More than that, the hon. Secretary of State says that if we adopt that amendment we are doing the greatest possible harm to the cause of the Catholics in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the hon. member read the amendment?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I went over and looked at it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then the hon. gentlemen has forgotten entirely what it contains.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will give it in a nutshell—that the provisions which we are now passing on shall not in any way prejudicially affect the rights and privileges of any body in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is to be found in clause 93 of the British North America Act, and in clause 3 of this Bill, but to that the amendment adds the following words, 'provided always that no provision of the present Act shall be construed to restrict in any way the rights and privileges heretofore granted to any class of persons in the Northwest Territories in matters of education and language'. Here is an amendment which preserves all that is in clause 3, and clause 17 of the Bill, and because we ask for the continuance of what may be good in the present Bill, and ask that what may be harmful be removed, the hon. Secretary State says, don't vote for that, you are going to destroy the rights and privileges of the minority in the Northwest.' Destroy it in what way? The hon. gentlemen is unable to say how and he can never see it, because he knows well that if this amendment were carried it will destroy nothing, but will simply preserve the use of the French language.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In listening to the last speech made by the hon. Secretary of State, I was forcibly reminded of the remarks which he made when he moved the second reading of the Bill. His present position is somewhat antagonistic to that which he assumed when he introduced the Bill. If my recollection serves me right, and I think the record will sustain me, the hon. gentleman said in asking the House to support the Bill and reject my motion for delay, that the effect of the Bill was simply to continue the schools as they are to-day, giving a half hour at the close of each days school for religious instruction. That is all we were asked to affirm. That explanation was verified by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What is the hon. gentleman's position now? He says it is necessary to make certain provision in order to give to the minority privileges and concessions which they might be deprived of if these clauses that are now in the Bill were not passed. How does he reconcile the two statements? We find the ministers acting in strict accord with their supporters in explaining these clauses, giving one explanation in Ontario and the Northwest, and another in the province of Quebec. The explanations are given to suit the people to whom they are addressed. But the hon. gentleman should reflect that in this House he has the same audience that listened to him a few days ago, and that they have not yet forgotten his former utterances, and it would be just as well for him to be consistent unless he thinks he is talking to illiterate men who cannot understand the distinction between his statements. Now if their schools be public schools, as the hon. gentleman says they are, then the clause of the law which he read provides for the distribution of the money acquired from the sale of the school lands to those schools, whether they are taught by Catholic or Protestant teachers, and are under the control and management of trustees of Catholic faith, or taught and controlled by Protestants. The law provides for a division of the money among the public schools, and if these schools are, as the hon. Secretary of State has told us, public schools, they will get their share.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say that. I said there were some Catholic schools that were carried on as public schools, and that is where any public school was established.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the hon. gentleman said that all these schools were public schools, with the additional right of teaching religion in the last half hour of the school. I am not aware that any Protestant, however antagonistic he may be to separate schools in their entirety, objects to that law—no one having regard for the future and for the proper education of the rising generation, would be opposed to that. If it went no further, it would meet with no opposition. My contention in reference to the Manitoba Bill was that the rights and privileges given to the minority under the constitution should be maintained, and if the hon. gentleman was such an admirer of peace and so desirous of preserving harmony, why did he take the position he occupied in 1895-6? Neither the hon. gentleman nor those by whom he is surrounded can explain or reconcile the different positions they have occupied. Then they were prepared to contest the law we sought to place on the statute-book to maintain the rights and privileges of the minority in Manitoba, which had been taken away from them by the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs. More than that, the principal mover in that matter was Mr. Sifton, whom the hon. gentleman—I have the quotation in my hand—denounced, in the discussion on that subject in this House, as a trickster. I quite concur with him in that respect. On that point he and I agree; but since that time he and his party have taken Mr. Sifton to their bosom, and hugged and nursed him as they would a sucking child. Who was it abolished the use of the French language in Manitoba ? Was it not Mr. Greenway, aided by Mr. Sifton ? And yet now these hon. gentlemen are trying to attribute it to the Conservative party, who fought against the abolition of the French language in Manitoba, and who desired to maintain the rights and privileges which the minority had in that province. They are virtuous to-day—why ? because they are in power and are trying to redeem the reputation which they lost on this subject in 1895-6, but the hon. gentleman says, we have the support of the western members, and must therefore have the support of the western people. Does that follow ? Does history sustain that view of the matter ? Has he forgotten the fact that Gladstone went to the people of England on the question of Home Rule and was sustained, because nothing but the abstract principle was laid before the electors, but that when the details of the Home Rule measure were laid before the House of Commons and it was rejected by the Lords on the ground that the people had not been given an opportunity to approve or disapprove of the measure. After the House had been dissolved, Lord Salisbury and the Conservative party were sustained by the largest majority given for many a year in the imperial parliament. Was it not the same with the question of repeal in Nova Scotia ? Sir Charles Tupper insisted upon carrying repeal in the parliament of Canada; refused to go to the people; but as soon as an appeal was made to the people of the province of which he was the representative, they rejected the proposition almost unanimously.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I might tell the hon. gentleman that there is a great deal of difference between the time of Sir Charles Tupper, which he is speaking of, and the present. There was an agitation all over the province of Manitoba. Everybody knew that the people of Manitoba were not satisfied at that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not speaking of Manitoba ; I am speaking of Nova Scotia. I have given instances in political history in which the representatives in parliament approved of a measure introduced by the government, but when the proposition was made and the details were submitted to the people, they sustained the position taken by the opponents of the measure. I was dealing with a case of the kind in the political history of this country in reference to the Confederation Act and showing that although it was carried through parliament, the people of Nova Scotia rejected the proposition as soon as they had an opportunity of doing so.

We heard a good deal about coercion nine years ago. It was in the mouth of every member of the Liberal party from Halifax to Victoria. Coercion was blazoned forth in large capital letters all over the country. My hon. friend does not like the word just now ; it is not palatable to him. At that time I contended in my own province, wherever I spoke, that it was not a matter of coercion in 1895-6; on the contrary that the Bill proposed to give the minority the right to schools which they had when Manitoba came into the Dominion, and which had been taken from them, that it was only a restoration of a right which they had enjoyed. That was rejected by my hon. friends. They succeeded in rousing the prejudices of a large section of the Protestant population of Ontario and in throwing out the Bill, aided in doing so by the French Canadian constituencies of Quebec. They succeeded in turning out Sir Charles Tupper's government at that time, and now they come back in 1905 and are trying to redeem their reputation by fulfilling the promise they had made to the people whom they then deprived of their rights. Chickens, they say, come home to roost ; in the present instance they are coming home most effectually, and if they return to the hon. gentleman he must not find fault with those who felt the effect of the course hon. gentlemen opposite pursued ten years ago. My hon. friend is very pathetic. He can give us very lofty admonitions of peace and harmony which should prevail in the country, and tell us how disastrous it would be if the agitation should continue in the Northwest. I predict that the passage of this Bill with the provisions it contains will create discord and confusion until it has been before all the courts in the realm to settle it. That is all I asked when I moved that it be laid before the courts. The hon. gentleman knows, and no one better, that there is no finality in this legislation. There cannot be a finality in legislation of this kind when we find the most eminent legal minds in the country differing upon the powers which parliament has under the constitution. It is said if the constitution does not give to the minority in the Northwest Territories the rights and privileges that they should enjoy, we ought to give it. I admit that to this extent ; this parliament has no right or power to concede rights and privileges to a new province, other than those which they derive from the British North America Act. The British North America Act is to the Dominion parliament, being an Imperial Act, just what an Act of this parliament is to the provincial legislators, and we have neither the power, the right nor the authority to confer a power unless the authority is contained in the British North America Act, any more than a province has a right to legislate upon questions not given into their control by the Act passed by the Dominion parliament organizing them into provinces. So that instead of the passage of this Bill being a source of peace, harmony and tranquillity in that country, I repeat you are only sowing the seed of discord and confusion, and until the matter has been settled by the highest court in the realm, you will find neither peace nor harmony prevailing on this question. It is deeply to be regretted that it is so.

My hon. friend referred to the working of the School Act in Ontario. I think I can speak by the book on that question. I have had the honour of being the chairman of the school board for some thirteen or fourteen years in succession, and also chairman of the Grammar School Board, so that when I say I think I know a little of the working of both Acts, I am speaking by the book. When the Roman Catholics in the city and town in which I live were compelled under the law to declare themselves supporters of the separate schools every year or they would be placed under the public school list, we never exacted compliance with that. As was referred to the other day, when the law compelled them to collect their own taxes, we permitted our collector to collect their taxes for them. They levied their own rate ; we collected it for them, and they only paid their percentage for the collection, and in every instance we relieved them as far as possible. While many disapproved of separate schools, as fellow-citizens and wishing to live at peace and harmony, we not only declared but we carried out the principle of conciliation in every possible respect. My hon. friend referred to myself last night—I am very much obliged to him for the good opinion he expressed regarding me—and he intimated a wish to have more Orangemen like myself. That reminded me of a little incident that occurred in my own town. At a public dinner there, a reverend priest stated to me that he was warned by many people to be very cautious what he did when he came to Belleville, that the Grand Master of the Orange Association was there, and he might expect many difficulties and troubles. At that dinner, in referring to this question he said that he had become acquainted with that Grand Master and all he had to say, priest as he was, that he wished there were more of the order built like him. But the Grit paper, as they usually do, came out next day and attributed to that gentleman the statement that he wished there were more Orangemen in the country than there were. That is as near the truth as we can expect from papers of that character. I shall refer to this section again when we come to the 17th clause, because I want to point out to my esteemed friend the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) that he is an ardent supporter and admirer of a very prominent Orangeman who is now a member of the Cabinet. I will quote a speech delivered by that member of the Cabinet when he was in the New Brunswick legislature by which my hon. friend may learn what the true principles of that Order are, and perhaps when he gets it from a friend of his own, a gentleman whom he is supporting and a member of the Laurier government, he will not have such a bad opinion of them after all. There are other points to which my hon. friend called attention, but what I rose particularly to refer to was the different attitude assumed by him to-night and that which he assumed when he delivered his first speech. If the law was as he indicated it was in the first place, there was no necessity for the speech he made to-night, because they would have all the rights and privileges under the law that they would have under this measure. Being public schools as he declared they were—and even if they were separate schools they would be none the less public schools because they receive the public money and they must be under the regulations of the public school commissioners to that extent, and consequently would be entitled to their share of the funds arising from the sale of the school lands.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have been interrupted by the hon. leader of the opposition and by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, though I was very moderate. I do not rise with the intention of speaking, but I want to remark to the hon. leader of the opposition in reference to the terrible association of Orangemen, to whom he is reputed to belong, that he is mistaken in the interpretation of what I have said. I never said that I had a bad opinion of those people. I only related certain facts, and said that the Orange people were at the bottom of the agitation which has been going on for some time in Canada. I have only repeated what has been said by all the newspapers, French and English. The resolutions which have been passed in the Orange lodges are known by everybody. Is that association so powerful and so sacred that it is forbidden to speak of it, and comment upon what it does or what it has not done and condemn its action when it should be condemned? If I am confident that the agitation which has been going on has been raised by the organization, and if I am confident that their deeds and actions deserve to be condemned, if I do it in moderate terms, in polite language, have I not the right to say to the Orangemen what is said with much less reason to our bishops and priests? Is it more criminal to report what the Orange association is doing in this country and to blame that association than to say what has been said against the Catholic priests and bishops? I have a right to say what I have said. I have taken great precaution not to say too much. I have taken a great deal of trouble in order that I should not say a word which a member of this House should not say. But naturally I cannot please everybody. And when I said that there was a contradiction between the doings and the words of the chief Orange association, between the position which they took at certain times in the past and that which they take now, when I said that they were not denouncing their chiefs ten years ago because they were fighting with our Catholic priests and bishops on the same ground as the Liberal party, I said they thought they had the right to do it. They thought then it was no crime to be allied with our priests and bishops. As to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, he said that the president of the St. Jean Baptiste Association should not have taken the ground he has. We have been between two fires, and we do not know on which side there is the most fire. He stated that the ex-president or the two ex-presidents of the St. Jean Baptiste Association are taking such a position against the French language that they dare to vote against such an amendment. I will tell the hon. gentleman from Stadacona that it requires more courage and patriotism sometimes to vote against an amendment than to vote for it. I know very well I will not have to suffer on the hustings for a vote on the amendment but this is a hustings amendment, and they will make use of it on the hustings against the members of the House who have voted against it in connection with the French language. That is their right, I suppose; but at the same time it is also the right of the members of this House, as it was the right of the members of the other House, if in their conscience they think it would be dangerous to vote for such a motion not to do so; and if it is more patriotic to vote against it, it is their duty to do so, and nobody has a right to say they are not acting as good French Canadians.

If it is so difficult to obtain something for our countrymen of the Northwest when the constitution is protecting their rights, if it was so difficult to obtain the Bill before the House as it is, if it was so difficult to come to a compromise and to give justice, how can we hold that when there is nothing to protect the constitution, to protect the rights of the French language, when there is nothing and nobody can show anything in the laws or constitution guaranteeing the use of the French language, how would it be possible to re-establish the French language in the Northwest Territories. The Hon. Speaker of the House and the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry have proved clearly that the parliament could not intervene without violating the principle of provincial rights. Why ? Because they were not right. Nobody can deny that. In 1890 when the Senate voted on behalf of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Dickey, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Lacoste, authorizing the council of the Northwest to decide what they would think proper after the election about the use of the French language or the English language, when that motion was adopted, the hon. gentleman from Lauzon and all his friends by that motion authorized the council of the Northwest to do what they have done. It was a permission given them to decide whether they would continue to use the French language or abolish it.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Oh, no, I deny that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Prove it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Oh, yes. It is the same thing. So that the ordinances which were passed were the logical consequence of the permission which was given them by this House, by the House of Commons, and by the hon member from Lauzon, to do as they thought proper.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I deny that.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—And those ordinances not having been disallowed, there was only one thing to do. If the hon. members thought that the council of the Northwest had no right to pass the resolution which was passed regarding the use of the French language what should they have done ? They should have obliged the government of the time, composed of their friends, to disallow that ordinance. Why did they not do it ? If they had displayed at that time one-half the zeal which they are displaying now, in an endeavour to persuade the government to disallow those ordinances, then the ordinances would not have been in force ; and they are therefore responsible. They may regret what they have done. It is said that remorse does honour to the conscience of a man. I respect the hon. gentlemen's remorse, but I regret the position they are in. If the situation is so bad now, if the government cannot do more, it is the fault of those who voted for that motion in 1890, and who did not have the courage to force the government and their friends to disallow the ordinance afterwards.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the hon. gentleman did not understand me to deny him the right to make any statement he pleased. That is not the line of my argument at all. On the contrary I pointed out to him that he was in error in making the statement, and before I get through I think I will give him the names of the parties who were responsible, to show him the information he received was not correct.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I say now that taking the position as it is, taking the facts as they are, taking into consideration the ordinances which are in force now, considering all the facts which exist and all the laws which have been passed, the government could not intervene and could not now abrogate those ordinances without giving the right to all those who have opposed the schools to invoke the principle of autonomy and of provincial rights, because it would be necessary once more to put aside, to revoke, to abrogate, to demolish the ordinances which have been passed by the territorial legislature, and which they were authorized to pass by this House and by the other House. There are those who have confidence, as I have, that those amendments may be useless or dangerous—useless first, and perhaps dangerous—and compromise without any practical effect the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec is very generous and shows that she is able to be very dangerous—too generous sometimes—and I am of opinion that in this case the province of Quebec must be prudent, must not go too far, must not ask too much, because without exposing her own interests she must preserve her strength for some other time, and must keep her strength in order to be strong and protect the interests of those who rely upon her. It is said that the province of Quebec is the protector of the minority of the French in other parts of Canada, that this is a noble role, and that she has been equal to her task in many instances, but I repeat here that she must not be imprudent. She must not make exaggerated demands and thus appear to her friends, to those whose aid she requires, to be unreasonable, because after all there are two parties. We have a party government, and the province of Quebec cannot do anything to protect the rights of the minority without being able to have on her side a majority of the people belonging to other nationalities and creeds. Let us take the facts practically. What is our position? We have to choose between two policies, the policy of the government which gives what they say they are in a position to give, doing the most they can on behalf of the Catholics of the Northwest. They are giving half a loaf, but that is better than nothing at all. What is offered on the other side is less than half a loaf—it is a stone. Well, in the interests of the Catholics of the Northwest, those who understand the situation would not do otherwise, if they were convinced the government could not do more than they have done. Supposing Sir Wilfrid Laurier had resigned, what would have been the fate of the Catholics of the Northwest Territories. They would have been thrown upon the mercy of those who have not ceased to complain that the government was doing too much for them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not desire that the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat should go unchallenged. He is speaking of the noble role played by the province of Quebec in favour of the minority of the other provinces. He cannot claim to-day to take a very great part in that noble role, because he is not fighting for the rights of the minority, he is not fighting for the privileges and rights of the French and of the Catholics of the Northwest. The hon. gentleman is ready, but with the government, which Mr. Sifton brought to his feet, to do away with all the privileges and rights of those provinces. Speaking of constitutional law, speaking of legal obligations, the hon. gentleman must remember that before that there is a question of honour—a question of contract. When those territories refused to accept the government of Canada in 1869, what took place? A revolt took place, and the authorities of the different governments, imperial and federal, asked for Monseigneur Taché, who was in Rome at the time. He came here; he went to the Northwest, clothed with all the authority, imperial and federal, to make a compact with those people. He made a compact. A Bill of Rights was brought down to Ottawa by the delegates of those provinces, and that Bill of Rights asked for separate schools and for the usage of the French language. That was accorded to the people, and now we see French Canadians in this House of parliament get up and refuse what was accorded to those people by a compact. I congratulate the hon. gentleman for his devotion to the government—not his devotion to the French of the Northwest, but his devotion to the government; and I congratulate him once more. He said, speaking of the rights of the minority, 'You have never disallowed those ordinances.' Does the hon. gentleman ignore that disallowance was not needed? If a law is unconstitutional or ultra vires does the usage of that law make it constitutional or make it come within the powers of the legislative body? Not at all. If a law is ultra vires it need not be disallowed. Every man is at liberty to test that law before the courts and the judgment of that court will settle the question, and when we have the judgment of the courts at our disposal, when any public man can address the courts and ask them to solve the question, why should parliament interfere and disallow laws that are null. Nobody needs that remedy. The disallowance of an Act is a political remedy in the hands of the public men of this country, and it is not when laws are null that disallowance is necessary. It is when Acts are not ultra vires that the application of the power of disallowance may be necessary. The hon. gentleman could not sit down without speaking once more of the Orange people. Well, I will remind him of what took place some two or three days ago. We have in Quebec a paper called 'Le Soleil.' That is the organ of the Liberal party. We have in Quebec another paper called 'L'Evenement.' That is the organ of the Conservative party. I do not know if the opposition is a very good place for papers to progress, but for one reason or another 'L'Evenement' has progressed. We bought 'L'Evénement' for the party and it is progressing. The other day we bought a new press. It was an event in the life of our paper and on such occasion we published the paper with three time the number of pages it contained before. What did 'Le Soleil' say? It spoke as follows :—

'L'Evenement' published yesterday so many pages in honour of the Orange people because it was July 12.

That is the way the Liberal papers are talking to the people of Quebec. We never thought we were doing such mischief at the time, but you may see of what we were accused. More than that. 'Le Soleil' said the Autonomy Bill was presented to this House on the 12th of July just to suit the Orangemen. That was the government's fault because the Bill was introduced by the hon. Secretary of State. Realizing the ridiculousness of this assertion, 'Le Soleil' tried to correct it by saying in the last number that it was Sir Mackenzie Bowell who chose that day to present his motion for the six months' hoist, because he was the grand chief of the Orangemen and that he could not do less on that day than propose the six months' hoist. That is the way the organ of the Liberal party in Quebec are educating their friends and their own people. I submit these new facts to the consideration of my hon. friend, and when he says the Orangemen are at the bottom of all the trouble about this Bill he knows the facts are not quite as he states. He knows agitation took place when Mr. Sifton came back from the west, and attempted, because he had himself established a kind of separate school of his own in the city of Ottawa, to deceive the public so as to hide his doings. He knows well what agitation came from the cabinet itself. He knows Mr. Fielding followed suit and threatened to step out of the government if the Bill was not changed. It was only through pressure brought upon him by those two ministers that Sir Wilfrid Laurier yielded and consented to withdraw the educational clause, and now all that is said against that first clause of the Bill strikes the government themselves, because it is they that presented the Bill; it is they that re-enacted that Act of 1875, which has just been denounced by the Secretary of State. We all heard him a moment ago denouncing the Act of 1875. He said it was no good at all; that if the Act of 1875 was taken as the basis of the rights of our fellow countrymen in the Northwest it would amount to nothing, although he was in the cabinet chamber when the draft of the Bill was presented by the hon. Premier of the Dominion, and that Bill was approved by him. That Act of 1875 was made the basis of all the rights which the government wanted to give to the people of the Northwest. And more than that, the Prime Minister said he could not do otherwise than bring in that Bill. He asked the pardon of the House because he brought in that law of 1875 as the basis; he said :—

I am compelled by law and the constitution to do everything I am doing now.

He did it, and the day after he undid it —well it took a month—and after all his reflections during the month's time we have the result in that poor little Bill which is spoliatory in its character, which robs our people, and gives nothing to the French people and Catholics of the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I hope this drama is about to end. This is a first-class ruction, particularly agreeable to me, and I want all of you, of every denomination, to listen. This is a row among Frenchmen. They are always accusing the Irishmen of having a row, but we have no interference in this. The Irishmen are contented and happy in enjoying the squabble.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—The Irishmen never fight.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They fight quicker and sharper, and are done with it and shake hands over it. I simply wish to say that this is a terrible sight—to have religion so-called talked about in this way. This is not religion—not a particle of it. Religion says, love your enemy and embrace him who persecutes and calumniates you. However with reference to the Orangement, I want the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles to know that he is wrong. I am not a defender of the Orangemen. There are plenty of men here to defend them. But I want the hon. gentleman to know it is a higher class which is implicated in the origin of this matter than Orangemen. Does he think Orangemen would influence the 'Globe'? Monseigneur Sbarretti might as well try to influence the 'Globe' as the Orangemen. I suppose the one might be as successful as the other. No, it could not be possible that Orangemen could influence the 'Globe.' I will tell you why. The leading Orangemen with us are Grits or Liberals.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In what part of the town?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If the hon. gentleman wishes to know particularly I will give him a private interview with a diagram.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I met so few of them that were Grits.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Was the hon. gentleman ever in Kingston?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Does he know the penitentiary is there?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—You don't mean to say they are there?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Some of them are. I hope this dissension in the religious element will soon disappear. It is purely politics; it is as plain as a pikestaff, and I am glad I voted as I did. I tell him and those Irish Catholics who voted that way—but there are no Irish Catholics who voted that way—that there is a law higher than the constitution and higher than any laws made by human beings. It is the law of God and of conscience implanted in every man's bosom, and it would be very wrong to insinuate that any improper motive actuated any man in this matter. I hope not. I told the hon. gentlemen plainly and squarely that by voting for the amendment of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell they were cutting away the principle; now if they were to approve of the principle of the Bill and then amend where necessary, it would be better tactics to pursue than the course they are adopting. I do not see any use in going on with this dramatic fight between these hon. gentlemen and I hope they will settle this matter. If they do not settle it, we will have to get the sergeant-at-arms to see that no attack is made, because it is assuming bitterer proportions each day. Then we must remember that there are elderly gentlemen in this House, and that as age advantages two organs of the great tripod of life are affected by this meeting to-night, the heart and the brain. Emotion and excitement and worry are extremely bad for a person. If the mind suffers it weakens the heart and the fibre of the heart is weak. Even supposing there is no disease present, elderly men are liable to be severely injured by these night sessions. There is no necessity for them. You can do all the business in the morning and in the afternoon and rest in the evening. I do not object to spending a litttle time in the evening, but I would advise hon. gentlemen to go home now. They have listened long enough to an entertaining discussion, and they had better go home at once.

The amendment was declared lost on a division, and the clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I mentioned the other evening in discussing this question that I thought this was a matter which deserved a little more consideration. The clause reads as follows :

4. The said province shall be represented in the Senate of Canada by four members : provided that such representation may, after the completion of the next decennial census, be from time to time increased to six by the parliament of Canada.

I think we should cut out the last few words of that clause, and make it read, 'be from time to time increased.' I will be quite satisfied with that, but I should dislike to see anything in the Bill which would tie us down to six senators. I gave my reasons for this the other day. Ontario has 24 senators and Quebec 24, and it would be highly unfair that we should be confined to six representatives in the Senate if our population increases until it is larger than the province of Ontario. I will not move an amendment, but I wish to raise an objection to the clause.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Every 25,367 electors are entitled to one member.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In Quebec the census is taken every ten years and the number given every ten years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That number will serve twice—every five years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 13.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When this Bill was read the second time, I objected to the principle incorporated in this section that the government should make a distribution of seats in both provinces. I apprehend, however, that it would be unnecessary for me to occupy the time of the House in pointing out the vicious principle which has entered into this question and without occupying the time of hon. gentlemen, I shall move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, that section 1 be stricken out of the schedule, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:

13. The Lieutenant Governor shall on or before the first day of January next by proclamation under the great seal divide the said province into twenty-five electoral divisions, due regard being had to existing local divisions and population.

I might say I have taken this clause word for word from chap. 3 of 33 Vic., sec. 16, which is known as the Manitoba Act. When Manitoba was carved out of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories, instead of this system which has been adopted, which has been imported into section 13, and for the purpose, I presume, of having a disinterested distribution of electoral divisions in the new provinces, it was delegated to the Lieutenant Governor to divide the provinces into electoral districts, and I think it must appeal to the minds of hon. gentlemen present that a more disinterested manner of dividing provinces could scarcely have been adopted. When the Bill was before the Commons it was proposed that the division of seats should be referred to a judicial committee or a bench of judges, but it was not received with favour by the government. However, I have no desire to occupy the time of the House, as I presume that any remarks of mine or any analysis of the vote or distribution of population in both provinces would be futile.

The amendment was declared lost on division.

The clause was adopted.

On sub-clause 4 of clause 16,

4. Every joint-stock company lawfully incorporated by or under the authority of any ordinance of the Northwest Territories shall be subject to the legislative authority of the province of Alberta if—

(a.) the head office or the registered office of such company is at the time of the coming into force of this Act situate in the province of Alberta ; and

(b.) the powers and objects of such company are such as might be conferred by the legislature of the said province and not expressly authorized to be executed in any part of the Northwest Territories beyond the limits of the said province.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—What about corporations not now licensed to do business in the Northwest ? There are corporations which are not incorporated by the laws of the Northwest, but by the laws of other provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not affect them at all.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It only affects corporations incorporated under the laws of the territories.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose it will be the same as in other provinces. Where corporations chartered by the Dominion go into other provinces they are taxed. Has that question ever been settled as to the right of the province to tax organizations incorporated by the Dominion? I remember bringing this question up, and if my recollection serves me, the hon. Secretary of State agreed with me in thinking that a charter granted by the Dominion parliament or under the Joint Stock Companies' Act of the Dominion, should not be subject to taxation in the provinces. I know in Ontario they tax the income of a corporation and compel them to take out a license to do business, besides imposing an annual tax. That seems to be in excess of the powers of the local legislature. It is in the line, I think, of imposing a tax upon a commercial traveller from another province. The subject, I understand from the hon. Secretary of State, is under the consideration of the Department of Justice now, and if any decision is come to before the House rises, I should like to know it.

It is doubtful, however, if the Department of Justice has been able to take up the question yet. I should like the hon. Secretary of State at the same time to call the attention of the Department of Justice to the point I have raised in reference to these licenses. It seems a rather anomalous position that one province should be taxing people from another province who come here to do business. The object of the confederation was to open the door for all business, but we are in the same position in this respect that the Australian colonies were in before the union. Each province had its own tariff, its own rates for railways, &c., and they were foreign to each other, but they began to realize that people of the same race and subjects of the same Crown, living upon the same island, should not treat each other as foreigners. They united, and all that has passed away. In adopting the practices to which I have called attention, we are showing almost the same sectional spirit which once prevailed in Australia, and if it is ultra vires of the provinces, I hope steps will be taken to put a stop to it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman is wrong in his statement so far as Quebec is concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The discussion is altogether irregular.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from Belleville was allowed to speak without interruption, and if I am prevented from replying, his remarks will go on record and be an injustice to the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not speaking of Quebec in particular. I was calling attention to a principle, and showing how unfairly joint stock companies, incorporated under Dominion charters were being treated in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—By our province ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The province of Quebec is not alone. Prince Edward Island and British Columbia are worse. I am speaking of a general principle. I am very glad that Quebec has such an ardent supporter. I do not see why a reference to laws passed by the provinces which seem to me unfair to companies incorporated by the Dominion should raise the hon. gentleman's ire. I do not think I was out of order in calling attention to the manner in which commercial travellers are treated in Quebec, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—And Ontario.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And Ontario—they are all alike. I pointed out the manner in which the Ontario government is taxing companies incorporated by the Dominion.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 17,

Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province, with the substitution for paragraph 1 of the said section 93, of the following paragraph :

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901.

(a) In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with the said chapter 29 or any Act passed in amendment thereof, or in substitution therefor, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in the said chapter 29.

(b) Where the expression 'by law' is employed in subsection 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said chapters 29 and 30, and where the expression 'at the union,' is employed, in the said subsection 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the following amendment:

17. Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province with the substitution for paragraph 1 of the said section 93 of the following paragraph :

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act under the terms of the Ordinances of the Northwest Territories, No. 3, of 1885, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in said Ordinances :

(2.) In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with said Ordinances there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in said Ordinances ;

(3.) Where the expression 'by law' is employed in subsection 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said Ordinances, and where the expression 'at the union' is employed, in the said subsection 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

He said: Hon. gentlemen will remember, when I spoke on the second reading of the Bill, that I objected to clause 17 as being based on the ordinances of 1901, and for this reason: The ordinances of 1901, I hold, do not give us any privilege, do not give us separate schools in the sense in which we should have them under the law of 1875, when the territories were first formed, and as given subsequently even in other ordinances. This amendment is based on the ordinances of 1885, for the reason that they give us more than the ordinances of 1901. The ordinances of 1885 provide:

The Lieutenant Governor in Executive Council may appoint and constitute a board of education for the Northwest Territories, composed of five members, two of whom shall be Roman Catholics and two Protestant and the Lieutenant Governor who shall be chairman.

Then section 5 provides:

It shall be the duty of the board to meet twice a year to appoint inspectors, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the board; to appoint a board of examiners for the examination of teachers; to provide for the expenses of the board of examiners; to arrange for proper examination, grading and licensing of teachers and the granting of certificates, such certificates to be of three classes, first, second and third; to make from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the school; to select adopt and prescribe a uniform series of text books to be used in the schools of the section; to have control and management of the schools of the section; and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for the general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of these ordinances.

Referring to the school books, I may state that the withdrawal of the power to select the text books is one of the worst features of the present Bill. In the decision given by the Privy Council in England, when deciding on that question in the case of the Manitoba law, one of the justices said:

The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority had previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools of which the control and management were in the hands of the Roman Catholics, who could select the books used and determine the character of their religious teaching.

In a few words, what we consider we are deprived of is given in that quotation. His honour the Speaker to-day stated that we were getting a great boon in the fact that separate schools could be established, that the fact of having those schools would give us other features as desired, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic. If my hon. friend will think the question over seriously, he will come to the conclusion which the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) came to the other day, that they are really getting nothing but the use of the school houses. They are deprived by clause 137 of the privilege of giving religious instruction until half past three in the afternoon. I want to ask my hon. friend from London (Hon. Mr. Coffey), who is the editor and proprietor, I suppose, of a Roman Catholic paper which has always supported separate schools, and from which I have taken this quotation, how he can justify his vote on this question. It says that Buckle's History of England is taught in the schools there for the reason that it is not under the authority of the Roman Catholics and that history, it says, eulogizes Cromwell and Cranmer and states that regulations had to be drawn up to forbid the worship of images in the churches.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Such books can be objected to.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—No, the Roman Catholics have no control of the books. This history further states that Protestants put to death under Queen Mary were put to death for their religious convictions, while those executed under Queen Elizabeth were put to death because they were rebels. I get this information from the 'Catholic Record' of London, and yet my hon. friend says that the Catholics are getting separate schools, when his own paper declares that the selection of the school books is not under the control of the trustees and that the schools are worthless.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Books of the description which the hon. gentleman mentions may be introduced in the public schools of the Northwest Territories, and may also be introduced in the separate schools, but the Catholic pupils will not I am sure study such books and I do not think they can be compelled to do so. I remember well when Collier's History was read in the public schools of Ontario, and I remember that it was put out of the schools because it contained objectionable passages. I remember when Marmion was read in the public schools of Ontario, and an attempt was made to have it used in the separate schools, but we got rid of that in Ontario ; and the same thing can be done in the territories.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The best way to manage the separate schools is to give the selection of books to the proper authorities. It is not very wholesome for Catholic teaching to have such books used in the separate school.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—They will not be taught.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—There is nothing in this Bill to forbid it.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—They will merely put the books out; they will not read them.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The ordinances of 1901, as I have said, forbid the teaching of religion in the separate schools. They provide that :

> No religious instruction except as hereinbefore provided shall be permitted in the school of any district from the opening of such school until one-half hour previous to its closing in the afternoon after which time any such instruction permitted or desired by the board may be given.

That says that no religion can be taught in the public schools, and permits no religious instruction to be given in the separate schools. My hon. friend the Secretary of State fortified his remarks here to-night by saying that Mr. Haultain would not change one iota of the school law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So he said.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He means the Ordinances of 1901—is not that so ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We know that Mr. Haultain has been opposed to separate schools and has been determined to destroy them from the day he took charge of the territories until now, and it was under his administration that the ordinances have been passed which have crippled the separate schools. Mr. Haultain is a Conservative, but I do not look upon this question from a political standpoint. I look upon Mr. Haultain as the leading figure, backed up by his Grit friends there, who have crippled the separate schools and passed the ordinances of 1901, which are worthless to Catholics.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Why did the Tories bring him down to London.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Just to play the part you would have played if you had been placed in the same circumstances.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think there was a mix-up.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am basing my amendment on the ordinance of 1885 which gave us, as Roman Catholics, separate schools in the Northwest Territories, while the present Bill gives us nothing beyond the privilege of having religious instruction after half past three, but not Roman Catholic separate schools as we understand them and as we want them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman takes the ordinances of 1885 as a basis for the rights of Roman Catholics in the Northwest. Those ordinances are made in accordance with the law of 1875, which declares that every time the legislative assembly of the Northwest enacts laws they shall give the Roman Catholic minority separate schools. It was in accordance with the law of 1875 that the legislative assembly of the Northwest passed this ordinance of 1885, but since that time other ordinances have been enacted by the same legislative body, contrary to the federal law of 1875, against their own organic law for the time being. Will the hon. member for de Salaberry deny that the ordinances for 1901 are against the law of 1875 ? Why the Minister of Justice himself, and the hon. the Prime Minister, state the fact. You have on the one hand the ordinances of 1885 enacted in accordance with the federal law, and on the other hand you have the ordinances of 1901, which are enacted against the law. What does the government do ? It sets aside the ordinance which is according to law and takes the ordinance which is against the law, which robs the Catholic minority of the Northwest of their rights. It recognizes these iniquitous ordinances, these robber ordinances as the basis of the rights of the Catholic minority in the Northwest. And there are people who fall on their knees before the Prime Minister and give him all praise because they say this clause of his is a little clearer than the other. The other covered rights; this one robs the minority of their rights, but then it is clearer. The hon. member from Alexandria has done a just thing to revive those ordinances of 1885 and make them the basis of the rights of Roman Catholics of the Northwest. We will see if the government will recognize those rights, or if they will take the bad laws which deprive us of our rights. If they take the good laws they will show their honesty and their desire to meet the views of the people of that country. If they take the bad laws, which a court of justice would set aside if they were appealed against, if they take ordinances which are illegal and unconstitutional, what will be said in the country? They will say that the paternal government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that man who stands up to fight the battle of his religious compatriots in the Northwest, has set aside the good laws of the Northwest and has taken up the bad laws, that instead of the bread for which the Roman Catholic minority asks, he has given them a stone. That is the skeleton of which the hon. Secretary of State spoke a few days ago that is given to the Northwest. I hope this Senate will not endure such an outrage, and that a majority will be found to accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Alexandria, who chooses as an honest man to take the federal law and the ordinances which are the consequence of that federal law as a basis for the rights of the Roman Catholics for ever. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, you will declare that amendment carried.

The CHAIRMAN—Whatever the House decides.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Judging from appearances everybody in this House favours the amendment.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—This Bill has been discussed on a very high plane, on lines which with slight exceptions are very commendable. I feel just as strongly in favour of separate schools as does my hon. friend from Alexandria, and that the Roman Catholic people of the country should have a right to educate their children as they think proper.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear, but they are not allowed to do so by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The first right of education belongs to the parents. The hon. member from Alexandria has spoken of the law in Ontario. In this province the Minister of Education has the right to say what text-books shall be used not only in the public schools but in the separate schools, and they have always been careful to use the text-books which would make the scholars most efficient. You may fairly expect that whatever Minister of Education may be in office in these new provinces will see that the best school books are used. We have a Bill before us which guarantees separate schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have nothing at all.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The principle of separate schools is on a foundation which cannot be uprooted. The new provinces will have no power to amend the law in any way to prejudicially affect the Catholic population, but they can make the schools more efficient than they are at the present time. If the separate schools of Ontario had been left as they were in 1863 what kind of schools would we have to-day? The provincial parliament of Ontario, seeing that the schools were not efficient, went on improving them year after year. There was an amendment in 1877, another in 1879 and another in 1886, until they have made the separate schools of Ontario what they are to-day. Are we to expect that the legislatures of the new provinces will be content to do less than Ontario did? I do not think we need have any fear in that regard. So long as the principle of separate schools is recognized and separate schools are to be established you may rest assured that the legislature will see that they are maintained in as efficient a shape as possible.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What are separate schools?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—They are not non-sectarian schools, such as many have asked for, but schools where religion is taught. I am only sorry that other denominations do not feel as keenly as Catholics do about religious instruction in the school.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman contend that Catholic schools are not sectarian schools?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—All schools where religion is taught are sectarian schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is a separate school?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—A school where religion is taught.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Take the Protestant schools in the province of Quebec, they are separate schools and they are not sectarian schools.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—A separate school is a school where people who want religious instruction for their children can have it. If they do not want it they need not have it, but if they desire it they can have the privilege of getting it. With reference to the text-books, I say the trustees and the Catholic teachers can be depended upon that only suitable books for the children are used. They all have to take the one examination; they must have uniformity in most of the text-books, but they must not teach that which is objectionable to any in the community. I feel just as strongly in favour of separate schools as anybody.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Then why not support an amendment which gives the privilege to the trustees of selecting the books.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The trustees have a right to say what education shall be given to the children in these schools, and we have the principle of separate schools, which we would not have had without this clause. I do not want to discuss this question from a political standpoint. I know there has been a little of that on both sides in the discussion. No one party is altogether right or altogether wrong. We have found in both political parties men who have stood above appeals to sectarian prejudices. No one particular party has a patent right to tolerance or intolerance in this country. We have before us a Bill in which the separate school principle is embodied, and it should be satisfactory. We will be satisfied to leave the rest to the people of the Northwest Territories. The hon. gentleman from Calgary told us the other day that it is only a skeleton. I tell him that is a solid foundation, and if he will go to the Northwest and tell the people that the minority in those new provinces are not getting their rights, he can inspire the people to do justice. The hon. member from Wolseley told us that the concession in this clause was a mere pittance. I say to him: Go up to the Northwest and preach that doctrine, and I have every confidence that if these hon. gentlemen would speak there as they have spoken here, the majority of the people in that region will deal, not only justly, but generously with the minority. The Bill, as it is, is the best we can obtain under all the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I want to add a few words to what I said in answer to the hon. gentleman from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan). We have a Board of Education in the Northwest Territories, in whose hands I understand the selection of books will be placed. On this Board of Education we have two Catholic members and two Protestant members.

Mr. McMILLAN—Where is that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is an advisory board.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Without a vote.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Who has the selection of the text-books? Is it not the Minister of Education? If there is any objection to the books, the trustees can reject them. My contention is that the two Catholics on the board can object to anything they think should not be used in the separate schools, and such books can be put out. If they are not put out by law, the Catholics have the privilege of appealing to the government at Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The two members on the board are advisory members. They have not a right to vote. They may give their advice, and it may be taken or not.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—The hon. gentleman will remember that we had at one time a superintendent of education in Ontario who acted in like manner. He sent to the separate schools books which were objectionable, and we very easily got rid of them; and in these new provinces the same thing can be done.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But we have separate schools in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—You have them in the Northwest Territories ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I regret very much that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is absent this evening, because he is a man of broad mind, who does not want to choke off discussion. In opening his speech he stated that this hon. body was entitled to a full and free expression of its views in regard to the position of these two provinces and he invited not only on his own part but on the part of the government a full and free expression of opinion from the members of this House in regard to the Bill now before us. Although he gave that invitation I did not consider it necessary that he should have done so. It is within the rights and privileges—more, within the duty—of every hon. gentleman in this House to express his opinions and views in regard to public measures brought before parliament, and which deal not only with temporary matters but matters to be permanent in the history of our country ; and I am not to be told as certain members, even among our own friends have said, that this discussion could be choked off or closed to suit the convenience of any body. The convenience to be suited on this occasion is the convenience of the people whom we represent, and they are entitled to hear from each one of us what we think on this question in whole or in part. To bring myself in order I shall confine myself to what I consider the essential feature of the Bill, clause 17. As members of this House, I do not think we are called upon to criticise very deeply the decisions of the other House in regard to the establishment of these two provinces. I think it falls within the domain and control of the House of Commons to say what ought to be the representation in this parliament, what ought to be the limits of those provinces, what ought to be the rights, civil and political of the people of those provinces. If they had established anything which would constitute a grievance during the existence of that province then it would devolve upon us to remedy what they have done. But on reading that Bill and considering its merits I fail to see that this honourable House has any right to say to the lower House that it has done wrong in regard to the civil, political and material interests of these provinces. But above and beyond the political and material aspects of the question, there arises one more serious, one that affects the life of this country more deeply than Territorial limits, than the question whether there shall be 20 or 25 members and 4 or 6 senators. There lies in this Bill a seed which shall make the provinces of the west a God-fearing country, a country that will respect the laws. On that ground this hon. body who are called upon to safeguard the highest interests of the nation to safeguard the highest morality and all that is noble in a nation, it is our right and duty to say what we think of the measure before us. I salute the entry of two sister provinces into this Dominion. Canada is growing larger and larger, and when this Bill will have passed will be larger not only by territory and population, but larger in liberality and morality. I take my hon. friends from the Northwest as an example of those two essential elements in the development of national life. I take my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Davis) as an exponent of these two ideas which enter into and become the basis of our national life, liberality and morality, and I was proud to sit by him here two or three nights ago and hear him develop the ideas that prevail in the Northwest Territories which unfortunately have no footing and no root in many parts of the province of Ontario. Unfortunately the same liberality, the same spirit of tolerance, which spreads over the prairies of the Northwest does not exist in the province of Ontario. Let the young child give an example to the old one. Let the young child say to the old brother of the confederation, Ontario, that intolerance does not exist on the prairies as it exists in the halls of Toronto, and lodges of Belleville, Kingston and elsewhere; let that go abroad, and Canada will benefit by the new reputation it will obtain that Canada is not only free but tolerant. I thank the hon. senator for the sentiments he expressed on that occasion.

When we establish a new country we have to consider two things. A new country means a new society, and what is society? Human society is based on two elements ; first, on mutual respect of one for another—that regards the civil right of society. I have no right to interfere with my neighbour when he wants to put up a house on his own property, or to act along the material lines of human life. Where the distinction comes in with regard to human society is when civil government has accomplished that end and the material rights of the citizens are protected. The duty of the state ceases there. It can go no further ; but in human society there is another element to be developed, another principle to be asserted before all, and that is the principle or element of spirituality, or what you may call religious life. There the state has no jurisdiction, no control. The state has no right to enter into the home of a man, and tell him to what altar he shall kneel, or what God he shall adore; no right to tell him that he shall live this way or that way; the state has absolutely nothing to do with the religious or spiritual life of human society or of the individual. That is according to natural law. What is society composed of ? Society is composed of the family. The family, multiplied into three or four, forms the village, forms the township, and the village and township form the country, the province, the nation. The basis of the nation is the family, and the king of that family is not the head of the state, but the father. The father is responsible for every child born to him, responsible not to the state, but to a higher authority. I hope we are all Christians in this House. Even those who are not Christians recognize a Divinity higher than themselves, although represented in the form of a serpent or stone statue. The most barbarous people have a divinity to bow down to, recognizing something greater than themselves, and therefore the father is supreme master of his own household. Where does the state step in ? The state can step in on material lines, and say to the father of a family, 'that child of yours must be fed and clothed'; and when the father does that he satisfies his duty to the state. Can the state come into the home of the father and say, 'you shall give that child such instruction such as the state will exact'? The state has no right to do so, has no right to go into the home, and clothe or feed the child so long as the father gives it food and clothing, and the same holds true in regard to the spiritual side of the situation. As long as the father gives the intellectual and moral development, the state has no right to interfere.

If the father is unable to give food and clothing to the child, the state steps in and takes the child and puts it into a place where it is clothed and fed. If the father is unable to give him intellectual or moral training according to his views, according to his conscience, it is for the father to say who shall be his substitute, who shall be his deputy in the matter of education. That state has no right to come into the home of the father and take the child from him and educate it according to the ideas of the state, but the father will say to the state, 'It is true I am unable to educate the child, I am unable to bring him up morally and intellectually, but I ask from the state a substitute who will represent my views and my conscience in the development of the child. There is the correlative duty of citizen and state. That brings me to another point—we are all Christians here and readers of the bible——

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman had better speak for himself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And hon. gentlemen know the first principle laid down by the Saviour of the world who did not ask for anything too much. He said to legislators such as we are, to the people of the world, 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.' Now this question has been debated from one end of the land to the other. It has been discussed in pulpits, in the press, in society meetings and so on, and I ask you as fair witnesses of the fact, has that principle laid down by Christ been observed in the press, been adhered to in the pulpit and exemplified in the state and exemplified by society ? No, it has not. The idea is now that you shall give everything to Cæsar and nothing to God. But it is not all that way in Canada. Canada is a Christian country and I am not speaking as a man belonging to any section of the church, but as a citizen who would like to see my young country grow up along the lines of Christian civilization, and Christianity irrespective of sect or anything of that kind within the pale of that great church, because after the study of religion I find Buddha and Mahomet, who tried to elevate human life and make it better than it was, and inculcate good principles into it, never attained the same results as Christ has through the system of Christianity. As a student of history, wishing to see my country prosper, wishing to see it happy, and hoping that we shall avoid the troubles which afflict France and Russia and other countries, I ask this House to say that the best kind of civilization that can be followed for the happiness of our young people is along the line of Christianity. But how are you going to follow the line of Christianity if you do not begin at the beginning. I am not going to deal with the constitutional and legal aspects of this question. Hair-splitting in constitutional and legal arguments does not appeal to the Canadian people, but what appeals to the Canadian people is what touches their hearts and what will give them courage to fight the battles of Canada. It is not necessary to know whether the clause is to be interpreted according to the view of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry or the hon. gentleman from Calgary. What the people of Canada want is a Bill that will allow their children to grow up as they have grown, according to the will of God, for their own benefit, for their own interests and for the sake of our country; and notwithstanding the agitation which has been carried on in Ontario during the past six months, unfortunately for the reputation of our country, the people of Canada as a whole are tolerant, are fraternal, are brotherly. Need I appeal for proof to the past elections? Need I appeal to the city of Edmonton, who said to the people of the East: 'You know not what you are doing.' You appeal to us to set aside what is right and just. We will have nothing of it;' and they elected by acclamation a minister of the government responsible for this measure. Then we come further east to London and North Oxford, and there the appeal is made through the great enlightened press of Toronto, the Toronto 'News,' the editor of which paper ought to have known better, and through even our own Toronto 'Globe'—as an ex-Minister of Finance said in a moment of weakness it fell—through the 'Mail,' and through all the other organs of our opponents, they made the most fierce appeals to reject this Bill creating two sister provinces. They were willing to drown these provinces, and cast them aside, because in this Bill there was a little clause giving to the people of the great Northwest a right to teach their children that there is a God over the destinies of Canada, a right to feel that during these hours morality and religion should predominate as against mathematics, and history. And what was the voice of these people? The appeals to London and North Oxford were 'Keep God out of the schools. We do not want Him in the schools. If you allow God in the schools the Pope will come over here and rule.' Allow me to pay my tribute of homage and admiration and respect to the electors of London and Oxford. They have given this young Canada of ours a lesson of tolerance notwithstanding that the fangs of bigotry were plunged into the body politic of this country. These fangs were unable to reach the heart of the people, and the electors of those constituencies sent here to represent them two men who stand by the Bill—a Bill not perfect as regards clause 17——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, no.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I stated that if I had anything to say in this honourable House it would be because I considered the Bill inefficient and incomplete, and I give my reasons for voting for a measure that is inefficient and incomplete. It is because among the many civilized countries we are practically alone to-day on this American continent in that we recognize the Divinity in our schools in some degree. We are alone compared with France—I will not say England, because she has too much common sense to drive God out of her schools. But we have in this clause the last vestige of the Divinity recognized by a Canadian parliament, and as the sun shines through a pin-hole in the wall and enlightens and illumines the cell of the prisoner, so by this clause the Canadian government maintains the right of the divinity, maintains the right of God to a place in the schools, even if it is at half past three in the afternoon. It is a pin-hole through the wall, and the day will come when that wall will be removed from its place to allow the full light of God to illumine the schools of this country, public or otherwise. I am not here to-night to advocate separate schools. And why? We in the minority will have separate schools in spite all the opponents of those schools can do. If the state were mean enough to deprive us of that right we would have courage enough to advocate the right of educating our children according to the principles of the decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount. We do not ask you for separate schools; we are prepared to pay for them as is being done in the United States by millions and millions, the same as they are doing in other countries, although not in England. The treasury of England pays for Catholic and Protestant schools. They have done so in other countries and they will do so here if necessary. I say that on this question there can be no two opinions. I am not pleading for Catholics. I am pleading for the masses of the Canadian people. I have in my hand the opinions of statesmen, the authority of Protestant bishops, the authority of the Protestant press, and the history of all that has occurred in the United States. I am here to-night to tell you that a system of schools where the teaching of the gospel is excluded is a system that will lead any nation to ruin and destruction. Canada is to-day in the throes of this agitation, and it is not because the Canadian people wanted it. May I let this honourable House into a secret. Shall I let this country into the secrets of a confidential mission which was given to me in the year 1889. I think some of the principal parties concerned in that agitation are dead or have ceased to exist in public life in Manitoba, and I will therefore give you the history of the agitation, because I consider that history is to the credit of the Dominion of Canada. In 1889 the Hon. Mr. Mercier was Prime Minister of Quebec, and about that time the agitation was started in Manitoba for the suppression of what they called separate schools. The agitation had gone on for a time in Manitoba, the legislature was to be called and a measure was to be proposed. The Hon. Mr. Mercier, of whom I was a friend—and I am proud to say here to-night that Mr. Mercier was one of the best Canadians that ever adorned Canadian life. He was one of the best friends of his province and of the Dominion; he was the only man that got the seven Prime ministers around his table to discuss provincial affairs and their relations with the Federal power. But in 1889 he said. 'There is something going on in Manitoba and what is at the bottom of it? I want to find out if the people of Manitoba are really spiteful in regard to our rights and interests. I want to find out if Mr. Greenway and his government are undertaking this measure of suppression of Catholic schools through hatred of our race and religion. I went there quietly and ascertained from ex-Premier Greenway, from Mr. Martin, from Mr. Sifton, the ex-cabinet minister, and from Mr. Campbell,—the entire cabinet—that there was nothing in the nature of hate or prejudice, underlying the agitation for the suppression of the schools. I asked the premier: 'What is the reason that you are going to introduce this measure into the House?' He said: 'Mr. Cloran, you can tell the Prime Minister of Quebec, you can tell your friends in the province of Quebec that the Liberal party does not want to be a party to the suppression of the schools, but there is a man in my cabinet who wants to cover his tracks in regard to certain transactions and he has raised this agitation in reference to schools.' I will go further and give his exact words. He said: 'Mr. Cloran, it is a hard thing to say of one's colleague; but Joe Martin is a scoundrel.' Now there is the beginning of the agitation for the suppression of schools, from a scoundrel, so pronounced by the Prime Minister of Manitoba in the month of October, 1889; and when I invited Mr. Martin to the Queen's hotel and asked him why he raised such an agitation, his answer was: 'You can go to——. We can run our own business to suit our affairs.' When I called upon Mr. Sifton in his own office, he declared then to me that he was opposed to the suppression of separate schools. When I called on the Grand Master of the Orange Lodge, a gentleman keeping the largest store in Brandon, he said the separate schools should never be abolished. But, I said to him, then if you as ministers of the government are opposed to it, why do you allow it to go through? His answer was: Is it not better that I should remain at the head of affairs than to allow a man like Martin to become Prime Minister? And I said, 'Yes,' and I went back with that message to the province of Quebec. and laid it before the Prime Minister of the day. Do you know what would have happened if I had reported otherwise? The Hon. Mr. Mercier who was a politician and statesman at the same time—and this may not please my Conservative friends in the House—would have passed an identical measure word for word with the Manitoba measure in the Quebec House—not for the purpose of taking away the rights of our English-speaking Protestant friends. No he would not think of it. It never entered our minds. We are always prepared to give them more than double fair-play—but he would have passed the measure in the Quebec House abolishing separate schools in the province, and separate schools in that province are Protestant schools. I said: 'What will you do that for?' I was not as wise as he was at that time. Why he said, I will force Sir John Macdonald, then Prime Minister of Canada, to disallow my law, and if he disallows my law he will have to disallow Greenway's law.' That was the position. I cite these facts to prove that in the beginning of this agitation the feeling was not as strong against individual rights of Catholics as it was intended to be. It was all the work of a few politicians to cover their tracks, as the Prime Minister of Manitoba at that time stated to me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was never done.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No it was not done, on account of my report that the people of Manitoba as a whole, the representative men from Greenway down, with the exception of Joe Martin, were not in favour of the suppression of separate schools; and if I had been obliged to report that the suppression of separate schools was due to animosity and hatred of Catholics, then the Hon. Mr. Mercier would have passed a similar law, forcing Sir John to disallow his Act and consequently disallow the other Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Everybody in Manitoba was against that suppression and yet the suppression took place.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I stated that the question of education had been considered by very eminent people, and I desire the House to understand that I am not talking from any sectarian point of view but from the broad point of view of Christianity.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. genfleman is talking from my seat.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is a very good seat sometimes. I am talking from a point of view that will appeal to the people of this country, although it may not appeal to a lot of empty benches or to some of my friends who know more about the question than I do. But they will allow me the privilege of talking over their heads to 6,000,000 people of Canada and I shall begin with one who has a continental reputation in this country, not only in the United States but in Canada and probably in Europe.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not referring to Mr. Borden?

Hon Mr. CLORAN—No, he has not been able to express the views this man gave utterance to. George Washington, on his retirement from public office said, in his farewell address:—

> Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political morality, religion and morality are indispensable supports.

Remember these are George Washington's words, (Counsel of wisdom). He proceeds:—

> In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labour to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politicians, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them.

How many pious men throughout this country and the United States do not cherish these principles. It is no later than last week in the conference of a church a bishop said,——

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—What church?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I think it was the Methodist or Baptist. I am sure it was not the Episcopalian. Last week a bishop declared under his mantle, before his colleagues in the ministry, that nothing of religion should be taught in the schools, that all should be public, that God should not be mentioned. Washington foresaw that 125 or 130 years ago. He said that not merely politicians but pious men should respect and cherish these principles of morality and religion in education. He also said:—

A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice ? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

These are the words of a man who has founded the most prosperous republic the world has ever seen. Unfortunately the children of that republic have not followed out his advice and his precept—unfortunately, not for him, but for themselves, these precepts laid down by the founder of the American republic have not been carried out in their system of public education, and here let me say that the Prime Minister of this country as well as the Secretary of State were perfectly justified in alluding to the condition of things in the United States and trying to prove that the moral condition of things in the United States was largely attributable to their system of public schools. They were more than justified, and I have in my hand the authority of bishops, of the 'Protestant Press' and of the presidents of different universities at Harvard and Yale, telling the people of the United States to be on their guard against the irreligious and godless instruction given to the youth of the United States. We find the press of Canada inveighing strongly against the Hon. Secretary of State and the Hon. Prime Minister of this country for having asserted things about a neighbouring country, saying that they were going from bad to worse in regard to the moral development and practices of the United States people. Not that we on this side of the line are going to claim any palm of virtue higher than theirs; but in argument it is allowable to refer to this matter, and the press in this city have thought fit to write as follows :—

The Public Schools and Religious Education.

It was fearful to eliminate the name of God from the schools as in the United States, and it led to murders and other crimes. There was no country where more improper practices were carried on than in the United States.—Senator Scott, in support of motion for second reading of Autonomy Bills in the Senate.

This is taken from the 'Journal,' and that paper comments as follows:—

In using this language the Secretary of State evidently though he could not do better than follow the example which the leader of the government set when introducing the Bill in the House of Commons. Whether, however, Sir Wilfrid will thank him for so close an imitation of what he cannot after reflection have regarded as a very successful portion of his own speech, is a little doubtful. The general view of the Canadian press was that such reflections upon the policy in the first place, and the moral condition in the second, of a neighbouring country, with which it is important we should maintain relations of mutual friendship and respect, were not in the best taste. Senator Scott either did not see or did not heed such criticism, for his language is, if anything, a shade stronger than that of his leader. Canada is in these days making a loud bid for a degree of political independence only short of national sovereignty ; and it would be more in keeping with her claims if her leading public men showed that sense of responsibility in their remarks about other countries which the public men of sovereign nations usually exhibit.

The hon. Secretary of State did not go beyond the truth one iota when he stated that the principal men of the United States, the leaders of thought in the United States, the men who are aiding in the development of the United States, are the men who declare the system in the United States based upon irreligion is a system that is bringing down the nation every day, corrupting its youth and leading it astray. Take the ex-minister of China; he is a pretty good judge. This is what the ex-Chinese ambassador at Washington, Wu Ting Fang, Chinese Minister to the United States, said at Philadelphia, April 2, 1902 :

I have visited many of your colleges and schools. My candid judgment compels me to say that there is something here that is lacking. Unless that I am grievously mistaken, your system of education is directed merely to mental training. In America you have in your educational system everything but moral training.

The representative of four hundred millions of our fellow-men in the great East, Wu Ting Fang, tells the United States people in the city of Philadelphia, that they had everything in their schools except morality. What can you expect of youth where there is no morality ? Can you get honest men? Can you get fair honest lawyers ? Can you get scrupulous doctors ? Can you get bankers who will not rob banks and wreck them ? Can you get men on whom the United States can rely ? The Chinese Minister tells the people of the United States that the only thing lacking in their education is morality. Let us see what the little Jap. says. I do not suppose any body will laugh at the little Jap. He is the predominating figure in the east, and perhaps will become so in the west also. The little Japanese ambassador to the United States says:

> You teach too much mathematics.

And he is no bad judge. The last two years and a half have proved to the world that if there is any student since Cicero who is worth anything it is the Jap. He has learned more in twenty-five years than any other race. He knew nothing thirty or forty years ago in regard to warfare, manufacturing or commerce. He knew very little outside of his own home, and I say to-day that the best student we have ever seen is the little Jap, learning all that we know, learning all the arts of war and peace. The little Jap who thirty years ago was unknown and unthought of, is to-day able through constant love and fidelity to his country, to take a foremost place; and although his God is not ours, our people look to the Jap for an example now. What has made him victorious throughout this war? Is it not the fact that he cares not for death, because he dies for his ancestors and dies for his God. The Jap spoke as follows:

> You teach too much mathematics. In Japan we teach our children manners.

And that is what the Hon. Senator Sullivan advocated the night before last. The little Jap continues:

> Then we teach them morals. After that we teach them arithmetic, for arithmetic without manners and morals makes men and women sordid.

There is the line of public education in Japan to-day creating one of the foremost nations on earth. They teach their children morals and then they teach them arithmetic, not as we do, not like the United States people, not like the French. We teach them arithmetic, the A B C's, we teach them history, very often false and badly written; we teach them a lot of stuff, and then during the last half hour, when the poor little things are tired, we allow them to know that there is a God and allow them to know that they owe a duty to their fathers and mothers and a duty to the state; and that is what we get and we are thankful for it. Let us take pattern by these people who know not the true God and who have all kinds of gods, but as many as they have they respect them. The Jap proceeds to quote Holy Scripture, and he says:

> Holy Scripture teaches: Train up a child according to his way, and when he is old he will not depart from it.

There is pagan philosophy which should bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every Christian father and mother who says: 'My child, go not to school to learn respect for your Creator, go not to school to learn respect for your neighbor; go not to school to learn manners; go to school and learn your A, B, C's and arithmetic.' Because our government asks this parliament to grant half an hour for the teaching of religion an agitation is raised in this country for which there is no excuse and which is a blot upon the fair name of this country. I say that it is within the rights of each senator to put upon record his views in regard to this matter. They may not bear fruit at the present moment, but in days to come the children of these Doukhobors, the children of these Galicians, the children of these Russians and Mormons, reading extracts from the debates of the Senate will observe that there were men on the floor of this House prepared to stand for the rights of the youth, prepared to stand for what a boy or girl needs; not so much arithmetic, as the Jap says, but what the boy and girl need to know is that over and above all there is a higher authority to whom they owe respect and obedience. In the future days in the Northwest Territories they will pick up the records of the Senate and read the speeches made thirty or forty years previously. How proud we are, old representatives in this Senate, to find glorious passages in the debates of the past appealing to the people for the consecration of the principles of liberty. Are we not proud to read the speeches of Baldwin, Lafontaine, Papineau and others who have illustrated the history of Canada? Let us set an example of toleration and fair-play, of men who want to do for their fellow citizens all that can be done to make them good, moral, God-fearing and patriotic people. I know that I am not speaking to the honourable Senate here to-night, but I am speaking to millions of people who are now inhabiting our country, and the millions who will come to this country in the days to come and letting them know that there was on the floor of this House a man who was prepared to stand up for what is best in human life; for what is best in the building up of the country; what is the best for the youth of our country. I stand here prepared to advocate principles along that line. The debate to-night probably will not convince this honourable House, but it is a question of placing our views on record for the benefit of future generations.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Nobody will read them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not care; 40 or 50 years from now they may be read. My hon. friend from Lauzon has alluded to the part played by the Orange Society in this agitation against Catholic schools. I have great sympathy for these people. I believe the most of them are really sincere, but unfortunately like every other good organization there are spirits that get into them and lead them astray. The Orange order is not an order simply for the benefit of religion or religious purposes. It is largely in the hands of our friends the Conservative party. Consequently, when we charge the Conservative party with raising an unnecessary agitation it is their own fault, because after all it is well known to those who have anything to do with public life in Ontario and Quebec, that the members of the Orange organization are good men 364 days in the year. There is only one day in the year when they get a little excited and it is not their fault, but it is caused by the men who control the destinies of that organization. Am I going to blame them? They are taking human means to accomplish a human end, but if they stop at politics and beat the Liberal party with their regular organizations I would have nothing to say. But to keep up the association there are two or three friends, like Dr. Sproule and others, who go among them and get them to pass resolutions which are diametrically opposed to religious toleration and religious liberty. All I have to say is that these leaders are teaching them a bad lesson, which is calculated to develop ill-feeling in this country. I will admit that we felt sore on account of these protests against our religion, denouncing our method of worshiping God and our class of schools. We have felt bitter in the old days, but for the past 15 or 20 years I take it with the milk of human kindness, and I say, after the twelfth of July all will blow over and things will be the same again. In the meantime I say the leaders of the Conservative party use those good people—and there are no better neighbours than the same men—use them for their own purposes, and when a case crops up they get their lodges together and get some gentleman into the pulpit to make firebrand speeches. I say we do not care in the least for all that they may say or write or protest against. We simply put it down, I won't say to ignorance, but to a little fiery inspiration. Still I say that there are just as good men in the Orange Association as in St. Joseph's or St. Patrick's societies or any other society, but unfortunately they are made dupes of and we used to suffer in the olden days because of it. I remember in the city of Montreal when people could not walk on the 12th July without heads being broken, but in these days the Orangemen may have a procession every day in the year and they will not be troubled. The sun of liberty, the sun of tolerance is rising in the Orange lodges of the world. In Ireland ten days ago one of the grand masters of the Orange lodge, Mr. Sloan, M.P., of Belfast, a member of the Orange lodge met his fellow Orangemen and said: 'Boys, it is time we should bury the hatchet, we Protestant and Catholic have been fighting too long and squabbling too long over matters of no account. Let us get together and wipe out these prejudices of religion.' That is the effect of his speech as reported in our Canadian papers. Let us get together and fight as one man for the liberty of our country, for its improvement and for its welfare. There is the new doctrine that is coming into the lodges of Orangeism, and I welcome that declaration of policy with all my heart. I welcome that declaration of policy from old Belfast, and I hope that the hon. leader of the opposition, who is a power in the counsels of Orangeism in this country will inculcate it into the minds of his followers, that he will get Dr. Sproule, the grand master, to bring it before his lodge and have that principle adopted. Then the empire will be united, then the Irishmen will go to battle, not only with courage, but with pleasure—they never went otherwise than with courage. There are many hon. gentlemen here to-night that are good friends of the Orangemen from one end of the country to the other—I do not hold them personally responsible, but I hold their leaders. And let me refer to what happened here five months ago, at the time I was called to order by my hon. friend from Halifax when this Bill was introduced in the House of Commons by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. To my mind the Prime Minister made a most memorable speech, the most effective and the most brilliant speech ever made by any statesman in this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Except yourself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And if a vote had been taken on that occasion, I venture to say that if clause 16 had stood, there would not have been one man in the House of Commons to vote against it, but unfortunately parliamentary procedure forced them to lay the measure on the table and unfortunately for Canada it gave Dr. Sproule 24 hours to think of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And Mr. Sifton.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I will come to Mr. Sifton. I do not spare a man who inflicts an injustice on any class of population of this country, whether it be Mr. Sifton or Dr. Sproule. Dr. Sproule had 24 hours to consider the questions of Sir Wilfrid's speech. What was the result? Next morning he had his secretary sending out his stereotyped resolutions to every lodge throughout Canada, some 2,000 or 3,000, asking them to denounce in inflammatory language the Bill presented by the Prime Minister, asking them to stand up, if necessary, in arms and rebel against the privileges, what he called privileges accorded under the original clause 16. That afternoon I rose in this honourable House and I attempted to call the attention of the government to the fact that there was a man in parliament responsible to the people who had issued an inflammatory appeal to rise in arms, and I was about to ask the government if they would tolerate such action on the part of any citizens, but before I could get through my hon. friend from Halifax said there was nothing before the House. True, but there has been a great deal before the House since then, and if that agitation had been nipped in the bud we would not have had six months of debate in the House of Commons, never would the seventy-five members of the opposition have bolstered up a debate for five months if they did not have behind them the resolutions from 2,000 lodges. Never would they have attempted to strangle the rights of the minority as far as they could, if that agitation had been nipped in the bud. But no. The procedure in this honourable House, the same as the procedure in the other House, allowed the agitation to proceed, and we are obliged to be here at 12 o'clock at night, a hot summer night, defending the principles for which the government is prepared to stand and which the opposition at the time was prepared to vote for, if it had not been for the 24 hours delay. There is the position in regard to this agitation. I have no ill-will or ill-feeling against these hon. gentlemen at all. They are doing it for a political purpose. If they did not trespass on ground where they should not be, and interfere with the religious rights of others, I would simply laugh the thing to scorn, but after all when you are attacked by no matter how humble a person, you have to defend yourself. I say the Orange Order has nothing to fear from the Catholics of this country, absolutely nothing, neither through the Pope or Monseigneur Sbarretti. They have nothing to fear from the hierarchy in this country, because if there are defenders of liberty in this Canada of ours who uphold the Gospel and want to see the people happy in our midst, it is the Pope and the hierarchy and the clergy of this country and you never hear our hierarchy or our clergy, either monks or sisters, in the pulpit or on the platform, denounce Protestants or dictate to Protestants how they shall send their children to school. No, they occupy their time with their flock. They do not divide their attention. They do not pass their Sundays in making political speeches and harangues. They pass their time in developing the principles laid down by Christ in the gospel. They pass their time in teaching charity, peace and love to all. How often on a Monday morning you find in the press denunciations of the most fierce character delivered from pulpits of all kinds from Toronto, from Winnipeg or from other centres wherever a reporter can find his way. On a Monday morning you are sure to meet with a denunciation of the Catholic people and their way of living and dealing with the children. What have they to do with that? As long as we remain true and faithful citizens of this country, as long as we do not come before the courts of our country, what business is it of theirs? What have these lodges to say in regard to our conduct? This question that has been raised to-day is bound to accomplish great results for the peace and harmony of this country, notwithstanding the contradictory sentiments expressed. When it is all boiled down in the columns of history and considered in cool thought, we will be brothers. We are brothers except on these momentous occasions of the exhibition of bigotry, fanaticism, intolerance, or whatever you may choose to call it. None of that comes from our side. Why do not our brothers on the other side drop it, and give their attention to the material development of the country, and educate their children as they please? We do not interfere with them. But as the father of a family, I say I would rather have my boy and girl follow the example of the little Jap, I would rather have my little boy and girl cultivate manners and morals and nothing else, if they could not know anything else without falling into these errors. I appeal to these people to give to their children the education which will make them solid citizens, responsible citizens, and let me say this; not that religious education is to make the boy or girl perfect. Human nature is weak in youth as well as in old age. You never can get perfection in human life. Moral or religious education does not make the boy or girl impeccable. The girl and boy are liable to fall at any moment, and they do fall, even with religious and moral education, as well as those who have none. But what is the difference? A boy who is brought up in a religious home, whose religious education is maintained in the schools, I say has this advantage over the youth who has not had that religious education. A boy who is brought up in a religious school has received a moral and religious education. Another boy perhaps has no respect for anything but himself. He does not recognize any higher authority than himself. He has no God to kneel to. He has nothing to answer to but his own responsibility and what happens. Two of them go on a lark when they commit some little crime, or a big one. The boy who has no moral responsibility goes home without any fear or compunction, and jumps into bed as if he had committed no crime; while the other who has been brought up in the fear of God, who has committed the same act as the other boy, goes home and feels sorry. He says if I had to do it over again I would not do it. You have a chance of making a good citizen of that boy although he has been guilty of a crime. But as to the other, let every one beware, if that boy enters the medical profession he will be the most amiable instrument in producing to-day what is the ruin of the United States nation, the ruin of France; or he may get into the legal profession and he will swindle his client or if he becomes a banker he will think nothing of wrecking a bank and appropriating two or three millions. There is the position of matters. A boy who has the fear of God in his heart—and he can only have it by constant inculcation—is the man that will become a good citizen in the long run. It is really amusing to hear fathers of good families not only in this House but elsewhere stating that it only takes half an hour to inculcate religion into the soul of a child. At the very same time it takes one or two or three years to teach the child the A B C's, that one and one make two and three and four make seven; and public men, supposed statesmen, want the child to understand and to comprehend and follow the precepts and the principles of the greatest science under Heaven, the most difficult to get at the bottom of, and they give him half an hour in the day when he is tired and used up, while they give him five hours a day to learn the A B C's. In support of the stand taken by the hon. leader of the government in regard to the condition of things in the United States, in connection with the system of public schools I wish to quote certain authorities not in any way connected with Catholic writers or Catholic compilers but all from Protestant authorities, from Daniel Webster and others, and even from President Roosevelt, who spoke before the Long Island Bible Society as follows:

There is in the English language no word more abused than that of education. The popular idea is that the educated man is one who has mastered the learning of the schools and the colleges.

It is a good thing to be clever, to be able and smart, but it is a better thing to have the qualities that find their expression in the Decalogue and the Golden Rule.

There is President Roosevelt talking of his own educational system. I have another extract from Disraeli, or Lord Beaconsfield, as he is called. Lord Beaconsfield said :

A system of national education without religion will produce a national calamity more disastrous to the state than to the church.

In France the people are trying to drive God and His Son out of the school course, trying to drive God and His representatives out of the schools. A disaster will overtake the country, but will not overtake the church for 'the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'

An article by Right Rev. H. Frodsham, who is the Protestant Bishop of North Queensland, in the 'Nineteenth Century and After,' pleads for religious teaching in the public schools of that Australian state. These schools are now thoroughly secular, the Acts secularizing education having been passed in the decade commencing 1870. Says Bishop Frodsham :

In the first flush of victory the exponents of secularism logically excluded everything that might be considered to trench upon the peculiar work of the churches. They were guilty even of the vandalism of excising from the late Mr. Longfellow's 'Wreck of the Hesperus' the verse commencing, 'And the maiden raised her hands in prayer.'

Last week at a conference of the Southern Methodist Society at Alexander, Virginia, the local paper reports that the Rev. Dr. Hammond urged upon the conference the importance of religious education. 'Leave religion out of the education,' he declared, 'and education affords no basis of life.

I quote from a statement by the Rev. Wm. Dwyer, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, on morality in public schools before the Boston educators :

It is possible I know to make a theoretical distinction between morality and religion and there may be some individuals made of better clay than their fellows who are moral without being religious ; but, universally speaking, morality is practically impossible unless it finds its motives in religious truth. The attempt to teach morality in our schools independently of religion will inevitably end in failure. Not one of the methods which educators have proposed can possibly succeed as long as positive religious teaching is neglected.

Now as the introduction of positive religious teaching into the public schools under the present system is impossible, it is evident that the defect which I have tried to point out is radical. To the question, then, as to the means of increasing the moral power of the schools, I must answer that nothing can be done toward this end that will have any efficiency until a radical change has been made in the school system itself, a change that will remove the one obstacle to the true cultivation of the moral character of our children. This may involve more than most Americans are willing to permit. Until the change is made, however, I cannot see how our public schools will produce a moral people.

It is indeed a cheering sign that the subject of moral training in the schools is receiving the serious attention of educators throughout our country. If discussed solely on its merits, without prejudice, the problem which the subject presents will soon be solved to the satisfaction of all our people.

A Protestant minister, the Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., writing in a Protestant contemporary, says :

A young man in a New York town, after two years in a college where there is a learned professor who has written theological books, informed his mother that he no longer believed in her bible or her Christ. He informed her that three-fourths of the students in the college had been turned from faith to infidelity by the teachings of the learned professor, whose personality was so winsome that they could hardly refuse to believe all he said. In another institution of learning a reformed Jew who flatly denies the deity of Christ and has not hesitated to slander the Virgin Mary, conducts the devotional services in the chapel for a week.

So its seems that Catholics are not the only ones that see the danger of entrusting their young men and women to the unchristian influences of the secular institutions of higher learning.

Bishop Grant, of the African Methodist Episcopalian Church, said at the opening session of the Indiana conference on September 24, 1903 :

Say what we will the Catholic Church is wise in providing their own schools to educate their children. They tax themselves from $2 to $2.25 to support these schools. We must learn a lesson from them and build and support our own schools thus seeing to the religious training of our children.

Rev. Dr. John H. Burrows, said to the Christian Endeavourers, at Detroit :

In France the state schools have proved a prodigious ethical failure, because the highest truths and motives of action were not inculcated in them.

He added :

Criminal statistics, in France as well as in America, indicate that there is a horrible failure somewhere in the education of youth.

The 'Methodist' writes editorially, as found in the 'Literary Digest,' Vol. VII., No. 7, p. 181 :

In our judgment the denominational schools of the land as compared with the purely state schools, are, on moral grounds incomparably the safest. Our state institutions, as a general thing, are the hot-beds of infidelity not less than of vice. We have said and we thoroughly believe that our church should invest $10,000,000 in the next ten years in denominational schools. Why ? Because we believe that this system is the American one and the only safe one.

The 'Christian Union,' as found in 'Literary Digest,' as above, (Independent) says :

The time has come for a vigorous war upon the popular notion that religion can be excluded from any system of education. The secularization of the public schools is false in psychology. It assumes that a child can be divided up, like a tenement, into different rooms, part developed and part left undeveloped. This is not true. It assumes that religion is something apart from life. This assumption of religion is wholly pernicious.

The 'Outlook,' a prominent Protestant Journal, says editorially :

Most of the graduates of our schools and colleges pass through a course of study in which religion is ignored. Its place is largely taken by philosophy and ethics, the result is that the student learns to know, think, and feel independently of any recognized religious element. Religion which is at once the mainspring of life, is suffering from a disaffection which arises from the present isolation of religious instruction.

The 'Churchman,' (Protestant Episcopal) says editorially :

Of one thing we are sure, if we leave God and Christianity out of the daily round and common task of the school it will be the rare home and exceptional Sunday school that will supply the deficiency and the state will suffer in its citizenship.

The President of Harvard University is at present reviewing the educational progress of the nineteenth century, and The 'Lutheran' of January 14th, 1904, gives the following glimpses in advance of the progress he is making. The President of Harvard says :

It is indisputable that the country has experienced a profound disappointment in the results thus far obtained from a widely diffused popular education. We have not escaped an increase of crime and insanity. The popular taste for immoral and unwholesome amusements is stronger than ever. It is well enough for us to say we cannot be responsible for the sins of the nation, that the hopes of the fathers were over-sanguine and that the work of the school must be much more limited than the assumption described. But even with the limits which we of the schools assume to be our field, our own men say we are not efficient.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

The correspondent of the 'Lutheran' who reported the above, commenting on it, says :

Does not all this mean, in brief, just what the church (Lutheran) is always urging, that education needs to be supplemented by religion ? That spiritual culture can alone save America from heathen vice.

The following words by Arthur T. Hadley, L.L.D., President of Yale University, were part of an address delivered by him on the 160th anniversary of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, and never before published until found in the 'New York Independent' of December 31, 1903. In part he says :

There are two extreme views concerning the effects of education on public morality. One is held by the advocates of separate schools ; the other is held by the advocates of church schools. The advocates of secular schools believe that good teaching will of itself make good citizens. They hold that a large part of our vice is due to ignorance ; and that if you remove the ignorance you will do away with the vice. Up to a certain point all this is true. When you teach your man to write you make him less liable to commit larceny, but you make him much more liable to commit forgery. When you teach a man political economy and law you lessen the temptations and opportunities for acts of violence ; but you do not lessen those for acts of fraud. Few of us who have looked into the statistics of education and crime are optimistic enough to deny that they are quite disappointing. The improvement due to the removal of illiteracy amounts to something, but does not amount to so much as we should like to see, or as was promised by the early advocates of our public school system. The opponents of that system often point to these statistical results with ill-concealed satisfaction. They say that such consequences are just what you might expect from any system of purely secular education. They would have the training of the intellect supplemented by a special system of religious education, which should teach the pupil to use his knowledge for the service of God and the benefit of his fellowmen. They look with great apprehension upon the spectacle of free citizens trained in the knowledge of many things, which may prove of use to them individually, but not trained in those ideas of religion and morality which have been rightly regarded as essential to the safety of civilized communities. I confess that I share some of the apprehension of those advocates of church schools : but I am very far from agreeing with them as to the proper remedy. I believe that both in school life and in after life the moral training and the secular training must be so interwoven that each becomes part of the other.

The President of Princeton says in advocacy of the religious idea :

A father may well feel that his son's refined demeanour would be a poor off-set for his loss of religious faith.

President Hyde, of Bowdoin College, said before the Massachusetts Teachers' Association of Boston, November, 1896:

The public school must do more than it has been doing if it is to be a real educator of youth and effective supporter of the state. It puts the pen of knowledge in the child's hand but fails to open the treasures of wisdom to his heart and mind.

Dr. Butler, of Colby College, Maine, says:

We are beginning to see, that it is as unscientific to ignore the moral and religious element in education as it would be to ignore the facts of physiology, hygiene or psychology. Morals and religion are just as much a necessary part of human life as digestion or sleep. If you do all else and neglect the part that has to do with the sense of individual responsibility to one's fellowmen and to God, you run immense risk, not only of making all else useless, but of making it a positive menace to self and society.

Professor Brumbaugh, former commissioner of education to Porto Rico, said recently before the Philadelphia Mothers' Club:—

All persons are divided into three classes—immoral, moral and religious. The immoral person lives below his best thought; the moral person lives up to his best thought; the religious person is willing to accept a guide above thought. Religious principles should be taught in the public schools. A child should be taught reverence for religious things from his earliest period of consciousness.

Dr. Levi Seeley, of the State Normal School, Trenton, N.J., says the more educators come to realize that there is a philosophy of education, the more profoundly convinced are they that there is something radically lacking in the American School System.

The same Dr. Seeley, said in the 'Educational Review,' for February, 1898:—

A little less than 50 per cent of all the children in our country frequent any Sunday school. The meaning of these figures is simply overwhelming. More than one-half the children of this land now receive no religious education. Even this feature does not show all the truth. It seems to admit that those who attend Sunday school are receiving proper religious instruction, but every one knows this cannot be granted.

E. D. Ward, of Washington, D.C., in a letter to 'The Churchman' (Episcopalian), dated, April 23rd, 1904, says:—

I never pass one of the Roman Catholic church's many institutions for the education of her children without doing inward obeisance to her wisdom and faithfulness in regard to this all-important duty; or without an ardent longing that our own beloved branch of the church Catholic could have her eyes opened to the great work that she could and should do in the same field.

In the public schools we are confronted by the problem, How much and what religion can be taught? The sacred beliefs of the Christian clash with the heresy of the Jew and the unbelief of the atheist. Consequently, religious instruction, or even observances, have to be done away with or reduced to the minimum. With what results? We have hardly begun to appreciate them yet, though they are already clearly visible around us.

The Roman Catholic church regards this state of things and makes her protest; then, quietly and without loss of time, goes to work to do the only thing that is to be done, erects her own schools and provides her own educational requirements. With what results? Clearly are they, also visible, in her growth and vigour. She reaps abundantly that which she has wisely sown. Do we need to hear again the saying of the wise man of old, 'Give me your son till he is ten years old, and you may have him for the rest of his life.'

Do we of the Protestant Episcopal church think it a small matter that the youth of the church or the nation be trained up in schools in which the Christian faith is not taught as the all-important element of education? Or is this the time that religious instruction in schools can be safely done away with, when the demands of business and society are making heavier and heavier drafts upon the time of the parents of families and the burden of all instruction, moral and spiritual, as well as mental, is being cast more and more on the teacher and master?

Addressing the Newman Club of Los Angeles, Cal., recently, Charles F. Lummis, the well known editor and writer, who is not a Catholic, delivered a ringing address. Among other things he said:—

The fact is that the Catholic church and its schools are the pioneers in Indian education in America. It was not until 1807 that an English speaking person came to Mexico. In 1617 there were eleven Catholic churches in New Mexico, and all had their Catholic Indian schools. The reason why I am opposed to this campaign (against Catholic Indian schools) is because these are the only schools I know of that are doing the Indians lasting good. Not because of the religion, which is nothing to me, although it is the Indian's religion to a great extent. I do not believe that one should be taken from his father's faith or his mother's faith for the whim of a school teacher. I am judging by the long results. I have not known a child from a Catholic school who had forgotten his parents or his language. I have not known any of the girls that have gone wrong in the Indian towns to have come from a Catholic school. Not one. But I have known a good many from Carlisle and other government schools. Go with me to that exquisitely neat and motherly school of Sister Margaret, at Bernalilo; go with me to the Albuquerque or to the Santa Fe school, and then let a man of the world judge which of those he would choose as a place for his children. If there is any motherly heart in the world, when mothers and fathers have fled away, it is the sister of charity. There is something unselfish in that work of love. But I have learned some things of experience. In boyhood I thought they were terrible, but I have seen, when the black 'vomito' raged in tropics, and mothers and fathers fled away from their own children and people fell in the streets, those daughters of God picking up the deserted dead and dying. And I have felt their tender mercy myself, and when a man comes to me and says that a child—or a dog—had better be taught by a politician who is rewarded by a place in a government Indian school than by a sister of charity, he wants to bring his fire escape with him, that's all. And it seems to me that any American, not to say any Catholic American, could not better employ part of his money than in aiding the support of the Indian schools conducted by these noble and unselfish women, now frowned upon and even actively antagonized by the partisan spirit of our politicians.

At a recent meeting of the Milonian Society, a teachers' club of Brooklyn, Principal D. Claire, of public school No. 211, gave a summary of the most important criticisms of the public schools. Here is an extract from his paper:—

Fighting Bob Evans criticises New England education, our model, in unfitting boys for manly labour. Each morning he says at the Boston navy yard gate came a big line of well-dressed boys with shabbily clad parents, begging me to enlist them as apprentices to save them from the pool-rooms and worse. There were fellows ashamed of their honest parents who had pinched themselves that their offspring might dress like gentlemen. I almost had in my heart the hope that every high school would burn to the ground and every boy and girl would be compelled to work with their hands to make a living as their parents did before them.

Rabbi Hirsch (there are other prominent writers who concur) declares that our present education fails to produce moral fibre. Crime is increasing. Forgers are good penmen. Actors of immoral plays are good readers. Writers of lewd books are masters of rhetoric. Illustrators of obscene literature have been taught how to draw. Embezzlers are skilled mathematicians. All of the arts we teach in school are capable of making vice and crime more effective. The moral balance is lacking. Without it, education is not only a failure; it is in too many cases an evil success.

Judge Fenton, of Boston, says literacy is not enough: I do not ask the criminals any longer: 'Can you read and write'? Every one can do that now. They have all been to school. The outside of the cup and the platter have been cleaned. The times demand a vital reform. Education is ready for a complete revolution.

Editor Edward Bok tells his readers every month that it is putting the truth mildly to state that, of all the American institutions, that which deals with the public education of our children is the most faulty, the most unintelligent and the most cruel.

The men who speak out thus are not Catholics, and their criticisms cannot be disposed of in that old-fashioned way of saying that Catholics never have a friendly word for the public schools. Protestant critics are now emphasizing the weak points of the system. It is noteworthy that they almost all agree with the Catholic critics.

Catholics may not be aware that the late Marcus Alonzo Hanna was really a staunch advocate in high places of the claim of the Catholic church. P. J. O'Keefe, tells of some rare compliments which Mr. Hanna paid to our faith. Some three years ago President McKinley was particularly anxious to learn the Catholic view of the administration's policy in the Philippines. Mr. Hanna introduced, at a special audience, his life-long loyal friend, Rev. P. M. Flannagan of Chicago, saying:—

Mr. President, I know this man well and can vouch for who and what he is and the great service he has rendered to his church and country; and I want you to bear well in mind his words. And I will go further, Mr. President, and say to you that the day is not far distant when we shall have a greater crisis in this country than that we just passed through. The Catholic church has at all times furnished some of the most loyal defenders of our flag, but look we to it to do more. The day is coming when treason will rear its head and socialism become rampant and in that hour, Mr. President, (and I am not afraid to say it here or elsewhere) the flag must rely on its staunch friends, and among them, in my opinion, our greatest protectors will be the Supreme Court of the United States and the Roman church.

And again, speaking to a particular friend in most scathing terms of the socialistic agitator and anarchist, Mr. Hanna paid this tribute:

There is a crisis coming on which will have to be met, and the sooner the better. There is no place, and there must be none, in the country, for anarchy and treason. In this connection I once said that in the day of trouble the United States must look to the Supreme Court and the Roman Catholic church. I will go further now and say that I believe the best friend and protector the people and the flag of our country will have in its hour of trial will be the Roman Catholic church, always conservative and fair and loyal. That is the power I look to to save the nation.

Wherein, then, does the Catholic Church possess that wonderful power for good which this late lamented and great statesman attributed to her? Certainly in this one fact, that she teaches her children from infancy both in her schools and in her churches that all power and authority of state justly exercised is from God. Herein she has the ear of her children, herein she has the power for good which Mark Hanna attributed to her—and for this she is admired by many, envied by some, a blessing to all and the hope of our nation.

The great Mr. Gladstone said:

Every system of education which leaves out religious instruction is a dangerous system.

Gentlemen, take that home and sleep on it to-night, and see if the government of Canada has done too much for the Northwest. Ask yourself in your consciences if by clause 17 the Canadian government has outraged the constitution of this country. in providing that the children of the intelligent people of the Northwest may learn to worship God and live with Him and by Him and learn His commandments. Ask yourself if Sir Wilfrid Laurier has given too much to the people of the Northwest or that he has coerced the people of the Northwest, and you will say to-morrow, 'No, he has not given them enough, but we will vote for it as the best we can get.'

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

On clause 17,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to this clause as it is framed. It says:

(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.

This is a change in the British North America Act. What does the British North America Act say? It says:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools.

I call the attention of the honourable House to the change of the British North America Act. By this clause the father of the Bill has done away with denominational schools and substituted for those schools the separate schools. I contend that the denominational schools and separate schools are not the same thing at all. If you look at the British North America Act you will find by subsection 1 that it deals with denominational schools, and it declares that everything that is enacted against denominational schools which any persons have by law in the province at the union is unconstitutional. Nothing of the kind is provided by the British North America Act in regard to separate schools. Subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council.

So that there is this difference. The British North America Act by the first subsection assures the existence of denominational schools where those denominational schools exist in the province when the province comes into the union and when it is recognized by law. Subsection 3 of the British North America Act deals with separate schools, and provides that in regard to all separate schools existing at the time of the union or which may be acquired after the entry of the province into the union an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council if anything is done against the rights which have been acquired by the minority in regard to such separate schools. So that you have the two things, the denominational schools recognized by subsection 1, and the separate schools recognized by subsection 3. In the Bill which is presented to us to-day, the first clause of the British North America Act is mutilated, and in place of recognizing the denominational schools the Bill declares that it shall be separate schools. I think that may be an oversight.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that done intentionally ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is really no distinction. The British North America Act speaks in two other places of separate schools but different terms are used. In the Manitoba Act we also changed the wording of the British North America Act in reference to that word 'practice.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not admit that at all. I contend that the British North America Act by subsection 1, deals with denominational schools and by subsection 3 deals with the other. A denominational school is not a separate school, neither is a separate school a denominational school. The words are not synonymous. A denominational school is a school in which the principles of a denomination are inculcated into the pupils' minds, but a separate school is quite different. A separate school may be denominational and it may be undenominational. Take for instance the law as it exists now in the Northwest Territories. In a district where the Catholics are in the majority, their school may be denominational then the school of the minority shall be a separate school. It may be a separate school, but it will not be a denominational school if it gives no religious teaching. Take now the province of Quebec; a school in any one of our townships where the Protestants are in the majority, or in Ontario the public school would be a neutral school, a school in which no religion is taught in any way. Where the minority are Catholics the school will be a separate school, but at the same time it will be a denominational school where religion is taught. So that there is a marked difference between separate and denominational schools. It is not the same thing, and by the first subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act, every province in the Dominion is granted its denominational schools, except the Northwest, where we deny that right to the class of persons who would come under the British North America Act, and we insert the words 'separate schools,' restricting thereby the rights of the minority. Separate schools are given by the British North America Act under the third subsection, and are subject to an appeal to the Governor General in Council who gives the remedy in case of any infringement of rights, but the denominational schools are assured by law against any infringement on the part of the local authority. I move that the words 'denominational schools' be substituted for the words 'separate schools' in this clause so as to put the denominational schools in the Northwest on the same footing as they are in the other provinces of the Dominion. This is an amendment which the government should accept.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is not.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hon. gentleman is pressing very strongly to change the wording from 'separate schools' to' denominational schools.' Does my hon. friend know that there is a Mormon settlement in the Northwest? Is he prepared to extend the same privileges to them?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That will do it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. I will prove the contrary.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—These people have their schools to which they are now sending their children. If you make this change you include them along with the rest.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. The law says: 'Which any class of persons have by law in the province at the time of the union.'

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They will have it under this.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There was never any law guaranteeing them any schools.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They have it by practice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. That word applies to Manitoba, and not to the Northwest. They must have it by law, and I contend that by the law of 1875, those denominational schools were given to the Catholics. They were given to the majority in the Territories where the majority was Catholic and the separate schools were given to the minority in the different school districts. Hon. gentlemen will see that by restoring the word 'denominational,' it cannot apply to Mormons, or Galicians or any other foreigners.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have drawn an amendment in conformity with the utterances of the hon. Secretary of State and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I beg to move:

To strike out the said first subsection and to substitute therefor the following:'

1. In any Act by the legislature of the province, it shall always be therein provided, that the minority or majority in any school district, whether such minority or majority be Protestant or Roman Catholic, shall have the right to have the doctrines of their religious faith, taught during the last half-hour of any school day, to the children of parents professing such religious faith, always provided that teachers, inspection of schools, and examinations, shall be under the control and direction of the provincial government.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is only affirming the principle laid down by the Secretary of State in introducing this Bill, and affirmed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if that be the meaning of the law, why should you leave it open for discussion hereafter. Why not make it plain so that he who runs may read and know what he is doing. It is almost verbatim the language used by the Secretary of State, and if that be the meaning of the clause it should go on record, and be made plain, unless it is the desire to leave it open for discussion in the future and create turmoil.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I give notice that I will move that amendment on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I move that all the words after 'this Act,' in the third line of said first subsection, to the word 'with' in the fifth line, be struck out.

In striking out those words it would put the Northwest under the operation of the Act of 1875. Whatever may be their rights, they might go to court and have them ascertained. If they do not choose to go to court that is the end of it, and if they are satisfied they may go on. If they go before the court, then their privileges and rights may be determined. Whilst if we tie them down to chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances they cannot do anything. We are taking away from them all the rights they have.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that clause 17 be struck out for reasons already stated, that the British North America Act already automatically applies to the subject of education, and that under clause 3 of the Act the provisions of the British North America Act having been applied to the Bill in its entirety render it entirely unnecessary.

The amendment was declared lost on division.

On sub-clause 3,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that this section be struck out and the following be substituted:—

17. Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said province with the substitution for paragraph 1 of the said section 93 of the following paragraph :

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act under the terms of imperial and federal laws, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said laws :

2. In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with said laws, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in said laws.

3. Where the expression 'by law' is employed in subsection 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in imperial and federal laws, and where the expression 'at the union' is employed, in the said section 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

The amendment was declared lost on division.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 24,

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—This is the clause to which I referred the other day with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway exemptions. I just want to put myself on record in reference to this matter. This is a question where I think, perhaps, the members from the Northwest should state their views. I do not know why this clause apears in the Bill at all. If the federal parliament were within their rights in passing the legislation at the time it was passed before, I do not see that it is necessary to have it in the Bill. But I want to say that at some future time a discussion may arise in connection with this matter. The Northwest will have to be relieved of this some day, and it might be held that, it was the duty of the province, or that the province should themselves undertake to negotiate with the Canadian Pacific Railway to get a release of this exemption from taxation. It is a very serious proposition to the people of the west. The federal government gave $25,000,000 towards the building of this road, and we find out—I am not going into the figures, but I have figured it out—that this exemption amounts to more each year than would pay the interest on the $25,000,000. It is taken out of the people of the west. This railway was built for the benefit of Canada as a whole, and that being the case the whole Dominion should when the time comes—as no doubt it will—obtain a release of this. I do not think it should be saddled on the people of the two provinces, because they have no right to pay it. It is the Dominion that should assume the liability.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What does the hon. gentleman want to pay?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If my hon. friend wants to know what we propose to pay I may say this matter was discussed in the other House and the hon. gentleman has read the speeches—

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is proposed to get a release of this exemption—to buy out whatever rights were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company under their contract. I do not think it would be right to make away with that exemption. If parliament wished to exercise the right they could annul that part of the contract between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the country. But I think we must stick to our contract. It will have to be paid in the near future.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman approve of clause 24?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, I do not approve of it at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman will swallow it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE- BOWELL—Is this not asking too much? It is a grave question, particularly the one raised by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I differ from my hon. friend in toto from the view he takes upon the question. The land was not the property of the North-west nor is it now.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The land exemption will work itself out, because the lands will be sold. But that is not the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If they are sold they will be subject to taxation and the Canadian Pacific Railway exemption will cease to exist.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes; but as to the rolling stock and road-beds the exemption still exists.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Unless you want to buy the exemption which exists in reference to the taxation of rolling stock.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, that is it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know why the Dominion government should do that. You would never have got the road if it had not been for the concessions made at the time. The hon. Secretary of State knows the difficulties that they had in trying to get a contractor to build that road. They are aware of the fact that they offered larger concessions than were actually given by the government which succeeded them, and had it not been for these concessions there would be no North-west to talk about—I mean no people there to talk about. However extravagant the terms of building that road were, they were the only terms upon which capitalists could be secured to build that road, and at that time we supposed we were giving very little as far as value was concerned. You could have bought all that land at one dollar per acre, and when $30,000,000 were advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the settlement of that claim they paid back $20,000,000; the government took land back to the value of $10,000,000, at the rate of $1.25 per acre. It does seem to me that this kind of argument and demand is downright repudiation. The land was originally bought by the Dominion as a whole. In securing the construction of the road to unite the Pacific coast with the eastern section of the Dominion, the country was pledged to do what they did, and it was thought a good bargain at the time, but because the construction of that road has made the whole Dominion valuable, and particularly that part of the Dominion, the gentlemen who now occupy the country think they own it. I think that the concessions were not too great and that we ought not to have an agitation as to buying them out. They have a right and we have a road. The road has made the country and we should not grumble about it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Does the hon. gentleman say that road was built for the benefit simply of those two provinces or for the benefit of the whole Dominion?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly not for the benefit of the two provinces alone, because there were no provinces at the time. There were nothing but half-breeds and a few hunters. It was built to develop the country, which it has done.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It was built for the benefit of the whole Dominion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Does the hon. gentleman think the two provinces should be loaded up with an exemption on $20,000,000 of property for the benefit of Canada, without getting something in return ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are not loaded up.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I consider that an exemption which amounts to something over $750,000 a year, with the small population in those provinces, is a loading up. I understand the statement was made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons that in the near future some steps would have to be taken by the people of this country with the object of making some arrangements with reference to that exemption.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was to please the gentlemen from the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. leader of the opposition made the statement that he thought something should be done, that some arrangemnts should be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway, whereby we should get a release of that exemption. So that we have the statement made by the hon. leader of the opposition, and the statement made by the Prime Minister, that they consider it nothing but right that the people should be relieved from that liability, and that something should be done with reference to it. Our object is to put ourselves on record that it is the Dominion government that is responsible and not the people of those two provinces, because we will have two railroads in the future, as I pointed out the other night, and they will build branches all over the west, and the exemptions will be worth more than all the grant we are getting from the Dominion Treasury. In that case I think it would be better for us to go in without a subsidy or capitation tax of any kind, and that we should be relieved of this incubus placed upon us by the government some time ago. This road was built to bring British Columbia into confederation, and to develop the country, and Canada is getting the benefit of it. Canada should undertake the settlement of this liability.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN AUTONOMY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (70), An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Saskatchewan.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will be understood that all the amendments moved to Bill (69) will be taken as moved to this Bill (70).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. It will be understood those amendments will appear in the same order in the minutes with reference to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until 11 a.m. to-day.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, July 18, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock, a.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

OLD AGE ANNUITIES.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN inquired :

Does the government propose to take any action in reference to the subject of granting old age annuities referred to by the Honourable Minister of Finance on several occasions in another place ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This matter has been engaging the attention of the government. Unfortunately, owing to the course of events in the other chamber it has been impossible to bring the matter forward in time to have due consideration bestowed upon it. Had our rules permitted, it would have given me very great pleasure to have introduced the measure in the Senate, and but for the fact that it affects money questions it is a subject which could have been profitably and advantageously discussed here. I may say generally to my hon. friend who has raised the question, that the objects we have in view are briefly these; we desire if possible to place in the power of every wage-earner throughout this Dominion and other parties who choose to avail themselves of it, the means, for a trifling monthly, annual or other payment, of securing to themselves a reasonable provision for an old age annuity. I would beg to observe that our intention is entirely divorced from granting old age pensions. This is to assist persons in purchasing annuities on reasonable terms, and it appears to us by making reasonable provision and in particular by giving perfect security, and perfect immunity to all parties who take annuities from the government, that a very large number of wage-earners might be encouraged to avail themselves of the provisions of such a measure. Of course it would be improper at this period and under the circumstances, to go into minute details as to this matter, but I may state generally that we do not intend to interfere with insurance. That would be quite another matter. This project, such as it is, would have reference to granting annuities after a certain age only, and the annuities would of course be limited. The government would have the advantage of employing their staff, and I think could grant better terms than it would be possible for any company to grant for a double reason, that their expenses would be less, and they would of course demand no profit. I trust that we may be able to submit for the consideration of parliament a detailed scheme early next session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The explanation made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is one that I think will be acceptable to most people in the country. I am very glad to hear that it is not the intention of the government to go the full length that they have gone in New Zealand in this question. While the hon. gentleman said it was not the intention to interfere with life insurance of other companies which sell annuities, they must interfere to a certain extent, for the reason that the establishment of a system of granting annuities at cheaper rates than those which can possibly be granted by insurance companies would be an interference to that extent. However, I do not wish to be understood in making these remarks that that should weigh materially with the government in adopting the system to which he has called the attention of the House. My own view for very many years has been that the government should fifteen or twenty years ago have gone much farther in the way of granting annuities and insuring the lives of the people than they propose even now to go. However, I never could convince my colleagues or the Ministers of Finance of the propriety of adopting a system of such importance, as it would entail a good deal of additional work and responsibility upon those who were conducting the government of the country. There was also a fear of interfering to too great an extent with existing life companies in Canada. One thing is quite clear, that if a system of that kind were adopted and the state engaged to carry on the work of government life insurance, it could be done much cheaper than it is now done by independent companies, for the reason that the expenses attending the management of a company of that kind would not be so great. The government not having in view the object of securing dividends but merely a sufficient income to meet current expenses, could conduct a business of that kind much cheaper; and I should like to have seen a well-devised system of that kind in the interest of the country. It would be much better for those who do insure for the principal reason that it would be a positive assurance of the payment of the policy on the death of the party insured. We have instances of very old and established companies even in Scotland and England, which are supposed to be carried on in the most economical and conservative manner, failing and entailing great loss to those who are insured. The system as foreshadowed by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, will I think be acceptable to the country. However, that is a matter we would be able to discuss when the scheme is before the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I take the opportunity of observing to my hon. friend that the two questions of annuity and insurance would, I think, be better left apart.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think so too.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The insurance question has many complications, as he knows, and there is one thing to be observed in connection with it, that while under the system of annuities if properly worked out no possible loss could accrue to the government; very great loss could accrue to the government if they undertook to insure promiscuously. I am afraid they would get a great many indifferent lives thrown on them. I have carefully looked into the number of annuities granted by the various life companies and I find that they are quite insignificant. Moreover, there would be a strict limit placed on the amount of annuity that would be granted. For these reasons I think it would not interfere to any appreciable extent with the business of existing insurance companies. In that regard I think I can reassure him. I may say this further to him, which he will quite understand from his own practical experience, that when you are dealing with the class that one more particularly desires to benefit, that is the wage-earner, in a general sense throughout the Dominion, two things are necessary. They must have absolutely perfect security. That can only be given in my judgment by the government, and in the next place—and that would be a feature of the scheme—they must be absolutely and completely secure against seizure or against any demands made on the annuity granted by the state under the circumstances. It must be, so to speak, a sort of homestead, a provision that cannot be disturbed, as is the case with pensions granted by the government. Those two considerations I think go far to recommend the project which I may say I have discussed with several gentlemen who stand high in the confidence of the wage-earners. Those two features I think would recommend it very largely to the class whom we desire to provide for. My hon. friend probably knows that in England —and I think the same thing from various causes is likely to occur here—there is an increasing difficulty on the part of elderly men finding employment in many trades, and there is an increasing need, therefore, that opportunity be given them to make provision for their old age.

THE STATISTICAL YEAR-BOOK OF CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

Why discrimination is made against honourable members of the Senate in the distribution of the Statistical Year-book of Canada ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not been able to get any information to reply to this inquiry. I shall endeavour to find out before my hon. friend leaves for home.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may state to my hon. friend what I have found to be the fact, that one copy and one copy only is furnished to each member of the Senate, while five copies are furnished to each member of the House of Commons. I made a complaint a year ago, and Mr. Johnson said that was the rule and he could not change it. Somebody has made the rule, but I do not think it is right. We should get for distribution among those who take an interest in these things as many copies as are furnished to members of the House of Commons.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY IN THE STRAITS OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

Whether it is the intention of the government to have the steamers 'Stanley' and 'Minto' connected by wireless telegraphy with points on the coast of Prince Edward Island and the mainland during the coming winter ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have not as yet been able to call the attention of the Department of Marine to that matter. Perhaps I shall be able to give the hon. gentleman the information at the next sitting of the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The complaint in this case is that while wireless telegraphy has been established between the two boats so that they can communicate with each other, no communication has been established with points on shore, so that when both boats are out there is no way of finding out anything about them. I have been told that the Anglo-American Company made an objection to allowing the government to communicate with the shores. Counsel for the Anglo-American Company assures me that is a mistake, that they have not made such an objection. I want to state that also, but if an objection is made it should not be entertained for a moment, because they have no monopoly and no right to interfere.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will call the attention of the Department of Marine to the matter, and try to get a reply.

SUMMARY CONVICTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (66) An Act to amend the Criminal Code of 1892 with respect to appeals from certain summary convictions.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time at the next sitting of the House. He said: This Bill seems to make some slight changes. I shall endeavour to look up before the next sitting of the House what the changes are.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman should look carefully into this Bill. I am speaking now subject to correction, but my impression is that it contains a provision giving the option to a person who has been arrested for improper conduct at riots the right to say how he shall be tried. Under the existing law the magistrate, I understand, has power to administer the law at once, while the accused under this Bill would have a right to say whether he should be tried by the magistrate or by a jury. To my mind that is highly objectionable. If that is the provision contained in the Bill it will be necessary to consider well the propriety of adopting such legislation. That may not be the effect of the measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A Bill has been passed by the lower House in the line that I have indicated, and at this period of the session we scarcely have time to read even, much less to study the effect it would have; and hence we should be very careful how we proceed. Such matters should be dealt with cautiously.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose before the Bill is brought up for the second reading we will be favoured with a copy?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope so. It is very unimportant.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might not be important for the minister, but it might be important for us.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he is in a position to give me that return I have asked for so frequently since the 11th April last.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have done all I could to get it. Last night I sent a special messenger over to the Department of Public Works, and I repeated the request this a.m. I gave my opinion that the report ought to be brought down, that there was no excuse for holding it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman should inform the department that my hon. friend is determined to delay prorogation until he gets it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman in a position to tell us now when parliament will prorogue?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It depends entirely on the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is for that reason I am asking the opinion of the hon. leader of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not rest with me, it rests with the body of the Senate. The Senate have a right to stay through the month of August, or they can get through the business fairly well to-day. I do not think there is anything contentious that we have not fully discussed which would occupy time, and we might have prorogation to-morrow. Of course there is a good deal of printing to be done, and there are several orders on the paper which have to go back to the House of Commons, and I suggest that we should agree to take up first in order the items to which there is no opposition in order to get rid of them and let those Bill go back to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will not agree to that. Bring down that return and I will consent.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (69) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending it, as follows :—

That the first subsection of section 17 be struck out and the following substituted therefor :

'In any Act by the legislature of the province, it shall always be therein provided, that the minority in any school district, whether such minority or majority, be Protestant or Roman Catholic, shall have the right to have the doctrines of their religious faith, taught during the last half hour of any school day, to the children of parents professing such religious faith, always provided that teachers, inspection of schools, and examinations, shall be under the control and direction of the provincial government.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objection to seconding that motion, but I want it understood that if I do so I shall not lose my right to propose a motion in amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman has to be bound by the procedure of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know what the hon. gentleman intends.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member is always standing on the rules of the House, and he must expect that we will do the same.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That does not throw any light on the subject. I contend that in the Senate any motion may be made without a seconder. I do not object to seconding the motion, but if I do second it, I do not want to lose my right to propose an amendment of my own.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then I ask the Hon. Mr. Wood to second my amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the seconding of a motion to refer a Bill back to committee on its third reading interferes with the hon. gentleman moving or seconding any other amendment if he thinks proper to do so. I know of no rule against it. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley makes a motion to refer the Bill back to committee, to accomplish a certain object. After he has done that and the motion is carried or defeated, then any one can move another motion. I have a distinct recollection of a case of my own where in 1869 on my motion a Bill was referred back to committee three times. It was the Militia Bill introduced by the late Sir Geo. E. Cartier. The seconding of a motion does not deprive any one of the right to move an amendment.

The motion before the House is one that is somewhat of a wide character and would require some little time for consideration before the House could intelligently vote upon it. It seems to me to lay down a plain and distinct principle, and one that is very much in accord with the explanation of the Bill given by the hon. Secretary of State and also by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. If my interpretation of the resolution be correct, it would be only placing in very clear and distinct language the meaning of the Bill itself so that the most illiterate man who could read would be able to understand it. That I believe is the object of the hon. gentleman who has made the motion.

I take this opportunity to call attention to one point of this Bill that has not to my mind been properly discussed. Speaking for myself, I could have no possible objection to a half hour devoted to the teaching of the religion of any class of people at the close of the school in the afternoon, but I do not hesitate to say that it is a mere shadow, that it has no substance whatever. Let us think for a moment. A child has been in school from nine o'clock in the morning until half past three in the afternoon. How many of the children will remain unless they are forced to remain in school for half an hour afterwards, and supposing they do who is to give the religious instruction. Take our own two provinces here, where the schools are very numerous in every town and city. Is there any clergyman, Protestant or Catholic, who will go from school to school to give religious instruction for a half hour every day ? Unless you have a teacher who is of the faith of the parents of the children, who desire them to get religious instruction, you get no religious instruction. I say it is totally impracticable, so far as regards giving religious instruction by a priest or by a Protestant clergyman, for the simple reason that no denomination will keep a sufficient number of teachers to go around from school to school; hence I say it is a fraud on the face of it, so far as the professed intention to give the right to religious sects to impart their doctrines is concerned. I repeat that I do not object to the clause, but speaking from experience in the management of public schools, I say it is a mere shadow, and the man who votes for it on the ground that he is to have his children taught religion is voting for a phantom. That is my honest conviction. I do not purpose to discuss that point further.

I hope my hon. friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) never fancied for a moment that in any remarks I made to himself I implied, much less said, that he had no right to do precisely what he did. If my remarks had the effect of arousing him as they did, I am very glad of it for two or three reasons; I like to hear the hon. gentleman speak, because whenever he gives an opinion or utters a sentence it is evidently done with an earnest conviction of right, and when a man is in earnest no matter how much he may differ from any of our views, it is always a pleasure to listen to him. The hon. gentleman smiles; I do not desire what I have said to be considered flattery.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We agree with you.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman may think it is a sin on a question of this kind to agree with an Orangeman like myself. However, it will not do him any harm. I wish to point out to my hon. friend that I find no fault with him for denouncing the agitations that have taken place either in the province of Quebec or Ontario, or anywhere else. There is a means of expressing one's views without being offensive to those who hold opposite opinions, and that I take to be the true position for any hon. member, especially in this House, to take upon questions of this kind. What I wish to say to the hon. gentleman is that when he wants to refer to this question again, whether in the Senate or before the electors of the province of Quebec, he should avoid attributing to one particular class of people the agitation to which he has called attention. I wish to repeat that in the city of Toronto to which so many references have been made, the agitation was begun by the Toronto 'Globe,' the organ of the party now in power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And the first mass meeting that was held in the city of Toronto was conducted by the leading Liberals of that city.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The petition presented yesterday by his honour, the Speaker, protesting against the Autonomy Bill and praying that it be not passed, was signed by Liberals. There are two names to the petition that I cannot vouch for, but the other petitioners are leading Liberals of the city of Toronto. I do not know whether the other two are Orangemen or green ribbon men, but I want to impress this on the gentleman's mind that it was the Liberals in the city of Toronto who were the loudest in condemnation of this Bill. As for clergymen, take the president of the conference of the church which I attend, an out-and-out Liberal; no one has written more strongly in denounciation of this Bill than the head of the Methodist Church in Canada, Dr. Carman. I do not find fault with him for doing so. If he conscientiously believes that the Bill should not pass, he has a right to say so. I do not find fault with any clergyman for looking after the interest of his church or advocating a principle that is dear to himself or in his judgment in the interest of the country. The Orange order seems to be a ghost that haunts some people from morning until night, among them my hon. friend, yet he is supporting a cabinet one of whose members belongs to that order. The Prime Minister stated on one occasion that there would be no Orangemen in his ranks, and in case his party came to power they would never recognize one; yet we have the Hon. Mr. Emmerson, who is now Minister of Railways and Canals, in Sir Wilfrid's cabinet. In 1893 Mr. Emmerson delivered a violent speech in the legislative assembly in New Brunswick. He is reported, in what is represented as the official record, speaking in reply to a Mr. Pitt, as follows:

As a member of the Orange Order, I do not regard the member for York (Pitt) as a true representative of that fraternity, and I know that the leading members of the order throughout this province favour that belief. . . . . The true principles of that association, to which I am proud to belong, breathe the gospel of peace and harmony.

As that comes from a minister of the crown and a member of the order I hope it will satisfy the hon. gentleman that it is not the raw bones and bloody head that he supposed. Then Mr. Emmerson goes on to say:

I say that I am proud to belong to that order, but I would be ashamed of it if it allowed itself to be governed and guided by hands like his.

He goes on for a number of pages, and to show the spirit which actuated the gentlemen in that House in this discussion it is just as well to refer to the reply of the other gentleman, Mr. Pitt. I do not desire to be understood as even hinting as to which course we should pursue. Mr. Pitt says:

I may be mulcted for costs in a suit in court, it is possible, but I tell the hon. member that though I cannot get satisfaction in any other way that I propose taking that costs out of his hide before he gets out of political life and let him not forget it.

I do not know that we have gone quite so far as that. There are a great many more tit-bits in that speech which I shall not trouble the House with.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—That was merely Pickwickian.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it was—in a place where he knew it could not be resented. There are many brave men of that kind. Now, I want to place on record, for the benefit of my hon. friend from Mille Iles, the opinion of Mr. Fielding, the present Finance Minister, upon the school question. On the 6th March, 1895, at Windsor, Nova Scotia, when he was joining with my hon. friend and with the leader of the present government in denouncing the Remedial Bill, he spoke as follows :

I ask the people of Hants county and the people of Nova Scotia to stand by the principle of free schools in the case of Manitoba, just as they would stand by it in their own province. We in Nova Scotia know the value of a system of free public schools. We have shown in the past that while we may differ on many questions, we are practically a unit in support of that system. If the Dominion authorities should attempt to interfere with our school system, if they should attempt to impose upon this province a system which they are trying to force upon Manitoba, we would expect to have the sympathy of the friends of free schools elsewhere, and we would expect the people of the western provinces to give us their sympathy and support in such a condition. Let us to-day give them our hearty sympathy and support in the struggle until we find that they are not amenable to reason.

Then the hon. gentleman at Windsor goes on further to say :

What can we say of the position of that gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to-day, who, instead of standing up as the champion of a fine school system and resisting those who attack it, scrambles into parliament through the unfair influence of the Roman Catholic pulpits of the county of Cape Breton, and is now devoting the evening of his life to destroying the free school system of Manitoba and forcing upon that province a system which he would not dare to attempt to force upon the province of Nova Scotia?

Then we come to the remarks of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, Mr. Longley——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He has been rewarded with a judgeship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He used the following language at the same time in discussing the school question :

The people of Nova Scotia are tired of their loyalty to the Frenchmen of Quebec, the Indians of the Northwest, and the recently imported pig-tailed gentlemen from China. When we get repeal Nova Scotians will feel the air of freedom once more, and will expand their vitality by free and unrestricted commercial and social intercourse with our brethren to the south of us.

I could occupy the time of the House for a few hours with extracts of that kind, which I have no doubt would be highly interesting to the hon. gentleman whom I am particularly addressing in this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—More !

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No ; I give these as evidence of the spirit which actuated these gentlemen when in opposition and working in the same harness with the gentlemen who are now condemning those who differ from them upon this school question. That is the principal reason why I have taken the liberty of placing these matters on record. I have a pile of extracts here in my hand which I am sure would be interesting to my hon. friend from Mille Iles, if he would like to occupy a few Sundays after church in studying this question. I need scarcely call his attention to other equally important extracts, to the utterances of his friends in the province of Quebec during the late election. I shall not refer to them further than to say that I am sure, with his knowledge of politics in his province and the action taken by those who were fighting what they called the battle of freedom, and denouncing, as they all did, a particular society as being the originator of all this agitation, he will at least on reflection come to the conclusion not to attribute in the future to any particular class of people in this Dominion all the crimes and iniquities he lays to their charge. I have extracts here from the utterances of nearly all the present ministers on the question of separate schools, the Jesuits' Estates Act and provincial autonomy. They all apply, not to provincial autonomy, but to the question of provincial rights, and we may begin with the Hon. David Mills, who spoke very strongly and clearly in support of the action of the government on this question of schools. Then I find extracts from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speeches, and the utterances of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who expressed somewhat strong views. When I heard the eulogy passed on that gentleman for the course he is now pursuing by the eloquent member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) last night, I turned up these extracts from speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman, by Sir Louis Davies, by James Armstrong, another leading Liberal, and Hon. James McMullen, who is sleeping soundly just now.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very sorry I waked him up because I would not like to disturb his peaceful slumber. I have a quotation also from that hon. gentleman's speeches on the question of Provincial Autonomy. Then I have extracts from speeches of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie who took a very decided position on that question. If you will compare their speeches and actions to-day with their record in 'Hansard,' you will find that they oppose to-day that which they advocated when in opposition. They have reformed. My hon. friend from London (Hon. Mr. Coffey) expressed the hope that as I grew older I would follow their example. I always thought that the hon. gentleman had some little personal regard for myself, and that he would not be so hardhearted as to wish to see me deteriorate as I grow older. The older I grow the more I am confirmed in the correctness and righteousness of the principles I have been advocating from boyhood up to this day. If he lives, I hope he will reform from the position he is taking, and will act in parliament in accordance with his record in the paper he publishes. If I reform, it will be in the direction of cherishing a stronger conviction of the soundness of the position I have been advocating most of my life. I have to apologize for the time I have occupied, but I deemed it my duty before this Bill passes the House, to place on record my views upon the 17th clause, and its effect, and also to rebut as far as I could the accusations cast upon people with whom I have been associated ever since I was eighteen or nineteen years of age. I do not wish to be understood as saying that there are not violent men connected with the society and with the party to which I belong, but I say there are equally violent, unreasonable and bigoted men on the other side. Let us try in our intercourse with each other in dealing with these questions in a deliberative body like this to allay such feelings as far as possible. That is the course that I have endeavoured to pursue and that I shall endeavour to follow in the future, without changing the strong views I have on religious or political questions. I have lived long enough to respect the opinions of every one whatever they may be, and I am quite willing—not only willing but anxious to avoid wounding their convictions, provided they let me alone on questions of this kind.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The hon. gentleman has been so courteous that I should like to please him, and to show that I appreciate his courtesy. I think that he was right when he said that I always endeavour to say what I think and do what I believe is right, though naturally I am not always sure that my judgment is sound. In this instance I should like to know what expressions I should withdraw. If I said something that was not right I should like to know it, and will immediately withdraw it. If I understand the hon. gentleman right, it may be that I attributed too large a share in that agitation to the Orange Association. It may be that I did not attribute a large enough share to Liberals like those connected with the Toronto 'News' and the Toronto 'Globe.' The principal point is this; if I said the agitation had been raised by the Orange Association, the hon. gentleman has occasioned some doubts in my mind. If I used the word 'raised,' I would change it and say that I should have said 'intensified', because after all I cannot withdraw anything I said that is true. and what is true is this, that I based my remarks on resolutions published in the press. They cannot be false; I did not invent those resolutions passed by the Orange lodges in which strong expressions were used against the hierarchy and the papal ablegate. If it will satisfy the hon. gentleman, I am ready to admit that perhaps instead of saying 'raised' I should have used the word 'intensified,' and secondly if I said that the Orange Association were the cause and that the agitation arose in the Orange Association, I am not sure that I was right. I am ready to say that a large share of the agitation must be placed on some of the principal Liberals of the city of Toronto, including the proprietors of the 'News' and even of the 'Globe.'

The SPEAKER declared the amendment lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I rise for the purpose——

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yeas and nays.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yeas and nays.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The Speaker has declared the motion lost on a division. It is too late to ask for the yeas and nays now.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I submit that the Speaker only declared an opinion. We ask for the evidence of that opinion by recording the vote. No succeeding business has arisen and we wish to complete this item of business, by taking a vote of this House. It is not too late.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No other business has been gone into.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When some one cried 'yeas and nays' the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc) was on his feet and addressing the House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the hon. member for Lauzon was too previous, that is not our fault.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule on the subject is that the yeas and nays can be called for if no other business has been gone into.

The SPEAKER—Call in the members.

The members were called in, and the motion was put from the Chair.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I rise to make a motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I move that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw his amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That has already been declared lost.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division :—

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I presume that my motion was rather too plain and pointed to meet the views of the ordinary politician, and that is the reason it was defeated.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I do not wish to prolong the discussion of the question now before the House, because it was fully discussed yesterday, but as I wish to place myself on record on this question, I beg to move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Macdonald (P. E.I.)

That Bill (69) be not now read the third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend it by adding the following proviso to clause 3 :—

Provided always that no provision of the present Act shall be construed to restrict in any way the rights and privileges heretofore granted to any class of persons in the Northwest Territories relating to education or language.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division :—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I intend to take the sense of the House on the amendment I moved last evening in Committee of the Whole. I want this House to decide if the population of the Northwest Territories shall have the same rights as the population of all the other provinces, or if the government has any reason to impose special legislation upon this province. The government has undertaken to manipulate the British North America Act. Though the Prime Minister and all the other speakers in the House of Commons as well as the speakers in this House, have contended that they stood on the rock of the constitution, they have manipulated the British North America Act, and brought in amendments which upset entirely the meaning of that Act.

Section 93 of the British North America Act reads as follows :—

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education subject and according to the following provision.

And the first subsection is as follows :—

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

By this first restriction imposed by the British North America Act, no legislature has a right to enact a law which interferes with the rights recognized by the provincial laws in matters of education with respect to denominational schools. What does this Bill presented to us enact ? The Bill now before us does away with that provision of the British North America Act ; what is the substitution therefor ? The Bill reads :

Section 93 of the British North America Act shall apply to the said provinces with the substitution for paragraph 1 of the said section 93, of the following paragraph.

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the Ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate schools as provided for in the said Ordinances.

This clause amends the British North America Act in two ways; first in inserting in the place of ' denominational schools,' the words ' separate schools,' and second in applying to the separate schools all the ordinances passed by the territories up to 1901, and which were in force in that year. I claim that this is placing our co-religionists of the Northwest Territories in a position inferior to the position occupied by the minority in all the other provinces of the Dominion. What is a denominational school? It is a school in which not only religion is taught, but one in which the teaching in a general way is impregnated with the spirit of the denomination to which the school belongs. That is the idea of a denominational school. If you consult the authorities in the matter, if you consult the judgment given by the privy council in the Manitoba case, you will come to the same conclusion, that denominational schools are schools impregnated with the spirit of the religious instruction of the sect or denomination to which those schools belong. This is done away with by the Bill that is presented to-day. In the place of the denominational schools being preserved as provided by the British North America Act, the government strikes out the words 'denominational schools' in the British North America Act and inserts the words 'separate schools.' Denominational schools and separate schools are two different things. Everybody acknowledges that, and my hon. friend from de Salaberry (Mr. Béique) admitted that they were two different things. All the speakers who addressed this House on the question admitted that denominational and separate schools are two different things. Why put our fellow countrymen of the Northwest, the minority of the Northwest, in a position inferior to the one occupied by the minority in the other provinces. It is for that reason that I shall propose amendments which will bring out an expression of the members of this House upon that subject. I go further and I say that the ordinances of 1901 rob the people of the territories of their rights. A law was passed in 1875. That was a federal law, and was the law under which the territories have been governed up to date. That law of 1875 is still in force, and it enacts that no ordinance whatsoever can be passed in the territories unless it is always enacted that the majority of the school district shall have the school they think fit. That is, for the minority there may be a separate school. The majority has a right to have the school they think fit; and I call attention to the fact that in the territories the majority are not looked upon as the majority in the province, but the majority in the school district. In the other provinces when we speak of the majority or the minority we allude generally to the majority in the province or the minority in the province. But by the law of 1875 that majority is restricted to the territorial division which is comprised under the name of school district, so that in certain school districts you may have a majority that is French and Catholic.

According to the law of 1875 that Catholic French majority would have a right to select the school they think fit, they would have a right to have a denominational and a French school. That is the right and that law is still in force, and the minority have their separate schools. What has occurred since then? In 1884-85 and 1887-88 up to 1901, ordinances have been passed, and in all those ordinances which were passed under the operation and with the authority of the federal law of 1875 they have had the schools they thought fit to establish, according to the views of the majority in the different districts. Real separate schools were accorded to the minority in those different districts also, and more than that the Board of Education that was formed under the provisions of that Act was separated into two sections, a Catholic and a Protestant section, just as exists in the province of Quebec. the Catholic section having the control and management of the Catholic schools and the Protestant section having the control and management of the Protestant schools. That was according to the provisions of chapter 11 of the Northwest Territories Act of 1875; but in 1893 an ordinance was passed in violation of the law, against the enactment of the federal law, and the system of schools that was then established did not give to the majority in each school district the school to which they were entitled by the Act of 1875, the school they thought fit to establish. The separate schools were similar to the public schools. The Consolidated Statutes of the Northwest of 1888 state that a public school is a school in which the pupils from such an age to such an age shall receive the elements of an English commercial education, and then you find what is a separate school. The definition which applies to a public school applies word for word to the separate school. It says the separate school, like the public school, is a school in which the pupils from such an age to such an age receive the elements of an English commercial education. That is against the law. Those ordinances were not declared unconstitutional. An Act that is unconstitutional ab initio remains unconstitutional, and nothing could render it constitutional or bring it within the powers of the legislature that enacted it. So the law remains unconstitutional according to the statement of the premier in another place. He acknowledged that if the law was unconstitutional in 1892, it was still unconstitutional; but to remove legal doubts which might arise in the minds of the people of the Northwest Territories as to the rights of the minority, he introduces an enactment which sets aside what is the law and which states what is against the law. He sets aside the law of 1875, which conceded to those minorities rights and privileges which they have enjoyed up until to-day, and he confirms those ordinances which take away from our fellow-citizens of the Northwest the privileges and the rights which were accorded to them by the law of 1875. So that my amendment is to strike out those words of the first paragraph, to strike out the words giving the rights which are now accorded by the ordinance of 1901. I want the law of the territory which is in force to-day, the federal law, to remain and to be the basis of the rights which we are to give to our fellow-citizens of the Northwest. For that reason I move :

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend it in the following way.

1. Subsection 1 of clause 17 is amended :

(a) By substituting in the fifteenth line the word 'denominational' for the word 'separate' ;

(b) By striking out in the seventeenth and eighteenth lines the words 'chapters 29 and 30 of the Ordinances of the Northwest Territories passed in the year 1901,' and substituting therefor the words 'Imperial and Federal laws' ;

(c) By substituting the word 'laws' for the word 'ordinances' in line 20.

2. Subsection 2 of clause 17 is amended :

(a) By striking out in the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth lines the words 'the said chapter 29 or any Act passed in amendment thereof or in substitution therefor,' and substituting therefor the words 'said laws' ;

(b) By striking out in line 26 the words 'the said chapter 29,' and substituting therefor the words 'said laws' ;

3. Subsection 3 of clause 17 is amended by striking out in line 29 the words 'chapters 29 and 30' and substituting the following therefor 'Imperial and Federal laws.'

Bringing in by this substitution the British North America Act and providing that it shall operate automatically in the provinces, as well as the federal laws which gave rights of which the minority cannot now be deprived, because you must not forget that by the British North America Act, subsection 3 of clause 93, it is enacted :

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

My contention is that the law in 1875 has given to those territories separate schools which are looked upon by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act as separate schools, and if the denominational schools are safeguarded by subsection 1 of section 93, the separate schools are further safeguarded by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, which says that in the concession which has been made since their entry into the union the minority have acquired certain rights. By this amendment we are putting aside the unconstitutional ordinances of 1901 and we are taking for the basis of the rights which we want to give to our fellow-countrymen of the Northwest, the British North America Act and the Federal Act of 1875. Who could vote against that ? Who could vote against giving to those minorities of the Northwest the same privileges which are enjoyed by the people of the other provinces of the Dominion ? Who could vote against giving to those people the privileges and the rights conferred upon them by the Act of 1875 and conferred upon them by the federal law. That is what I am asking by this amendment. I hope that all who have the interests of this Dominion at heart, who do not want to put our fellow-citizens of the Northwest in an inferior position to that occupied in the other provinces of the Dominion by the Catholic minority or the Protestant minority, will vote for this amendment, so that they will consecrate the justice to be given to those people. I hope the government will take this amendment into consideration and accept it. I was told yesterday that it was not by an oversight that the word 'denominational' had been struck out and the word 'separate' inserted. I never had any explanation why that was done. Some hon. members said 'Oh, but if you leave the Bill as it is the Doukhobors, Galicians and the Japs—I think the hon. gentleman from Victoria brought in the Japs—would participate in the benefit of the amendment and you would have all those denominational schools spread over the Northwest Territories.' I say no, because the law says that nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the provinces at the union. When the Manitoba Act of 1870 was passed the words 'and by practice' were added. But that was not the case in the Northwest Territories. If those people want to enjoy their schools, they cannot raise a claim to denominational schools, because their schools were never recognized by law. So that my amendment does not in any way recognize, as was suggested yesterday, the claims that those people might have. There are only two denominations recognized by law in those provinces, the Catholic and the Protestant—those two only. The division is not made according to race. It is made according to creed only, and nobody has reason to fear that if this amendment is carried the division by race would be substituted for the division by creed. I hope that all our friends and the people who boast so much about their love for our minority will join with me and help the government to improve their Bill in order to render it more acceptable to all classes of the community.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I fully agree with the able argument made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). It is an able argument and if it had been advanced at the second reading I should have voted for it. But the hon. gentleman and the House must remember that a similar amendment was moved in the Commons, and the government would not accept it. Whatever amendments are moved in this House will not be accepted, and it is a foregone conclusion that the Bill will pass in its present shape. Therefore much as we would like to have the Bill amended in the direction indicated, it is only a waste of time moving the amendment now. And I hope hon. gentlemen will not suggest any more amendments, because they can see it is useless. They will not be carried, and hon. gentlemen have placed their opinions on record several times. I will not vote for any amendment, because it is useless and a waste of time. The result is a foregone conclusion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am going to vote against the amendment, because I am of the opinion that it would remove any rights which the minority have at present.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division ;

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I move in amendment, That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend it by striking out all the words after 'this Act' in the third line of said first subsection 1 of clause 17, to the word 'with' in the fifth line of said subsection.

The amendment will have the effect of doing away with an improper limitation and place every one under the operation of the Act of 1875. It will be for the court to determine whatever may be the rights of any party under this Act, if the parties choose to go before the court.

The amendment was lost on the same division as the previous amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m.

SECOND SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at 3 p.m.

DISTRIBUTION OF STATISTICAL YEAR-BOOK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to ask the government why discrimination is made against honourable members of the Senate in the distribution of the Statistical Year-Book of Canada?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I spoke to the Minister of Agriculture and he was not aware that there was any discrimination. He will make it right at once.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY AT PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to ask the government whether it is their intention to have the steamers 'Stanley' and 'Minto' connected by wireless telegraphy with points on the coast of Prince Edward Island and the mainland during the coming winter?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I heard the Minister of Marine, in answer to a question put to him, state that there were stations on the land. They may have been put there recently. That is what I understood him to say—either that they were constructing them now or that they would be put there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There are stations on both boats, but not on the land. I presume the hon. Secretary of State will call attention to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. I will speak to Mr. Préfontaine again, because I understood him to say they were already on the land. No doubt if they are not there they should be there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What I was anxious to get at was this; are they not there because the Anglo-American Company is interposing any objection?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He did not say there was any objection whatever. His impression was that they were there already.

SALARY OF THE FIRST MINISTER BILL.

FIRST READING.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (201) An Act respecting the salary of the First Minister.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time at length at the table.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am fully in accord with the policy adopted of increasing the Prime Minister's salary to $12,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite, some of whom have had a number of years experience in a government, have a full knowledge not only of the responsibility but of the expense to which the Prime Minister of this country is put, and the responsibility and the expense attending his office is growing every year. As the Dominion grows so in proportion is the importance of the office held by the Prime Minister increased. He has been paid, I was going to say, a beggarly salary in the past. I know from Prime Ministers with whom I have been associated that at the end of the year they came out poorer than when they took office, if they kept up the dignity of the position. From the experience I have had in connection with this matter I am fully in accord with the policy which has been pursued in this matter. Those who have heard me speak on the subject in the past know that I have expressed that opinion repeatedly in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have great pleasure in supporting the view put before the House by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. The Premier should be placed beyond the possibility of care with regard to his own private affairs. He must, if he is worthy of the position, devote all his time to the public affairs of the country, and it would be unworthy of this country if a man occupying such a position should be subject to care and trouble about making both ends meet with regard to his private affairs. If the amount had been made $15,000, I would have thought it was not one dollar too much. While speaking on that matter, it will give me an opportunity of saying a word with regard to the other salaries and allowances, which if not before us will come a little later. I am very pleased to find from the information we have now that it is not proposed to increase the salaries of the other cabinet ministers. I think that we have been providing amply at $7,000 a year for the salaries of cabinet ministers other than the Prime Minister, and in the increase of indemnity this year they, as well as private members, will get some relief. In connection with that I wish to point out the example set by the United States. They pay the heads of departments just $10,000 a year. We pay $7,000. It must be admitted, so far as that is concerned, that we are doing well as compared with a nation of 80,000,000. I find also that the United States pays to its members of Congress $7,500 a year, only $2,500 a year less than they pay heads of departments.

I have always felt there was an undue difference in Canada between the remuneration of members of parliament and that of ministers. As a rule I do not think the ministers are, taking the whole year through, very severely worked. During the session they have very able deputies and private secretaries, as well as a staff which they can always call into requisition. But our experience in connection with this government and its predecessors has been that when parliament rose they went junketing all over the earth, and as a rule few of them returned to the seat of government until parliament was about to be summoned, and they seldom had their work ready for the session. When members of parliament are condemned for the length of the session, the condemnation should be levelled at the government of the day, because the work is not ready. I am not making that complaint against my hon. friends opposite more than of all the governments in the past. Perhaps a little more blame could be applied to this government but not to the extent which would render it necessary to draw a line of difference, because it was the custom with the previous government and the practice with this government. If the measures are ready, or nearly ready, when parliament meets, the House could get down to work and the sessions would not be nearly so long as they are. From the statutes of the United States, I find that the salary of a congressman is $7,500 a year, and in addition to that senators who are not chairmen of committees are allowed $1,500 for a secretary. Those who are chairmen of committees have of course a staff to do their work, and are not provided with secretaries. The members of the House of Representatives are also allowed to employ clerical assistance, but only during the session of Congress, and the amount is not to exceed $100 for any one month. It would thus appear that in the United States the senators are paid on a more liberal scale than the members of the House of Representatives with regard to clerical assistance. I have seen statements published in the press, and almost universally accepted, that the United States paid their members $5,000. I am speaking by the book when I say they pay $7,500, and in addition to that each senator gets $1,500 for secretary. I am glad the word 'indemnity' is dropped in this Bill. I think it is not the right word at all. 'Allowance' is nearer it, and 'salary' would be better. I do not find fault with the present indemnity, but I do not at all agree with the view that the members of parliament even at $2,500 are better paid than the members of the cabinet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The remarks of my hon. friend suggest an idea which occurred to me, but which I forgot to mention. I differ from him in toto with regard to the other ministers. I think their salaries should have been increased at least $1,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well what duties they have to perform. My hon. friend's remarks might apply to those departments that have nothing but routine, or scarcely anything but routine business to do. It will be remembered that the Hon. Edward Blake, while in the House of Commons a good many years ago, advocated a policy of paying the ministers in proportion to the importance of the portfolios they held. There are some cabinet positions I admit, in which there is not so very much to do; there are others which occupy the time, attention and brains of the minister from one end of the year to the other. That is well known to those who have had experience, and I should have liked to see at least $1,000 added to the $7,000, making the salary $8,000.

There is another point to which I desire to call attention, in relation to which the government and their predecessors have been guilty. We select gentlemen occupying prominent positions in the localities in which they reside, and in the party to which they belong, to act as ministers without portfolio. Now, I do not advocate the payment of a salary to a minister without portfolio, but it is not asking too much that gentlemen who occupy such a position in a country like ours where public men are not wealthy as they are in England, and who accept such a position for the honour it carries with it, should at least have their expenses paid. Take the case of my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Ferguson), who was minister without portfolio in the late administration. I know on many occasions he had to come up from Prince Edward Island to attend cabinet meetings for days, at his own expense. The late Sir John Macdonald would never consent to accept the suggestions which I am honest enough to say I made on this subject to him. The very least the government should do is to make a liberal allowance to the minister without portfolio to cover the expenses he incurs when he has to attend council. Sometimes he is requested to come from his distant home to Ottawa in order to give advice which could not be obtained without his presence without a great deal of difficulty.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Let him have a secretary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sir John Macdonald would not allow even that. Sir Frank Smith was a minister without portfolio for a long time, and I urged repeatedly that he should have the privilege of employing a secretary, but Sir John Macdonald laid down the principle that the honour was sufficient compensation to the minister without portfolio. I do not think so. Fortunately Sir Frank Smith was wealthy enough to make it a matter of very little importance to him. I am sure the ministers who are present here will take what I say in good part. I am not advocating particularly provision for the gentlemen who are occupying that position now. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they have gentlemen in the cabinet without portfolio, whose expenses are paid at so much per diem, and expenses of attending.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to add a word to what my hon. friend has said with regard to the position of the minister without portfolio. I have been through the mill and have had a little experience of what that means. It is all very well for gentlemen of means and leisure who could afford to be called away from business and incur the expenses of travelling, but it is altogether different when it comes to the case of a man of more moderate means, and I think that while the government is about it they ought to cover that ground—limit the number that could be appointed at any time to two or three and give the government power to deal with any case that might arise. I am not advocating the case of my hon. friend who sits opposite (Hon. Mr. Templeman). I am advocating a principle and I point to my hon. friend as an illustration of that principle. Nobody would say that being called to the cabinet without portfolio during the session of parliament is any serious inconvenience to him. When he is at work in council he is not working anywhere else, and an industrious man is at work all the time he is here; but to be called from his home during the interim of parliament to attend meetings of council when grave questions arise, is another matter. A member without portfolio is only called under grave circumstances, but when a question comes up such as we had to consider while I was a member of the cabinet, the admission of Newfoundland, the Manitoba question, or recently the question of preferential trade, and all the members of the cabinet are summoned, a gentleman in that position, having been called to the cabinet, should be allowed per diem an amount equal to the salary of a minister, from the time he leaves his home until he returns, together with his actual expenses.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (202) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of the Bill. He said: This is a Bill to increase the indemnity to members of the Senate and House of Commons from $1,500 to $2,500.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I want to call attention to two features of this Bill. The first is that mileage is abolished, and members are allowed only their actual travelling expenses. Now I submit that mileage should not be abolished, because it is the only way in which you can at all equalize the position of hon. gentlemen living near the capital and those who live far away from the capital. A member residing in British Columbia has to leave many days before the opening of parliament, for which time he receives nothing, as compared with a gentleman living in Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal. That is not the worst of it. He has to dissever himself almost entirely from his business when he comes to parliament. He is not able to go home on Fridays and return on Mondays as many hon. gentlemen can; and the only way to equalize the difference is in mileage. I do not know that it is the best way of doing it but it approximates to fairness as between those living at a distance and those living at the capital. I think the mileage should not have been abolished. There ought to be, and I am sure there is, a spirit of fair-play on the part of the hon. gentlemen who are fortunately situated as being at or near the capital, many of whom can dine at their own tables, sleep in their own beds, and do half a day's work at their own business before the opening of the House. They ought to consider the position of gentlemen living at a great distance who sometimes lose a week or ten days in coming to the seat of government. The mileage was a way of equalizing things between those who live at a distance and those who live at or near the capital and should be retained. In the abolition of it another principle is introduced, the payment of actual expenses. That does not cover the loss of time, and makes no recompense for severing members from their business. In connection with the accounts which are to be presented there is a most odious condition attached to the Bill, a condition which I am surprised the government should have inserted; that is, the accounts must be sworn to by the member. Members of the cabinet do not require any such legislation as that in dealing with their own expenses in travelling. I am sure it was not intended as an insult to members of parliament to single them out in this way, in a way that no other class of people in the country is treated. I know in cases of the administration of intestate estates, the accounts must be sworn to, but that is a condition which does not arise between individuals both of whom are living, and I think this odious condition should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a pity to discuss the Bill when it is not before us. It was only agreed upon the day before yesterday, and I am not sufficiently familiar with its details to discuss them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest that the second reading be agreed to now and we can discuss the details in committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have been looking over the Bill hastily and take it for granted that it will go into operation as soon as it is sanctioned by the Governor General. If that be the case, I do not see that it provides for the present session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The mileage question will not be an element this year. I am informed that it does not disturb the condition of things this session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That ought to be stated clearly in the Bill, because otherwise the clerk will not be able to settle with the members, and almost all of them have drawn their mileage. In my own case it is about $29 or $30, and I have drawn it. If this Bill becomes law at the end of the session, I will have to pay back this amount.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, that is not the understanding. The Department of Justice will give instructions to the clerk. The question does not arise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The department cannot give instructions contrary to the Act. I am told there is a provision in the Bill to meet the case. I do not object to the principle at all; I think it is a good one. It will do away with a good deal of the difficulty that has arisen.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the members of the government take a note of the objection to that clause requiring a member to take an oath to his account. That ought to be abolished, and I hope the hon. Secretary of State will see his colleagues, and have it struck out of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am heartily in accord with what has been said with regard to the increase of the Prime Minister's salary, I also agree with my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, with regard to the increase which he thinks should have been made, and which has not been made, in the salaries of the ministers. I cannot, however, entirely agree with what has been said with regard to the increase of the pay of members of both Houses. As the hon. member from Marshfield has pointed out the word 'indemnity' has been dropped, and 'allowance' substituted. The principle which had previously been adopted of giving an indemnity or allowance, which was supposed to cover the expenses of members of parliament while in attendance at Ottawa, seems to have been abandoned; and the principle of giving them compensation for the loss of time or inconvenience to which they are subjected, or the loss through neglect of business during the time they are here, seems to be what is now adopted.

Personally I should have preferred if the old principle could have been adhered to, and an allowance or indemnity given to members of both houses for this purpose only rather than as a compensation for the loss or inconvenience they may sustain by reason of their attendance on parliament and the discharge of their duties here. I am glad, however, that the mileage has been abolished. I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield in that regard; and I regard this to some extent as a compensating feature for the increase of the allowance or indemnity or payment to the members. I do not think if we propose to remunerate the senators and members of the House of Commons for the inconvenience and loss of time to which they may be subjected in attending here, that we should do so in the indirect way of allowing them mileage for their attendance upon parliament. I make these remarks now in order that my personal views may be known on the subject. I believe that the great majority of the members of this House dissent from my opinion on this question, and no doubt the Bill will pass in its present form, but I make these remarks because I wish it to be known that we are not entirely unanimous on this subject.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. member from Westmoreland (Hon. Mr. Wood), being a very wealthy man, has practically told the House that he can afford to serve here for nothing. I know he has plenty of money but there are gentlemen in this House who are not so well placed in life as he is. I would suggest to my hon. friend as a fair compromise that he should present the extra amount to some charitable institution, or perhaps not draw it at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman tell the House what is the difference between being compensated for expenses and being compensated for loss of time?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought the House accepted the suggestion I made, that inasmuch as the Bill has not been distributed, and the Autonomy Bills are in the slings, this might stand over until the committee stage. There is not the slightest danger that this Bill will not pass.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Notwithstanding what has been so well expressed by the hon. member from Halifax, as we have entered upon a discussion of the principle of the Bill, I should like to say that I have never been in sympathy with the self-abnegation so often expressed by some hon. members as to the necessity of keeping the indemnity of allowance at a minimum amount. If the hon. member from Sackville (Hon. Mr. Wood) feels that way, I am very pleased to say that is not my condition of mind. If representatives of parliament assembled give their time and the best of their ability to their parliamentary duties, they certainly should be paid commensurate with the time and ability bestowed upon the work. I also approve entirely of what the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has said with reference to the elimination of the mileage. This certainly is a matter which will bear much more heavily on those who live at a distance, and who, if I may use the word, have to make more sacrifices in coming here so far as travelling expenses and loss of time are concerned, than the members living at or near Ottawa. The disturbance of equilibrium lies in this, that many members have to spend from eight days to a fortnight in going to and from Ottawa, and in addition to that, we must take into consideration that there are many adjournments of the Senate when those members have to return to their homes and come back again to Ottawa. To illustrate that, I may say, that in the present case for instance, my allowance will be nearly $400 less than my hon. friend who lives in or near Ottawa receives. It only needs to be mentioned to point out to hon. gentlemen that it is manifestly unfair that those who live a distance should thus lose a very substantial amount by the Bill before us, and I hope the leader of the government in this House may see his way clear to recommend a retention of the provisions in the existing Act with reference to mileage.

Permit me to say a word with reference to the question of making a statutory or sworn declaration as to the amount of a member's expenses. Scrupulous members like myself and other hon. gentlemen coming from the Northwest will be placed at a disadvantage in making this statutory declaration. Economy is one of the leading qualities of the western people and we certainly will not feel like indulging in an extravagant estimate in putting in those expenses. But who will be the judge of those expenses. Will the accountant undertake to cut off this expense, or the other expense? Who will pronounce on the question? It certainly will lead to bickerings and misunderstanding. The government has not applied this principle with reference to the accounts of public servants. Judges, Deputy Ministers, chief clerks of departments and other officials who have to travel on the public business, and who have expenses of precisely the same character as those which may be incurred by members of parliament, are not required to swear to their accounts. Why should this invidious distinction be drawn? Is not the word of a member of parliament quite equal to that of an official who is not required to make a declaration as to his travelling expenses, or a judge or a minister, who may be allowed so much per diem. I think it only needs to be pointed out, and that the objectionable features of the Bill ought to be remedied before it passes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—You get $20 a day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have really not had the details of the Bill under consideration. I have heard it very rapidly run through, but quite recognize the objectionable feature pointed out, that is, calling upon a member to make oath as to his actual expenses. I think his own certificate, or a letter from himself stating what his expenses are, or a per diem allowance on a liberal scale covering everything, would be a better way. The question will not arise during the present session, and I hope at a later time the objectionable feature of the Bill will be eliminated from it, and that we will agree upon a per diem allowance for the expenses while travelling.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, at the next sitting of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman to allow any change to be made in the Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that we can make a change.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the question. It is a money Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think we can. As I said just now it is not intended that the mileage question shall be raised during the present session. The mileage has been actually paid in nine cases out of ten. We will endeavour to come to some fair conclusion as to what will be the best solution in place of the proposition in the Bill that a member shall take an oath as to his expenses. Some reasonable arrangement will be made, which I think will be acceptable to all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to point out that this is a money Bill, and we cannot amend it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A change even on the question of mileage would be putting an additional expense on the country. For that reason we cannot amend the Bill, and I do not see why we should refer it to a committee of the whole.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Whatever may be the merits of this Bill, I commend not only the government—because I understand this Bill is the result of a conference between the leaders of both parties—but the opposition also on abolishing mileage. We have passes on all the railways of Canada. It would look queer, and more than queer, to the public and to ourselves if we were to provide for mileage as well as passes. That feature of the Bill, I with others, especially approve of. A change might be made with regard to requiring a member to swear to his actual expenses. I would rather pay my expenses from Shediac and back than get the $7 or $8 that I would have to swear to. As to members swearing to the number of days of their attendance, I believe it is proper. The allowance is sufficient to insure the attendance of members of both Houses to their duties. There have been abuses in that line. Now abuses always lead to making regulations to correct them. Abuses have existed in the other House and also in the Senate, and it is well that members should make a declaration as to the number of days they were in their places, giving the exact time and showing the country that if we get an allowance we work, or are supposed to work, for it. We cannot amend this Bill, but next year I take the word of the leader of the government that some features of it will be retouched, and put in a shape more in accord with the dignity of parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to point out to the hon. Secretary of State that in my opinion, acting on the ruling we have had on such subjects, we can amend this Bill. The 3rd subsection of clause 8, is as follows :—

3. Upon the said statements being certified by the clerk, and sworn to by the member before the accountant or assistant accountant of the House, or any person authorized to take affidavits, the accountant shall pay to the member the allowance to which he is entitled according to the said statements.

We can leave out the words 'sworn to.' I think an account certified to by an hon. member ought to be sufficient. I would call attention to a Bill introduced from the other House a session or two ago, which the Senate took the responsibility of amending by striking out a whole clause affecting the payment of superannuation to retired judges. The decision of this House was in direct contradiction to the ruling of the late Speaker. I called attention at the time to the fact that it was opening the door for the amendment of money Bills, and to my own satisfaction proved conclusively that we have no such power. That was a more flagrant case than the amendment of this Bill would be. The proposed change does not affect the money part of the Bill at all. It simply removes the feature which requires a member to swear to his accounts. My expenses would amount to about $5. Certainly I should not take the trouble to swear to an account to get that amount.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Seeing that I come from a distant part of this country, I think with reference to this question of mileage, now that a new arrangement has been made by which $15, previously allowed, has been struck off—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Well, it will be next session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The opinion of the Department of Justice is that it is not struck off.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I raise a question of order, that this Bill has not been distributed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I think we may trust the government to amend this Bill next session, if there is anything irregular about it. Having brought in such a liberal Bill for both Houses, I think they can be trusted to remedy any defects it may contain.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If this Bill cannot be amended, why not pass it now ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has devoted so much time to the business of the House this year, that I suppose he is anxious to get home.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Certainly, I have not troubled the House as often as my hon. friend.

The motion was agreed to.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AUTONOMY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Third reading (Bill 69) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Alberta.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Perley.

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to the Commitee of the Whole to strike out section 13, and to insert in lieu thereof :

13. The Lieutenant Governor shall on or before the 1st day of January next, by proclamation under the Great Seal, divide the said province into twenty-five electoral divisions, due regard being had to existing local divisions and population.

I stated last evening when this Bill was before the Committee of the Whole the objections which I had to this particular clause. It has proved to be a very controversial one, not only in the House of Commons but also in the minds of those who are opposed to this manner of distribution. I will content myself by simply saying that the principle which has been embodied in the section is a vicious one,—that of the government in a partisan way making a distribution of those electoral divisions. When the province of Manitoba was carved out of Rupert's Land it was provided in the Act of Union that the electoral divisions of the then province of Manitoba should be delimited in the way I have mentioned, and the language of the amendment which I have moved is taken from the Manitoba Act. A precedent of this kind was adopted by the government of the day so long ago as 1870 and it gave eminent satisfaction. It should certainly apply under the conditions already pointed out and which I hope it will be unnecessary for me further to enlarge upon.

The House divided on the amendment which was rejected on the following division :

Legris,

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—In addressing you on this occasion, I shall use the language of Shakespeare, though I can never hope to imitate England's immortal poet in any other way. I consider that an educated man should understand and speak both French and English. Some of my colleagues in the Lower House have been complimented—and rightly so—upon their fluency in the English tongue. I was myself most agreeably surprised at the facility with which they spoke that language, as they had only learned it in our French colleges, in the midst of an almost exclusively French population, and, in spite, I must confess, of an intellectual repugnance which some of your countrymen have contributed not a little to provoke. Still it was with not less pleasure that I observed that their command of the English language did not wholly conceal their French origin. This is as it should be. 'Speak English' is my advice to all my fellow-countrymen, but do it in such a way that there shall never be any mistake about your true origin, and I am sure you will admit that I put this advice into practice.

Cicero asks if the gift of eloquence has been more beneficial than hurtful to mankind and to society. 'If I consider,' said he, 'the evils which have distracted our country, if I recall the catastrophes which formerly befel the most flourishing cities, I everywhere observe that most of these ills were caused by eloquent men; but, on the other hand, I also note the effect of wisdom, and still more so of eloquence, in laying the foundations of cities, in allaying discords, and in tightening the bonds of a holy friendship; consequently, reason itself leads me to believe that wisdom alone, without eloquence, is of little use to States, but that eloquence without wisdom is often only too fatal, and can never be useful.' (De Oratore.) What would the great Roman orator think, if he had attended those long debates in the Lower House, which, after exciting such a flow of words, and occasionally of eloquence, have flooded with violence and bitterness a chamber that should be the temple of wisdom and maturity of judgment? Would he find among us the useless citizen, whose anxiety for the power of eloquence may become dangerous to the country, or the useful citizen, who, armed with the weapon of oratory to defend, not to assail, public interests, deserves the esteem of his fellow-countrymen? I would be glad to be ranked in the latter category, and it is to merit your esteem and that of my fellow-citizens that I, to-day, for the first time, raise my voice in this chamber.

It is undeniable, Sir, that amidst all these floods of writing and this deluge of words, and in spite of the oft-repeated assertion that the only issue before us is provincial rights, that the only care is respect for the autonomy of the new provinces, the least prejudiced mind can discern a biassed and unavowable sentiment: dread of French and Catholic influence, that is to say, fear of an influence which would not be in harmony with the ideas of certain citizens of the Dominion. But it does not lie with you to bridle that influence, for it springs from higher principles than the narrow considerations of a narrowed mind.

I confess, Sir, that my contribution to the discussion of this question will be small. It would seem that everything that could be said has been said. You have also read everything on the subject. I probably could only repeat the arguments already used by the speakers in this House or in the Commons. But, in the course of my career as a lawyer and, above all, as a judge, I have learned that precedents are the great criterion of laws and their interpretations. Precedents are opinions which, in their way, have the force of laws. To the study of this question I shall, therefore, bring a few real, true precedents, so to speak, but I shall especially cite what is equal to the most explicit precedents, the opinion of eminent men who, by their fame for ability, deserve to carry weight with my hon. colleagues speaking the English language.

This is not the first time, Sir, that we Roman Catholics have had to raise our voices in defence of our right to educate our children. History shows that for upwards of half a century, in 1840, 1851, 1867 and 1875, we have struggled valiantly, I might even add, brilliantly for that cause, but the present debate is the most important, as it is also the sharpest of all. It would seem as if our adversaries were burning their last cartridges, feeling that the solution of the question now will entail a permanent state of things in the public administration of the Dominion. And the question relates particularly to a territory in which millions of men of all tongues, all characters and all religions, will find homes.

Formerly in the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec, there were, strictly speaking, but two languages and two creeds. Quebec was almost exclusively French and Catholic, while Ontario was similarly English and Protestant. In spite of their centrifugal tendencies, the minorities brought about the union, the first step towards our glorious confederation. As far back as 1860, Hon. Mr. Scott, who is at present our worthy leader, was proposing the separation of the schools. Three times did he fail and was his appeal rejected, but at last he silenced all opposition, and in 1863 the Scott law was passed. Are we to believe that the antagonisms of race and creed are more violent to-day and that the unfortunate campaigns of the P.P.A. and the A.P.A., notwithstanding their defeat, have left behind them a leaven of hatred and ultra-fanaticism? I do not think so. I prefer rather to see in it a specific frame of mind, which under the guise of a discussion of the principle of separate schools, a principle that is not at stake, recoils from acknowledging the justice of an accomplished fact.

Who can deny that what we are asking to-day, was given as a matter of fact to all the minorities at the time of confederation?

Sir Charles Tupper, speaking on the Remedial Bill in 1896, 'Hansard,' page 2723, said:

> And hon. gentlemen will see in a moment, if they will indulge me with the opportunity, the point to which I wish to call their attention. There would have been no confederation—I say it in the presence of my colleague who was at the Westminster Palace Hotel. I say it within the knowledge of Sir Leonard Tilley, who was one of the fathers of confederation, of the Hon. Peter Mitchell, who was at that conference, of the Hon. William Macdougall, and the Hon. Sir William Howland; I say it within the knowledge of all these gentlemen, for six of us still, I am glad to know, remain—that but for the consent to the proposal of the Hon. Sir Alexander Galt, who represented especially the Protestants of the great province of Quebec on that occasion, but for the assent of that conference to the proposal of Sir Alexander Galt, that in the Confederation Act should be embodied a clause which would protect the rights of minorities, whether Catholic or Protestant, in this country, there would have been no confederation.

These vigorous words are not mine. They were uttered by a man who was the contemporary and the peer of the Tilleys, the Mitchells, the McDougalls and the Browns, by one of the fathers of confederation, by Sir Charles Tupper, who only a few days ago went to seek the blessing of the Pope for his eighty-two well-filled years and probably also for the impoverished, mutilated remains of what was once the great Conservative party. He was at Rome in company with his venerable friend, the Bishop of Antigonish, to whom public malice attributes the anathema. 'To Hell with the Liberals' and 'these illustrious debris as the poet said, consoled each other.' These were truly eloquent words. The Sir Charles Tupper who used them, would not recognize his former allies in those who are to-day making the worst appeal to the passions of the public, and the newspaper men of Toronto. There is a popularity which arises from the admiration excited by great actions; this is the best, and there is another which is derived from the popular passion for noise and applause and which is the worst. The one is the popularity of heroes, the other the popularity of quacks.

And what was Sir Charles Tupper's conclusion? I commend it to your meditation. It requires your reflection and deserves it.

To render justice and above all to render justice to a minority said he, is always grand and noble; it is one of the noblest attributes of human nature.

Hon. Mr. Fielding also took a just and a far-seeing view of the question, and I refer you to the great speech he delivered in the other House. Sir, in this vast Dominion, under the regime of that confederation, which will mould us into a nation, the two predominating races, different in their origin, their language and their mental equipment, should march hand in hand, keeping step together for better, for worse, in joy and in sorrow, in prosperity and in adversity, and in the exciting crises of their history as in the calm of their daily political duties, like the twin rails of that immense iron road which links the different provinces together by an indissoluble bond, ever running parallel to each other, ever keeping equally distant and equally close together, imparting to each other equal and sufficient strength, on the level soil of our immense prairies, over the hills and in the hollows, on the banks of giddy precipices, and at every turn of the route until they join by the hand, so to speak, the English-speaking Columbia with the for ever French Quebec. I say it boldly, Sir, and in doing so, I believe I echo the sentiment of almost the entirety of my fellow countrymen. We reject neutral schools. We demand schools in which religion is taught. We regard religion as the life of the body politic, which is only left the alternative of preserving itself through it or dissolving without it. On this point I have the satisfaction of knowing that I am in accord not only with the great principles of national law, that widespread law which every one bears imprinted within himself, not only with the great philosophers and thinkers among the Latin and Catholic races, but also with the philosophical minds and the most eminent ecclesiastical dignitaries of other religious denominations.

Stuart Mill is one of the glories of modern England. His works on morals are the standard books of the English schools. In his treatise on liberty, he demonstrates that it is the duty of parents to cause a religious education to be given to their children. Now, when you speak of duties you speak of rights for there are no duties without correlative rights and vice versa. According to this illustrious moralist, parents have therefore the right to demand religious education for their children and governments the duty to satisfy those rights.

Herbert Spencer has just died at a very advanced age—full of honours and esteem. His name enjoys a great reputation and carries with it great authority in all English speaking countries. You know all this better than I do. I do not approve all Herbert Spencer's opinions—very far from it; but I take what is good wherever I find it, and I advise you to read the fine pages in which he vigorously asserts in the name of natural law, the right of parents to educate their children.

Mr. Balfour recently gave expression to pretty much the same opinion in the British House of Commons.

These testimonies, whatever may be their value have nevertheless less weight, Sir, than the following fact which I beg to recall for the admiration of the Orange lodges.

Into the land itself of William of Orange, into that very Holland which, until these latter years, was deemed to be the bulwark of the reformed religion, Catholicism has succeeded in penetrating. Following the advent of Catholicism, and as a consequence of that innovation, narrow-mindedness, and fanaticism have had to yield to the pressure, inevitably exerted in the course of time, by those natural sentiments of justice and equality which to-day reflect honour on all the great nations. On the 8th September, 1889, the Dutch parliament passed a law which lays down the principle that the state owes to the free schools, provided that they are properly organized and that they do not call for too high a contribution, the same grant as it makes to public schools. Does not this show how unjust and odious it is to force citizens to pay for schools which their conscience cannot accept and also to pay for others in consonance with their convictions ? Education is too serious and too sacred a thing to be left to the mercy of any majority to decide how it shall be given. Something more is needed than the dull, cold, dry teaching of the neutral schools to form vigorous characters and firm wills. Children, as well as men, have need of the faith, of the reasons to act and love, which religious instruction alone can inculcate.

I glory in belonging, Sir, to that province of Quebec where primary, secondary and even university education is almost exclusively under the direction of the clergy. I made my classical studies in an institution conducted entirely by priests, whose salaries amounted to the incredible sum of $20 a year each. All my venerable professors are to-day sleeping their last long sleep, enshrined in the veneration so well due to their virtues, their great intelligence and their unswerving devotion to the cause of youth. I admit, Sir, that I have often asked myself, not without a very anxious feeling, whether the intellectual level of the young people issuing from our colleges is up to the right standard ; others moreover, animated by an unquestionable good faith, have publicly manifested a similar fear. The desiderata were laid down and improvements and reforms demanded. I blame nobody. But since my fellow-countrymen in the course of this debate, have, in the Lower House, won the admiration of their adversaries and written that page of history which shines as brilliantly as those in which our annalists have recorded the great achievements of the Bedards, the Lafontaines, the Morins, the Tachés, &c., I have become reassured and I assert that our educational institutions have nothing to envy in those of the other provinces and that they have deserved well of their country. In very happy language, Lord Grey gave expression to this same idea on the occasion of his visit to Laval University. 'I am glad'—he said—'to pay homage to the science and the enlightened patriotism of the eminent men, who, in the different faculties have trained the professional classes, whose role and influence in the country are ever increasing. It is in a utilitarian age like ours that it is well to appreciate the nobility, the uprightness, and the disinterested zeal of those professors, who, slaves to duty and friends of the arts and science, dedicate their lives to education and to guiding the steps of that youth which is illuminated by the divine ray of hope and whose heart thrills responsive to every generous inspiration.'

You remember the famous saying attributed to the Duke of Wellington. One day, the victor of Waterloo was visiting Oxford University where, in his youth he had been educated. Amidst the atmosphere of study and reflection, he cast his eyes on the desks at which he had worked and toiled and suddenly made this admission, which involves a great truth : 'It was here,' said he, 'that I won the battle of Waterloo' ; and when these brilliant defenders of a just cause will again see the walls of their old colleges, when they will breathe over again that atmosphere of science, of enlightened zeal and of judicious devotedness, so profoundly imbued with the religious spirit, they can also exclaim : 'It was here that we won the battle against prejudice and intolerance. This is the system of education which we wish to see established in the whole Dominion. Sir Alexander Campbell, whom I quote with pleasure because he received his education in the College of St. Hyacinthe where I was myself educated, said here in the Senate in 1875 :

> The object of the present Bill is to establish and perpetuate in the Northwest Territories the same system which prevails in Ontario and Quebec and which has done so much good in the interest of peace and harmony between the different peoples of the provinces.

A great writer, Sir, has said. 'A man must change his opinions often to remain in a party.' This aphorism emphasizes here at present an incontrovertible truth. Who are they who to-day object to the passing of this Bill—to what party do they belong? Did that party exist in 1875, when Mr. Mackenzie, at the suggestion of Hon. Edward Blake, and to avoid the troubles that had been raging for three years in New Brunswick, introduced the Bill respecting the Northwest Territories in which the following clause was inserted:

> When and as soon as any system of taxation shall be adopted in any district or portion of the Unorganized Territories, the Lieutenant Governor or Assembly, as the case may be, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education, and it shall therein be always provided that a majority of ratepayers in any district may establish such schools therein as they may think fit and make the necessary assessments and rates therefor; and further that the majority of ratepayers therein, whether Protestants or Roman Catholics may establish separate schools therein.

Sir Alexander Campbell then filled the position of leader of the opposition in the Senate and the measure passed unanimously. Why? Because—and history will tell it to the eternal shame of the opposition of to-day—the minority in the Northwest Territories was at the time a Protestant minority and nobody would have ever dreamed of the minority being Roman Catholic in the future. But, Sir, the rising tide of immigration, which has attracted thither to-day such a mass of humanity, has not changed the law of justice. In the Commons, Mr. Hall very properly recalled the fact that section 11 of the Act of 1875, which created separate schools, either Protestant or Roman Catholic, in the Northwest Territories, has stood upon the statute-books of Canada for upwards of thirty years. It has not been repealed, altered or amended in any respect during that period, although the Northwest Territories Act was under the consideration of parliament in 1885, '86, '89 and 1902.

I do not wonder at the present opposition. I know that reactions occur, not only in the physical, but in the moral and political world. 'All movement is rhythmical, that of opinion included. After going to one extreme a reaction in course of time carries it to the other extreme and then comes eventually a new reaction. The opinion which prevails is never quite right and only after numerous actions and reactions may it settle into the rational mean.' (Herbert Spencer—Facts and Comments.)

Nobody was taken by surprise. All right-thinking minds accept the Mackenzie Bill as establishing a permanent state of things. The Montreal 'Gazette,' on the 17th March, 1875, said, 'The Mackenzie Bill seeks to fix the constitution which is going to govern these vast territories in the future . . . . . Upon consideration it will be found, we think that Mr. Mackenzie has adopted the wise course. . . It will avoid all disputes about terms . . . and thus render at least improbable any of those complications which have harassed the political discussions of the past few years.'

Events have confirmed the truth of these words in a most striking manner. What have become of those who during nearly two decades controlled, uninterruptedly, the policy of this country? Where are those who, to my personal knowledge, had won to such an extent the confidence of the people, the clergy and the hierarchy that their sayings and doings were quoted with the greatest admiration. There only remains a few to relate their story, so true is it that he who lays a rash hand on the irrepressible sentiments that lie hidden in the depths of the heart of man, that he who wages impious war upon them, meets his punishment in his failure.

Thanks to God, thanks to our history, thanks to our trials and the examples and words of our great men, we French Canadians are to-day a powerful organism in the confederation, an organism that cannot be ignored without lessening and maiming yourselves. In what country has any one ever dreamed of governing or legislating against the will of a fraction of the ruled amounting to more than 30 per cent of the population? That would be folly. What makes and has always made the strength of the French Canadians, and will always vivify the solidarity of our race, is that, in spite of our surface differences, there is amongst us a small number of master ideas conceived and obeyed, as the intense rule of our relations towards each other and towards others. We cannot lose sight of the fact, moreover, that the Roman Catholics number upwards of 42 per cent of the population of this Dominion and that there are only a few counties in which the Catholic vote cannot win in a struggle on the religious question.

In spite of all that has thus far been said and done against us, we have remained faithful and always striven to maintain intact the bond that unites us to the British Crown. We undoubtedly love our old mother country, France, to which we are indissolubly attached by the ties of blood, but we also love England for the liberties which she has granted to us and which we have ever and always have done our share, and sometimes even more than our share, to win and to uphold. But, as I have already said elsewhere, there is a limit to our patience in the face of constant abuse and slander. If we are driven to it, if we are pushed to the bitter end, the time may come when we shall look elsewhere for the protection of our rights, but this will only be the last result of the outrageous fanaticism, lay, clerical and journalistic, of which we had such startling samples recently in the Ontario by-elections. These people should remember that if the British flag floats to-day over the Dominion and especially over the province of Quebec, the happy fact is due in a large measure to us French Canadians, and I now repeat what I said on another occasion that if we ever take our hands off the British flag, if we are, in spite of ourselves and against our dearest wishes, compelled to do this and to resent the abuse, injustice and intolerance of some of our copartners in this confederation, then confederation will go to smash and down will come the British flag. So far we have upheld that flag in spite of the abuse hurled against us and we do not need the advice of any lord or general to keep our hands on that flag, for we know that this abuse emanates from a small element, who are not fit to be citizens of this free country and who should rather be regarded as cranks whatever be their party, religion and even their nationality.

Fanaticism, bigotry, rash, brainless enthusiasm, give it whatever name you please, has never built up anything solid or done any good. On these heads, the history of England furnishes some terrible lessons. Catholic emancipation was the pretext for one of the vastest conspiracies ever hatched in that country, not because a fraction of the population were deprived of certain rights or privileges, but solely because others forming a numerous group had been freed and delivered from an outrageous ostracism.

The day of such things has passed. England has recognized the fact and shown her independence by raising a Catholic to the great dignity of the Chief Justiceship, by the appointment of another Catholic as Viceroy of India and later of Ireland—Lord Ripon, if I am not mistaken. I may further recall the noble attitude of the Gladstones, the Grahams, the Cobdens and the Brights towards the Ecclesiastical Dignities Bill and the establishment of a Catholic hierarchy in England. 'When I speak of a vote in parliament'—said Mr. John Bright, 'I endeavour to shut out from mind any idea of controlling influence down here or elsewhere. I am most happy when I can agree with you, but I think there is a higher, loftier and purer standard for a representative than even the influence of those whom he may represent and that standard is his own intelligence, his conscientious conviction of duty on the question before him.'

It was Quintilian, I think, who said that the principal feature of oratory, and a fortiori of legislation, is probity, without which it degenerates into declamation, deforming or exaggerating the facts, quoting falsely, exciting and exhausting the passions and the animosities of those in favour of whom it is used. I may repeat that it is the eternal law with tyrants to suspect the good faith of their friends.

Sir, it cannot be denied, a leaven of hatred is fermenting among a certain part of the population of this country. What is feeding it—what is its source? Hon. Mr. Fisher pointed it out in the other House when he said: 'No wonder that the Tory party should want to ignore the rights of a minority, the rights of weaker people in the country. This has been the history of Toryism through generations and through centuries. It has always advanced the view of the stronger controlling and ruling the weaker without regard for the privileges, feelings and distress of the weaker. It was the old principle of autocracy of oligarchy, when the few, the favoured few, had control over the rights of the many. We had a specimen of that in Canada in our early history, in the history of the family compact, and now, though passively, they show the same spirit in my own province.'

Reference has been made to the English Protestants leaving the province of Quebec, as an evidence of the intolerance of my fellow-countrymen. It is an undeniable fact that the English are moving away more and more from the counties where they were formerly the majority, especially in the section known as the eastern townships. I have studied the exodus of those who were formerly strong and powerful in the counties of Stanstead, Compton, Missisquoi, &c., and I find another cause for it, a natural cause, and one that may be termed voluntary and deliberate. The first, results from the natural increase of the French families. The hardy pioneers of the 'Bois Francs' have no greater satisfaction than to see themselves at the head of a family of ten, twelve or fifteen children, while the old English families, on the other hand, the first occupants of this domain, seem to hold the baby in extreme horror. The consequence is that the French settlers soon become the most numerous, penetrating one by one into the municipal councils and ending, but always without noise or violence, by forming the majority and taking over the reins of administration. The moment this happens, but not before, the signal is given to leave, to abandon the territory which, until then had been watched over with so much solicitude, and the properties, the farms, are put up for sale. My fellow-countrymen, with whom love of the soil is innate, are not slow to learn the news, to ascertain the terms of sale and the value of the property, and they have always a disinterested friend in the parish priest, who becomes the intermediary between the buyer and seller, but not the business agent. There are no ecclesiastical funds for that object. The simple-minded member, who asserted that there is a reptile fund to buy up the farms of the English in the townships provoked an immense amount of laughter. I may be permitted to tell him that on that occasion he missed a fine occasion to keep silence.

It has been said also that the taxes levied from corporations for the schools is distributed pro rata of the population although such corporations are largely composed of Protestants. The Montreal 'Gazette,' which has never manifested any very great sympathy for the French Canadian Catholics, but which has, however, as I have always noted, a fair sense of justice, replied impartially on that occasion.

Sir, we wish to live in peace, and this is possible, because it has existed. We are all jointly and severally dependent upon each other, not in the fashion of the lion, which cannot live without its victim. The role of the victim is not pleasing to us. We proved this under the union between 1840 and 1850, the tendency of government was to crush the French nationality. Now, it was precisely during this period that we asserted ourselves that we went through our apprenticeship in parliamentary life, that the French Canadian conscience awoke. The struggle has developed in us the spirit of resistance. We have learned what a French writer, who takes great interest in us, recently said and what you will willingly admit, that 'to get a footing among the English you must take your volume and assert your resistance. Energy and action are what they best understand and, it is only after feeling the vigour of an adversary that they are most inclined to desire him as a partner.' Is not this well depicted? Much has been said about the assimilation of the races. That is a sophism. 'Some men,' said Burnichon, 'are born business men and others are born artists or warriors. Hence a whole train of ideas, opinions and usages which differentiate certain societies of those who have not been so deeply impregnated by the mercantile spirit. We have perhaps not what is termed the business instinct. This is due to our Gallic blood, to atavic influences, to our qualities and defects. All these combine to give us a moral temperament which condemns us to leave to others the superiority in business, and really we see no reason to feel humiliated or aggrieved."

In spite of these divergencies of origin, of aspirations and of temperament our fine country, as Lord Grey recently said in his reply to the address of Laval University, at Montreal, 'with its unrivalled resources, its picturesque aspect, its glorious traditions and its intense development presents to the British empire, of which it forms part, (I may add, to the whole world), a unique spectacle. It is peopled by the descendants of two heroic races who, under the sheltering folds of the same flag, protected by a wise and liberal constitution, have a common destiny, that of labouring steadily for the development of their common patrimony. Here, the generous sap of the two great French and Anglo-Saxon races spreads out into branches interlaced by perfect concord.'

Sir, section 93 of the Confederation Act decrees that nothing in the Act of incorporation of the new provinces, shall prejudice any right or privilege in regard to separate schools enjoyed by any class of persons at the date of the going into force of the said Act. The separate schools which the Catholics of the Northwest actually enjoy are established under the ordinances of 1901. These ordinances were pronounced to be valid and constitutional by Sir John Thompson, on an appeal from the Catholics of the Northwest. There is no going back upon this fact; it cannot be shaken. The government's Bill embodies all these ordinances by clause 17, which is as follows :—

17. Section 93 of 'The British North America Act,' 1867, shall apply to the said province, with the substitution for paragraph (1) of the said section 93, of the following paragraph :—

'(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.'

(2) In the appropriation by the Legislature or distribution by the government of the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with the said chapter 29 or any Act passed in amendment thereof, or in substitution therefor, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in the said chapter 29.

(3) Where the expression 'by law' is employed in subsection 3 of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said chapters 29 and 30, and where the expression 'at the union,' is employed, in the said subsection 3, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

This is a compromise and in all compromises the contracting parties yield something of their rights.

Under the circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill should be accepted, especially after the changes that have been, but should never have been made in it. It should have been passed as originally submitted, but the moment that the general principle of separate schools is recognized and sanction given to the apportionment of the moneys that the Catholics shall have the right to receive, in order to support their own schools, it is useless to fight over words and the Bill should be accepted.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I can congratulate the hon. gentleman on his eloquence and the spirit of enthusiasm which he must have evoked in the breasts of his countrymen. I would just point out to him that it is among his fellow-countrymen that the difference of opinion on this Bill has particularly existed, and they are the parties to whom we should address these sentiments of peace. Knowing the great power of the French Canadian element in this country I am sure they could have demanded anything, and that is the reason I think it would have been better if they had demanded the fullest amount possible. I am satisfied with what they have at present, and I have given my reasons for voting for the measure, and have nothing further to say, excepting that during the whole of this debate no hon. gentleman has mentioned one particular phase of it, a matter which occurred at the time when Sir Mackenzie Bowell held the reins of government. At that time the school question was at its highest point, and the manner in which he managed it deserved, on the part of any Catholic, of Ontario particularly, cordial gratitude and thanks. The Bill which he brought in was one which satisfied their wants more than any other which preceded it or has been introduced since that date. However, I am not going to touch on that Bill or make a comparison. Reference has been made to the Orangemen; I am not their defender. There are able Orangemen in this House who can take care of themselves. I simply crave permission to state one fact. I was at one time a member of a company and an interested one, in which the chief actors were Orangemen; I mention this for the purpose of showing that bigotry does not enter into all their doings. Then in order to complete my statement with regard to the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), I wish to state that the Catholics of Ontario are grateful to him for the magnanimous course which he took on that occasion. Further I may say that when he was premier he made more appointments of Catholics to high positions than any other minister before or after. It would be very interesting to consider the matter; I will refer to a few. He made an appointment of a Catholic to the office of Collector of Customs for Montreal, one of the finest appointments in this country, and one that was sought after for by many others. A French Roman Catholic and an Irish Catholic applied for the position, and the hon. leader of the opposition, considering the merits of the men, made the appointment. The religion of the man was not made a barrier, as might have been done by other men. Then came Judge Curran, a distinguished member of the House of Commons. He was very anxious to retire from the public labours of the House of Commons, and his friends sought to obtain a position on the bench for him. That was accomplished only by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and could not be accomplished by anybody else strange to say; and it was opposed by the French Catholics, if I remember rightly, because they considered—that is the idea we had of it in Ontario—that the appointment was theirs by right. However, I will not deal with that. There was a determined opposition to the appointment, but it was made because Sir Mackenzie had more confidence in him; at any rate he was appointed. There is a man who never would have been judge if it had not been for the hon. leader of the opposition. Next there were two senators, Senator O'Brien, of Montreal, a very respectable and wealthy man, was appointed from the city of Montreal by the hon. leader of the opposition, a man without any party or other influence.

Then, there is the appointment of the Hon. Sir W. Hingston by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell. I might mention others, because a record such as the hon. leader of the opposition made in the office of premier should not be overlooked. We are about to close this matter, and I hope that there will be no further action taken in it. I hope that the hon. leader of the opposition may yet—because he is getting younger and more juvenile every year—take the reins of government again, and direct us in the way we should go. I also congratulate hon. gentlemen on the good feeling which has prevailed, and hope we will all go home with a feeling of peace and good-will.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman said something yesterday in contradiction of what he has stated to-day. He thanked God that not one Irishman had been concerned in that Bill. He thanked God it was only a split among the French of this country, and that the Irishmen were not a party to it. He comes out now with the eulogium of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, because he feels remorse, and he wants to put himself in a good position with reference to his leader. When the hon. gentleman from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) moved the six months' hoist, the hon. gentleman from Kingston (Mr. Sullivan) could have shown all his admiration for him in sustaining his chief—which he did not do. But we accept the good words he utters to-day as a proof of the remorse he feels.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is no such thing as remorse in my case. If the hon. gentleman is incapable of understanding a true friendly sentiment, I am not. I say there is no such thing as remorse in my mind. I did not say, I thank God. I said there was no quarrel between the Irish Catholics. I said it in a humorous way, and he makes a fuss about that. I think we should cultivate a friendly sentiment. I do not care for the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, the hon. gentleman does.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I only mentioned it because I thought it was a matter which should be mentioned. I hope that I shall never disregard the principles which I hold.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley):

> That Bill (69) be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole to strike out clause 17.

As I intimated before, the battle which has been waged in both Chambers was largely concentrated upon this clause, and I desire to state shortly, without entering into any controversial discussion of the clause, why I do so. Permit me to say that my reason for voting against the various amendments which were moved against the Bill during the forenoon, was owing to the fact that I have taken the ground, as strongly as I possibly can, that any interference by the federal government with the educational privileges of the west would be an invasion of the British North America Act, and for that reason I opposed the various amendments which were moved from time to time. Under clause 3 of this Bill, the British North America Act in its entirety has been incorporated into the Bill, and, as under section 93 of the British North America Act, the exclusive right is given to the provinces to legislate with reference to education, the passage of clause 17 would manifestly be an invasion of whatever rights are given to the majority or the minority under clause 93 of the British North America Act and its subsections. In view of this fact, I take the ground, and assert strongly the rights of those provinces to legislate, in the language of the Act, 'exclusively in relation to education,' and, therefore, I move that this clause be stricken out.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division :

Legris,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to have my name inserted in the list of members who voted. I stood up but the clerk did not call my name. I voted against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Hon. Mr. Macdonald (B.C.) has not voted. Is there any reason for that ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I declared to the House that I would not vote for any amendment because I think it is only wasting time.

The motion for the third reading of the Bill was carried, and the Bill was then read a third time and passed.

PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN AUTONOMY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (70) An Act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Saskatchewan. He said :

I presume, if hon. gentlemen desire, the same amendments may be considered as having been moved to this Bill as were moved to Bill (69).

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest that the same amendments be printed in the minutes as having been moved to this Bill, and the same division being taken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can it be possible the hon. gentleman wants to forego making that speech and having it appear in the debates. Perhaps we might adopt the same principle with reference to this, and have the speeches appear in Hansard the same as in the case of the former Bill. Let us take it for granted the hon. gentleman has made his speech and also that the remainder of the speeches have been made.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed on the same division as Bill (69).

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading (Bill 170) an Act to amend the Militia Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a Bill of two or three lines. The purport of it is to give authority to increase the permanent force from 2,000 to 5,000. Hon. gentlemen know that for the past two years communications have been exchanged with the imperial government, and in fact an agreement was made at the last conference in London that Canada should assume control of the garrisons at Esquimalt and Halifax, and that the imperial government should be relieved of that part of the burden at all events. In carrying out that suggestion it has been found necessary to increase the permanent force, and authority has been taken to increase it up to 5,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is somewhat unfortunate that a Bill of this character and importance should be left until the very last hours of the session of parliament, unless indeed the Senate is to be regarded as a mere machine to record assent to whatever is proposed by the government without that consideration so necessary and so important in a matter involving the large expenditure of money which this Bill does. I do not know that there is any one in Canada at the present moment, even those who are opposed to the government and their past policy in reference to the militia force of this country, who opposes the increase of the force and making the militia service in Canada more efficient.

But there are a large number who decidedly object to the proposition which is now before them. I must confess, looking at the proposition from the standpoint that I do, that there is a very serious objection in regard to the extra expenditure which has to be incurred in the establishment of the proposed force and in taking over the management of the two most important depots of the Dominion. The expense attending the policy which is involved in the carrying out of the provisions of this Bill is of such a character that the people of Canada will be surprised when they realize the amount it will cost them. It is a great misfortune that the proposition made by the imperial authorities was not accepted by the government of Canada. Looking at it from the pecuniary standpoint, I am quite convinced that the management of the Militia Department and the militia force in Canada will cost at least double what it is supposed it will cost under this Bill. We should not forget that the management of a standing army from an economical standpoint has been a close study by the British authorities for centuries, and that after their long experience they are able to maintain a force at an expense I am safe in saying 50 per cent less than it will be under the management of our Department of Militia. If I understand the offer made by the imperial authorities, it was that they were willing to accept $1,000,000 in aid of the navy or for military purposes and to continue the maintenance of the forces in Halifax and Esquimalt. That proposition was rejected by the government, and in rejecting it they made an offer to take over those two depots and maintain them at the expense of Canada. The proposition before us now involves an expenditure of about $2,000,000, double the amount for which the imperial government was willing to maintain a force in these two depots. Further, if any one supposes the expenditure will be confined to $2,000,000, they will find themselves marvellously mistaken within the next two or three years. It is not merely the cost of maintaining forces at these two depots, but there is the expenditure incurred in keeping the depots in repair. Any one who has been through the forts at Halifax and Esquimalt has some conception of what it has cost the imperial government to place them in the condition they are in to-day, and from the experience we have had in the past, of keeping up forts which are supposed to be places of defence, we have some conception of what this service will cost in the future. This point was strongly brought out in a memo. written some two years ago by the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), which I hope most hon. senators have read. I find at that early period, when this question was first mooted, that the hon. gentleman expressed views which I hold to-day. Whether he has changed his opinions on that question or not I am not prepared to say. I find in this memo. under the head of 'Naval Defence,' the following paragraph :—

> It may be remarked that while it may have been right and commendable for the Canadian representatives at the Colonial Conference to undertake to garrison Halifax and Esquimalt, it is perhaps not to be regretted that the offer was not accepted. The garrisoning of those fortresses would be an exceedingly expensive undertaking, and the money it would cost can be spent to much better advantage elsewhere. As the two ports are needed for the purposes of the Royal Navy, it does not seem unreasonable that the mother country should provide the garrisons.

With these sentiments I am fully in accord, and I am convinced that any man who has given this subject the thought and attention which it deserves will come to the same conclusion. It will be remembered that when General O'Grady-Haly was here, he made a proposition for the garrisoning of many of the ports and suggested an expenditure of about $3,500,000. At that time the hon. gentlemen now in power raised the strongest possible objection to the proposal as being too extravagant. Does any one suppose that the assuming of the responsibility of keeping these two depots in order and maintaining the force proposed of about 5,000 men, will not exceed that sum of $3,500,000? If so, I can tell them they have very little conception of the expenditure attending the Militia Department. The present estimates in connection with the militia force of Canada amount to $6,500,000 in the various branches. When the Canadian delegates at the conference in England had this question under discussion, the imperial authorities would have been satisfied at that time with a promise of an expenditure of $1,000,000. Now we have been constantly exceeding that sum, and very properly so too. Were these sums expended in the perfecting of the whole militia of this country, in military tactics and shooting and in that which is necessary for successful warfare, I do not think any Canadian would object to it, but under the present circumstances the militia force is to be neglected to a very great extent, and we are to spend the large amount to which I have called attention on a miniature permanent force. That is really what will be the result. We know that in England they are not increasing, nor is it the policy of the War Department to increase, the permanent force. On the contrary they are devoting their time and attention and spending their money in organizing and perfecting the militia force, so that in case of difficulties when they require the country to be properly defended, the people themselves will be in a position to step forward and resist invasion.

It will be observed also in this expenditure that while the fighting force is small the staff is to be exceedingly large and when you have a large staff you have an expenditure from which very little good results. I know it is argued that in case of difficulty you should have men trained to take command of whatever force may be brought into the field. I admit that principle to a certain extent. I go further; I say that if you take out of the undisciplined portion of our inhabitants in the rural sections, men who have never drilled except a few days every year and put them under qualified officers you can readily place them in a position to take the field. This is the experience of every military and volunteer officer in this country. But is there not something more important than all this expenditure, behind this scheme of the government? Is it not preparing this country for that period of its existence hoped for by the premier, when it would be ripe like an apple and ready to fall from the tree, and a severance take place between Canada and the mother country. It seems to me that that principle underlies the policy of the government. Take the utterances of the premier in Boston and his speeches in the House of Commons, and you will find that he has enunciated that idea and said it is the dream of his life. Is it not preparing this country for the change? I will not say he desires to get rid of the Union Jack, because as long as we are Canadians, the British flag will fly in this country. But is it not a preparation for the change, to refuse to assist in the maintenance of the navy which is to Canadian commerce what insurance is to a merchant? The merchant insures his property against destruction by fire. The British navy is to the commerce of Canada, which is rapidly growing, precisely what an insurance company is to a merchant who insures his goods. Looking at it from that mercenary standpoint, is it not the duty of the Canadian government and people to spend a portion of their revenue in the maintenance of that force? Every reasonable man, every loyal man, every man who desires to continue the connection between Canada and the mother country, and to have this country considered not a mere dependency of Great Britain, but an integral part of the empire, would approve of such a policy, so that when you speak of a British subject, you speak of one who feels himself a citizen of the empire wherever the British flag floats. That is my idea, and I cannot help thinking that the underlying principle which is governing the present administration in the course they are pursuing is to prepare the country for independence. Last session, when I called attention to the utterances of the premier on this subject, I was contradicted and called to account by the hon. senator from Toronto who is not in his place just now. Having heard these utterances of the premier, I know I was quite safe in repeating them, but in order that there may be no mistake I will read extracts from the right hon. gentlemen's speeches. I have here an extract from his speech delivered in Boston, whether at the time the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was there or not, I am not prepared to say; but it was the period when they were advocating unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, when my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce told the people that if they would only adopt that policy it would make the northern part of America a northern state of the republic so far as trade was concerned. Those were the utterances of that hon. gentleman as reported, for which he was complimented very highly by the members of the Board of Trade which he was then addressing.

It was then suggested that the greatest possible honour that could be conferred upon him would be to make him the representative of Canada in the Senate of the United States. Whether he acquiesced in that suggestion or not, I am not prepared to say. I have no recollection of having read any repudiation of the suggestion, or whether he prefers the honourable position he occupies to-day in this body, much more important than the Senate of the United States. These gentlemen, during the period to which I have referred, were in the habit of pandering—I do not mean to use the word offensively—constantly toadying and pandering to the people of the United States and claiming that if they once got into power, their influence with that country was so great that in less than six months they would have all they had been advocating during the eighteen years they were in opposition. However, when they attained power, they received the same treatment from the United States that the Conservatives had met with. As soon as they approached the government at Washington, they were turned aside, as a party who were seeking something for which there was to be no return.

But that is aside altogether from what I am discussing at this moment. Turning to 'Hansard,' you will find that the premier gave utterance to this language:

> I am a subject of the British Crown, but whenever I have to choose between the interests of England and of Canada, it is manifest to me that the interests of my country are identical with the interests of the United States of America.

In answer to Mr. Foster, the following passages occur ('Hansard,' 1902, pages 1194, 1195):—

> He speaks as if Canada was to remain for ever a colony, but I say that Canada is not always to remain a colony. Light as our dependence may be on the mother country, that dependence is not to remain for ever. . . .
> Perhaps the next step may be said to be complete independence, but there is no desire to have complete independence in Canada to-day. Even with those who, like myself, look to independence as the supreme goal, there remains a love for the motherland and a desire to remain in connection with it, but in the nature of things our relations must be compatible with our interests.

Later in the speech, Sir Wilfrid said ('Hansard,' page 1200):

> I hold out to my fellow-countrymen the idea of independence, but whenever the day comes, it must come by the consent of both countries, and we shall continue to keep the good feeling and the good-will of the motherland. If we are true to our record we will again exhibit to the world the unique, the unprecedented example of a nation achieving its independence by slow degrees.

And in concluding, he said ('Hansard,' page 1202):

> I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada, to see Canada an independent nation in due course of time.

Is not the policy they are now following with reference to the forts, taking them over and removing the British soldiers from the country, an indication of what the premier, if not his cabinet, desires to accomplish. There are other portions of the hon. gentleman's remarks of a similar character, to which I could call the attention of the Senate. Then one of the premier's active supporters, Mr. Monette, advocates the withdrawal of Canada from the empire, claiming that we ought to be free rather than slaves. He is reported as having said:

> I admired the leader of the government when he said that Canada would have to be detached from Great Britain by-and-by, as the ripe fruit is detached from the tree.

If these be the honest convictions of the premier of this country, and he desires to ripen the apple as rapidly as possible, in order that it may fall from the tree without a revolution, as might occur in many countries, he is taking a course in submitting this Bill, calculated to produce that result.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Absurd.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is all very well to say absurd, and that we should not vote money unless we expend it ourselves. There is plenty of money that we vote which is not spent directly by the people, and as an integral part of the British empire, desiring the maintenance of the connection between what are termed now the different colonies and the mother country, there should be no hesitation in appropriating such an amount of money as may be necessary to assist in maintaining the army and navy. In doing that we are contributing to the support of an army and navy which is to defend ourselves as well as the other parts of the empire. In raising a military force and placing it as we are in a position practically independent of the War Office at home, we are doing what might be done by a foreign country, which I hope we shall not become at any time. That view may not be relished by those who are responsible for the policy which has been adopted in this country; but they are my honest convictions; and though I may not live long enough to see it, I think there are gentlemen in this House who will find that if the party remains in power they will maintain a policy of this kind continuously until they believe they are in a position to be independent of the imperial authorities in everything that pertains to the maintenance of the militia force or tends to cement more closely the bond that exists and should continue to exist between the mother country and ourselves. The late Alexander Mackenzie was very tenacious on questions of this kind, and when the military college was established, and the Militia Bill was placed in the statute-book, he refused pointedly to accept the suggestion then made that the major general should be a Canadian, not that he doubted the ability of Canadian officers to manage the militia, but he laid down the principle that as a portion of the British empire he desired to do everything possible to knit together the different parts of the empire as closely as possible; and he thought it would be the best policy to secure the services of a well trained and qualified British officer to take the position of major general. It is unnecessary for me to enter into the reasons which have caused the severing of that connection between the mother country and Canada. That is familiar to every reader of Canadian affairs of the last few years. I do not know that the present government wish at the present moment to snap the slight cord which binds us to the mother country through the appointment of the Governor General by the imperial government. It cannot be done all in a moment, but the feeling will gradually grow until the premier's dream is realized and he can congratulate himself on the accomplishment of his prediction that the apple would ripen and drop from the parent stem, and Canada would become an independent country. What we should do as an independent nation beside the power south of us, I do not intend to argue at the present moment. Probably if the time arrives, as I hope it will in the lifetime of many of whom are listening to me at the present moment, that we have forty or fifty millions of people in this country when the great Northwest is properly settled, we may be in a position, not, I hope, to be independent, but in case of necessity to assist in fighting the battles of the empire. That the feeling of this country is in that direction is verified by the experience of the last few years, in reference to the war in South Africa. The people of this country showed a loyal spirit and a willingness to fight if necessary for the prestige of the empire. That feeling is growing and will continue to grow. I hope the public schools will teach the idea, as we do in our section of the country, of allegiance to the Crown, not as a foreign country but as a part of a great empire, and of as much importance as the mother country itself. I should regret exceedingly to see the principle expressed in those utterances of the premier grow in this country. I hope that every school child will be taught to revere his country and to venerate his flag. In the United States that is done everywhere. You cannot go into any school in that country without finding every scholar with a flag to wave wherever he goes. Look at the travellers from the United States who visit Canada ; I have witnessed within the last few days, ladies as well as young men, with the United States flag pinned to their breast. That may not appear to be of any consequence, but it indicates a love and veneration for their country. That is the spirit which should prevail in Canada and a principle that we should inculate in the rising generation, instead of the idea conveyed in the utterances of the Prime Minister that we should prepare ourselves for independence. God forbid that it should come for many years, owing to the position that we occupy and our undeveloped strength. I should like to see this country continue to grow as it is growing, in strength and greatness, and military as well as commercial power, and when we have our vast territories populated and number our people by scores of millions, I hope that we shall then be a strong arm in the defence of the British empire, rather than become a puny nation in our own right. I deprecate strongly the constant utterance of sentiments similar to those which have been expressed by the premier of Canada on this subject. I repeat I look upon the policy which we are now asked to adopt as having that object in view, apart altogether from the extraordinary expenditure which it must necessarily involve. We are spending millions of dollars in the maintenance of our forces. I care not if we spend two or three millions more, if it were to perfect the rising generation in the knowledge of military duty in case of necessity, but I do object though the majority behind the government is sufficient to enable them to carry this measure, and Bills of a similar character, through parliament, irrespective of their merits. The people of this country should consider well what they are doing before they adopt a policy which underlies this measure and which looks to the severance of this country from the mother country. I want to see Canada continue to be an absolute and positive part of the British empire, so that when they speak of the outlying portions of the empire they may not, as they have in the past, sneer at us as colonists. We in Canada are as much British subjects as those who are to the manner born, and as such I desire to see this country maintain its position in the empire. I am confident that every class, every race and every creed is safer under the British flag as it is to-day and under the policy that guides Great Britain in the treatment of all her subjects in every portion of the world, than is the case in any other country, whether it be a republic or a monarchy. Evidences multiply every day to demonstrate that fact, and I want no greater boast for myself and my children than to know that we are subjects of that great empire. My predictions may not be correct; my diagnosis of the scheme itself may not be correct. I see my hon. friend opposite me smiling, but I have expressed my honest convictions, and I believe honestly that I have explained the secret policy that is guiding the premier of this country to-day. Whether he has taken all his colleagues into his confidence in this respect I am not prepared to say, but I repeat the caution which I have uttered. I hope that my fears will not be realized, but whether they are or not, one thing is certain, we are adopting a policy the end of which we cannot see. I should not be surprised ere long to see the government taking another step and advocating that a Canadian be appointed Governor General. I am not prepared to say that a Canadian would not administer the affairs of this country just as well as the present or any other Governor General, but that would be severing the last link which connects us with the mother country, and we should be very cautious how much further we go in the direction in which the present government has gone in refusing the offer made by the imperial government in reference to an appropriation for the maintenance of the navy and in assuming the grave responsibility we are now assuming in taking charge of the two military depots of Halifax and Esquimalt. Looking at it from an imperial standpoint, my own opinion is that Great Britain should keep her forces in both these places. We might raise and maintain a regiment in each place under the direction of imperial officers, and under imperial authority, maintaining both positions as naval depots. I should like to see that policy adopted. If not, then give over to the Military Department of England a certain sum. The amount asked for was comparatively small, when we consider what is given by the smaller colonies of Australia and New Zealand towards the maintenance of that force, which, as I have already said, is a protection to the commerce of this country. I do not believe I am mistaken in reading the events that have occurred; time will tell whether my predictions are correct or not. I regret that the Bill has come down at a period when it cannot be given the consideration which so important a measure deserves. It is for that reason, and holding the opinions which I have expressed on this question, I deemed it my duty to occupy some little time in putting them before the House. The government may profit by them or treat them with contempt, but I believe the country as a whole shares my view, and if it were tested to-morrow you would find that the people would repudiate any tendency towards severing the tie with the mother country.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I might call the attention of the House and of my hon. friend opposite in the first place to the fact that this Bill is a purely permissive Bill. It does not require that we should create a force of 5,000 men, but it gives permission under certain conditions to raise our permanent force to that number; but I can say to the hon. gentleman that unless it becomes absolutely necessary to do so, it is not likely that the full permission will be availed of. My hon. friend has travelled pretty far afield, and has indulged in a variety of imaginations, which I trust are not serious, as to what is the latent policy, what is the secret and insidious design of the present government in asking permission to raise the permanent force from two to five thousand men, in case of need. Among other things he took occasion to allude to a certain question which attracted a good deal of attention a few years ago in which I was myself pretty prominently concerned, the desire to improve our commercial relations with the United States. Now, I can tell the hon. gentleman this, and I speak with knowledge derived from intercourse with men in the best possible position to judge of the temper of the United States at that time, that had the advice given by the Reform party at that time been attended to and accepted, the government of which my hon. friend was a member would have seized the opportunity which presented itself in 1888, 1889 and 1890, as it had never presented itself before, and as it has not presented itself again, to establish very friendly relations with the United States. I venture to say had we been in power at the time I have mentioned, we would have established then relations which would have been enormously to the advantage not merely of Canada and the United States, but of the whole English race. Because I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have a far better dream, a far better scheme than any that he has suggested when I say that the greatest service that Canada can render the empire, would be to form a link between, and assist in bringing together, in at any rate a defensive union the great nations which unfortunately were many years ago severed and which now constitute the Anglo-Saxon race. However, that is a thing which I do not intend to discuss at all on the present occasion, although it is something which I may tell the hon. gentleman there is now a far better chance of bringing about than ever before.

The hon. gentleman was pleased to insinuate that the present premier of the Dominion, although he did not say it in so many words, was at heart more or less disloyal to British connection. I ask that the present premier and the present premier's government of which I am a member, shall be judged, not by the insinuations of an opponent, but by their acts and deeds, by what they have done to promote British connection, by what they have done to send a respectable contingent of Canadian troops to fight the battles of the empire in other countries. There were opportunities during the hon. member's regime when he was a member of the Canadian cabinet; when during that period did any detachment of Canadian troops paid for and provided by the Canadian government, go to fight the battles of the empire? When? I rather think the request was made, or the suggestion was offered, but they did not see their way to comply with it.

Now under our regime when the occasion did arise we responded and all Canada responded honourably and well to the call. I think I am correct in saying that between seven and eight thousand of our citizens were found fighting in the ranks of the British troops and they were by no manner of means the worst troops the British had on that occasion, as British generals of the highest ranks have been proud to testify. But I may add as an incident that among these seven thousand were found seven sons of ministers in the firing line and one at least, and that the son of the Minister of Militia, paid the penalty with his life. There are other ways in which it is in our power and has been in our power to testify to our desire to promote good relations between the mother country and Canada. When did these hon. gentlemen during all the time they were in power give any substantial preference to the British manufacturer? The thing was proposed to them; I proposed it, my hon. friend Sir Louis Davies, now a member of the Supreme Court of Canada proposed—and I think my hon. friend was in the House at the time—that Canada, in consideration of the fact that the British markets were open to her people without let, toll or hindrance, should give some corresponding advantage to the British manufacturer and allow him to enter into our markets. Did my hon. friends see their way to do that? They could talk loudly then, as they talked loudly now, and have talked loudly on many occasions about forwarding and increasing our connection with Great Britain, but when it came to doing anything substantial for that purpose my hon. friend could not see it at all. We and we alone were the only government that gave any substantial advantage to British manufacturers in the Canadian market, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that a good deal of our success in developing trade to the very remarkable extent that we have developed it with Great Britain has been due to that same British preference. Ever since it was introduced, and I am in the judgment of the House and of men who have extensive dealings with Great Britain, Canadian goods and everything Canadian have obtained much greater preference in the British market, not by law, but still in effect and in substance, than ever they had before, and all our agents report to us that nothing could be better than the good feeling shown to-day towards Canada in Great Britain. That is largely if not altogether the result of that same preference which we granted to Great Britain. The hon. gentleman took occasion to allude to the fact that we had been obliged to get rid of a certain distinguished officer who unfortunately could not see his way to accept the Canadian Minister of Militia as his proper chief. Now I recollect exceeding well the circumstances under which other British major generals, other British officers were treated by the government of which my hon. friend was a member a good many years ago. I know the difficulties they had to contend with.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To whom does the hon. gentleman refer?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Major General Luard, for one, whom I heard Sir John Macdonald himself speaking of in another chamber, in terms that could by no means be considered complimentary. My hon. friend knows that similar difficulties arose in connection with a great many of the officers sent out here. The fact is the position was an untenable one. These worthy gentlemen always considered themselves imperial officers first and only in a very secondary degree officers of the Canadian government. Men who take our money and come to serve under the Canadian government have to be taught, as some of these gentlemen had to be taught, that the Canadian government are their masters so long as they derive pay from the Canadian people. That lesson was taught, but as there was found great difficulty in impressing this on the minds of the gentlemen we decided, and decided wisely, that for the future we would remove this serious friction and see to it that these gentlemen, whose value I do not deny in the least as officers, whose opinions I am perfectly willing to accept as expert in their way, that these gentlemen when brought here must come with the clear and distinct understanding that when they come to Canada and accept the money of the Canadian people they are bound to render a loyal subordination and respect to the chiefs of the Canadian government who are set over them. That, as everybody knows, was the history of our difficulties with these gentlemen, and I do not think there is a Canadian to be found to say we were not strictly within our rights and doing our duty in insisting that these gentlemen should so conduct themselves, and that it is infinitely better for us that there should be at once a clear understanding. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to turn up the statements made in another place by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on the occasion of the difficulties with Major General Hutton, he will see a clear definition of the relations which those officers should maintain towards the Canadian minister, and it was only in the event of direct and clear disobedience and disregard of those instructions that any difficulty ever arose with us. I do not know that it is worth while at this moment to say much on the other question to which my hon. friend has alluded, the more so as I think he misrepresents and misunderstands the temper of our people on a very important point. I do not think that it is our duty as a free people or the duty of the government as representing a free people to take the taxes of this country and to pay them over to any government whatever in which we are not directly represented, whether it be the British government or not. It is our duty, in my judgment, so long as we continue a part of the British empire, to be prepared if need be, to play our part and we have shown that we are prepared to do so. For my part I would be perfectly ready whenever any assault is made on the British empire, whenever we are called upon to assist, to render all possible aid in defending the British Crown and British territories; but I am not prepared, and I do not think my hon. friend has weighed his words well when he says that we ought to be prepared under any pretense to take the money of Canada and hand it over either for army or navy, to be administered by officials over whom we have no control. I am bound to say that the events which occurred in South Africa and certain events that have occurred since are not in my judgment of a character to inspire us with the most undoubted confidence as to the way in which those moneys would be likely to be expended. Briefly, I am prepared, and the government of which I am a member are prepared, to do our duty by the empire and to do our whole duty; and we think our whole duty to the empire will be best discharged by having a moderate permanent force of our own. If I may add my own individual opinion, it will best be discharged by taking such steps that from one end of Canada to the other, there shall be trained a large number of efficient riflemen, or at any rate men instructed in the use of the rifle and in the elements of drill, out of which body, in case of need, a very substantial corps might be formed and very substantial assistance might be rendered should the necessities of the empire require it. For the present I say we are perfectly justified in asking for a small increase under the circumstances, particularly when it is remembered that the British government have made it a special point with us to take charge, because it was an alternative proposition they made, of these two great points, which for reasons best known to themselves they do not propose to maintain at their own expense any longer. I think we chose the right alternative. It is more consonant with our dignity, better for the empire at large and better for us that we are going to do this instead of paying a lump sum into the British exchequer. It is better that we should maintain these depots at our own cost and charge, and man them with our own troops; and I think then the people of Canada will sustain us in that decision.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (190) An Act to amend the Customs Tariffs Act, 1897.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (205) An Act to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (206) An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively, 30th June, 1905, and 30th June, 1906.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

The Senate adjourned until this evening at 8 o'clock.

THIRD SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at 8 o'clock.

MORNING SITTING.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that when the House adjourns this evening it do stand adjourned until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, the sitting to last from 11 until 1.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to mention a matter which is very personal, which affects my character, and therefore I will ask the Senate to allow me an opportunity to correct the false impression of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) whether he obtained that impression unwittingly or not. I obtained from the reporters of the Senate a verbatim report of what I said. If I used the words which this hon. gentleman has stated with the meaning he places upon them, I would go down on my knees and apologize to him. It has been my pride that I have been on good terms with every member in this House, and I wish to state that I have taken pains to be as courteous as I could to the French members of the House irrespective of the party they belong to. When I rose to make some remarks yesterday a spirited debate was in progress, and for those who were not taking part in it, it was proceeding for such a length of time, I thought I might divert attention by a few humorous remarks; and that is all the intention I had. I stated:

> This is a first-class ruction and particularly agreeable to me. I want all of you of all denominations——

I meant of all parties.

> —to listen. This is a row among Frenchmen. They are always accusing the Irishmen of having a row. We have no interest in this. The Irishmen are quite contented and happy and enjoying the squabble among our friends.

There is nothing in that which could call forth the very bitter remarks made by the hon. gentleman, and the conclusions which he drew from it were particularly bad. It had all the venom of a cobra in it, and that is the reason I will not allow it to pass if I can get redress. He said also that I gave Sir Mackenzie Bowell a little eulogy—it was not a eulogy, but a statement of facts. I thought other members would have mentioned that, as every other matter of history or event of any importance connected with educational history was mentioned except that matter, and as that was omitted, I thought it was my duty to mention it. I sent for that Remedial Bill last night, and I asked the hon. leader of the opposition if it was introduced by him, and he said yes. I knew for years past all that the hon. leader of the opposition had done for Catholics and I was perfectly justified in what I said. I had no idea of currying favour at all and I had no remorse. What should I have remorse for? If I had voted any other way I should have had remorse. I thought there would have been a conference in this matter, but that was not held. I thought that the government would give some opinion in relation to it, but it was not given. Therefore I was free to vote according to the dictates of my conscience and I did so. I had nothing to gain by adopting such a course. I was not canvassed by a single member of this House. I never thought that any vote I gave on this matter would be questioned, and therefore I hope the hon. gentleman does not think I entertained the unworthy and blasphemous feeling which he attributed to me. He said that I thanked God it was the Frenchmen that had the row. I would not use such a blasphemous expression. All the politeness of debate is not confined to the French members; they will allow some of the rest of us to have a share in it. But there are the facts, and it is the duty of that hon. gentleman to retract the incorect statement which he made. It is immaterial to me whether he does so or not, but I say to the band of French members who are here that I have the highest opinion of them. I had not the slightest idea of injuring their feelings in any way, and I hope the House will think I was not guilty of making improper remarks. I did not intend to say anything to hurt any one's feelings.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Could we not proceed with the Militia Bill now?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was under the impression when I made a few remarks a while ago that we were discussing the Militia Bill, but we could make them applicable to the Militia Bill. I thought it was the Militia Bill that was under discussion and not the measure merely changing the word 'two' to 'five.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was going to make a few remarks in reply to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I will not say that this Bill will be opposed, but owing to the turn the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave to the discussion, something will have to be said about it.

ONTARIO AND MINNESOTA POWER COMPANY BILL.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill 86) an Act respecting the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company.—Hon. Mr. McMullen.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not unopposed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The parties have all agreed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a document signed by the parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So have I ; but it is not signed by the members of this House.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move concurrence in the amendments made by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan), who has given notice that he would move an amendment when the Bill came up for the third reading, I am authorized by him to ask—and I hope the House will consent—to have that notice of amendment dropped, as the contending parties agreed to withdraw any opposition. I also crave the permission of the House to withdraw a notice of motion that I intended to make, and I move that these two amendments be allowed to drop.

The SPEAKER—It is not necessary to make a motion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I should like to make an explanation. I understand a certain agreement has been arrived at between those parties who were contending before the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. The amendment incorporating this agreement will have to be inserted in the Bill, if it is agreeable to the House, at the third reading. If you remove from the order paper the notice which is given of the present amendments, how will you have them placed in the Bill without the consent of the House on this motion, which will throw over until to-morrow the third reading of the Bill ?

The SPEAKER—This is only concurrence in the report.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I fancy it would be the better policy to move the agreement as against the report, and then the Bill will be ready for amendments, and you will save certainly one sitting of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand the hon. gentleman proposes that we go on with the consideration of the Bill, the amendments will be moved and a sub-amendment will be brought in to remove the amendments.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes ; or to move the agreement agreed upon in the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move that the amended Bill, as reprinted and distributed, be substituted for the original Bill and that the same be now read a third time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask whether the amendments which have been made to this Bill were considered and concurred in by the Railway Committee? This is a totally new Bill, and not the Bill that was introduced ; and it is a grave question how far this interferes with the rights and privileges of the province of Ontario. The two parties interested may probably have agreed upon the terms of this Act, but if the House has taken the trouble to look over the amended measure they will find that it deals with what might be called civil rights and property, and it deprives the province of Ontario of all rights and all privileges to guard the interests of their own province, from the fact that whatever agreement is entered into between the municipality and the Power Company under this Bill has to be confirmed and approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners. What have the Board of Railway Commissioners to do with the transmission of power created on the Rainy river? I can understand there would not be so much objection to this Bill if the words 'Board of Railway Commissioners' were struck out of each clause and the words 'Lieutenant Governor in Council of the province of Ontario,' inserted. Perhaps the House may be aware that this Power Company entered into an agreement securing certain rights and privileges on the Rainy river from the Ontario government. That is so far as it affected the land and the riparian rights of land owners to the land under the water. After they had made that arrangement they entered into another bargain just before the election, and that bargain was not so favourable to the town of Fort Frances as the first one. In fact, as the Secretary of State himself admitted, it bore upon its face rather suspicious indications. Then they came to the Dominion government and asked for power to build dams and to regulate the flow of water. The river being a navigable stream, of course they had to come here, but in addition to the authority which is given them to construct dams and works upon the river, subject to the approval of the Governor General in Council, and the Railway Commission, the Bill goes on to declare what power they have in the development of electric power, and then it provides that certain portions of that power may be transmitted across the river to the United States, the river being an international stream and not a very wide one. I am advised that that is a direct interference with the rights of the province. If the Railway Committee is to decide as to the bargains which are made for the transmission of this power to Canada or the United States, what position will the Ontario government be in if it attempts to legislate upon or regulate the agreements which they make with people on the other side of the line ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—So far as the Ontario government is concerned their position is absolutely defined by the agreement which they have entered into.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The last one ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes. I am talking about their position to-day, and under the circumstances they have a right to enforce that agreement, and we are doing nothing here to interfere with that at all. Because of its being international water, as such the consent of parliament is required; but apart from that they are doing nothing. Then in order that in the exercise of that power the use of it shall be controlled, the consent is given subject to the conditions set out in this Bill and which must therefore be conditions which are to be enforced either by the Governor in Council here, or by some body which is created by this parliament, and not by the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario at all. Placing it in the hands of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario would be leaving it to some body over whom parliament has no control. They could not require that authority to do anything or not to do anything. It would be necessary, therefore, to leave it to either the Governor in Council or to some body created by this parliament, such as the Board of Railway Commissioners. It did not appear to us any objection would be taken because the powers which the Board of Railway Commissioners would be called upon to exercise would be very much akin to what they are exercising under the Railway Act, and many of the clauses are introduced into this measure for that very purpose.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This Bill being a totally new measure, has never been before the Railway Committee for its approval. It has been changed, altered and amended by the parties interested, and they have come to us and have said they have agreed. I may say as far as the representative of Fort Frances and the gentleman who is interested in promoting the matter are concerned, they have no objection, and do not desire to interfere with it. But in the telegrams and letters which I have from Mr. Ritchie, who represents the Ontario government, he says distinctly that while he does not desire to object to the corporation so far as the water power is concerned, he does not wish anything done that will interfere with the rights and prerogatives of the province of Ontario which he represents. This is a legal question of course. This Bill, I repeat, has not been considered by the Railway Committee, and we are asked to accept amendments made by the parties interested, making it a perfectly new Bill, without ever referring them back to the committee. The hon. gentleman says this Bill does not interfere with anything but the navigation of the water. If that were the case I should not object to it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I understand the matter stands in this way: This Bill was before the committee and the committee dealt with it on certain definite lines. The result of their deliberations was that clause 1 was practically adopted and certain additions were made thereto by the committee, which amendments were in the nature of controlling the manner in which the work should be operated under the direction of the Governor in Council. Now, the town of Fort Frances objected to that, and all that has been done has been with a view of meeting them—concessions have been made to the representatives of Fort Frances by those who represent the company, so that the matter now comes before the House in this way; the committee reported a Bill with certain amendments. Those amendments are there now, and so far as the promoters of the Bill are concerned they are quite willing to take the Bill in that form, but they do not ask to have it taken in that form, because they are willing to meet the views of those who want to have some further qualifications made. Therefore, to meet their views I have been asked to move that instead of adopting this report, this printed copy be substituted, and the report amended accordingly. That is the way it stands. So far as the company is concerned they are quite content to take the Bill exactly as it left the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When did they arrive at that agreement?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—A couple of days ago—yesterday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did they not give notice? The new Bill that was agreed upon as a substitute for the Bill reported here by the Railway Committee has been put in the hands of the hon. member from Toronto? Why did he not give notice?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—They expected they would reach it last night.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Giving one day's notice would have met the case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If I may be allowed to refer to what took place in committee, I moved an amendment there which was defeated. The parties have since come together and agreed practically to accept the amendment which I moved in committee with some modifications. As far as I am concerned the general policy as embodied in the Bill may be subject to criticism, but in other respects I think the Bill is quite acceptable. The rights they were so desirous of securing, 6,000 horse-power on the Canadian side, have been sanctioned in a reasonable measure. But there remains the question whether it is sound policy for this House to deal with the matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I am not mistaken the amendment moved by my hon. friend in committee, and which was rejected, has been since incorporated in the notice of motion given by my hon. friend from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is practically the same, but the form has been changed. It was distributed yesterday as a notice that they had come to an agreement. I did not attend their conference, but I was told that they had come to an agreement.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The agreement that has been come to is decidedly in the interest of Fort Frances and the province of Ontario. Every clause in the new Bill is a clause in the interest of the residents of the Ontario side of the river, and simply gives the recommendation of the committee. If it met with opposition in the House, as it certainly would if the parties did not agree to the amendments suggested, then it would be a question if the Bill could be got through; but both parties have come together and agreed to accept the Bill as reprinted in the interest of the town and of that section, and it is highly desirable that we should give effect to the agreement, because the work is going on. There are one hundred men employed there. Surely after all the parties agreeing to the clauses of the Bill, and the objectionable features from an Ontario standpoint have been removed, we should give it effect. In reply to the hon. leader of the opposition, I am quite sure that he will admit with me that no legislation of this chamber can take away from Ontario the rights that belong to that province. We may overstep the bounds; if we do, we are liable to have to recede. We cannot, by our legislation, deprive the Ontario government of any right they enjoy, so that there is nothing in the Bill that will in any way cripple or interfere with the powers vested in the local government, and which they have a right to exercise. The clauses of this Bill are a compromise between the two parties and satisfactory to both.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman assures us that there is nothing in this Bill which will affect the interests or rights of the Ontario government. Before discussing what the effect of the Bill may be, there is a very important point to be looked into, and that is this: Who authorized the printing of this Bill? I have the Bill which came regularly to us from the House of Commons and which is on our files. Who authorized the printing of another and different Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will explain. The parties handed me last night this memorandum. It is marked approved and signed C. A. Geoffrion for the plaintiffs and W. A. H. Kerr for the citizens of Fort Frances. They handed me the original two clauses that were carried in committee; they have typewritten clauses added. Now, it seemed to me that it was the most sensible way, when all the parties had come to an agreement, to have those clauses put into the Bill, and I at once endorsed on the back of it a memorandum to print this in the shape of a Bill, in order that members might all be seized of what the actual Bill was. I considered that, when all the parties agreed and there was no interference with the rights of the province of Ontario, the simple and businesslike way was to get the Bill before the House in the form of which all parties approved; and that is the explanation of why it appears in its present form.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have an explanation of how matters have assumed their present shape, but will any hon. gentleman claim that that is the proper way to deal with this House? My hon. friend says that he instructed the parties interested to have it printed, but should they not have it printed in a way to show what they propose to introduce as new matter, and should not the House have some notice, so that we would know what was new matter? Instead of that parties outside apparently imagined that they were superseding the House of Commons. It will have to go back to that House again. They are superseding our Railway Committee and, to a great extent, this House. They come together and agree upon a Bill and have it printed and headed, 'Passed by the House of Commons.' I compared it with the Bill that we received from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is reprinted as proposed to be amended by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not observe the words, but this copy should show what new matter was being introduced. Now the Railway Committee added two subclauses, and there was a difference of opinion in the committee as to whether these two subclauses adequately protected the interest of Fort Frances in the water-power, There was an amendment proposed by the hon. member from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) which was not agreed to in the committee, but which the hon. member for Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan) put on as a notice to bring it up when the matter would reach this stage in the House. If the promoters on one side or both had changed their attitude from the time that left the Railway Committee until this stage of the Bill they should have agreed and put a notice on the order paper instead of undertaking to reprint a Bill and bring it before us as coming from the House of Commons. If they had the notices given by the hon. member from Alexandria and by the hon. member from Elgin (Hon. Mr. Wilson), and if neither of these notices sufficiently covered the ground there was ample time to put on another notice and let the others drop. If the promoters have everything to say in this matter, and the province of Ontario have nothing to say in this matter, then it would be well and good, but that course has not been pursued. We have now before us a Bill, or what was the original clause 5 of the old Bill changed somewhat —I think changed advantageously—I think it is made much better than it was before. We have other clauses added to the Bill which may carry out to some extent or perhaps entirely (I have not had time to make the comparison) the resolutions moved in the Railway Committee by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry; but it comes before us in such a way that it is very hard for us to understand it. If there remains still an opposition to this Bill, if the government of Ontario are still unreconciled, we shall have to ask the House to insist upon proper notices being given in order that this Bill may be properly enacted. I do not say that I will insist upon that ground, but there are different parties interested from the town of Fort Frances and there is also interest of Canadians generally in that water-power. There were also the interests which the province of Ontario had, which are very important in the matter of a water-power such as this. They have also to be considered, and if all the parties are not agreed, I am afraid the matter has got into such a shape that very little progress can be made with it now. If notice had been given on the order paper, the gentleman behind the matter could proceed with it, but if there is any one hostile to the Bill it would be very hard to do that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I learned that all interests had been reconciled, and it did seem to me that the most common sense way at this period of the session was to have this Bill, as agreed upon, printed and circulated. That seemed to be the only possible way by which the Bill could have any chance of going through this year. If you had simply put on the notice paper the typewritten agreements that had been made it would have been absolutely hopeless to get the Bill through this session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask the hon. Secretary of State if he knows really what we are doing?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do perfectly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I very much doubt it, or I do not think the hon. gentleman would be arguing that way. The Bill we are asked to confirm is not in accord with the report of the committee which recommends certain amendments, additions and obliterations. I do not want to say that it is sharp practice, because that would not be parliamentary, but we are in this extraordinary position, that the committee discussed an important Bill affecting the rights of the province and of individuals interested in the development of a water-power. The committee report the Bill with certain amendments, and then we are presented with a Bill totally at variance with the report of the committee. I raise it as a point of order that we have no right to go on with that Bill unless we go into committee on it and compare it with this report and reduce it to the terms contained in that report, or we can refer it back to the committee; but to ask this House to accept a report from the committee, and confirm the report of the committee, and in confirming that report confirm this Bill and read it the third time when it is totally at variance with the report and based upon an agreement made by the parties interested, is another matter. Does any hon. gentleman in this House tell me that that is a correct and proper way to deal with an important measure on any subject? I cannot find language to describe it. In all my experience I have never known anything like this before.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The interests involved in this matter are very considerable, and we are business men; and I do not think that we ought for the sake of a mere technicality, where no substantial interests are involved, to wreck this measure at this stage of the session. I do not think that the question of order which has been raised is one of so serious a character as might appear. On the 13th July, the chairman of the Committee of Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours reported this Bill with amendment, and the following is the record of the proceedings in the minutes:

Ordered, That the report be now received, and
The said amendments were then read by the clerk, as follow:
Page 1.—Strike out from clause one to four, both inclusive.
Page 1, line 25.—After 'may' insert 'subject to all the provisions hereafter contained.'
Page 2.—Strike out from clause six to clause thirteen, both inclusive, and insert the following as clauses 'A' and 'B':
Clause 'A.'—The company shall in the execution of the works authorized by this Act develop its power on both sides of the Rainy river equally, so that on the completion of such works, on or before the 1st January, 1907, there will not be less power developed on the Canadian side than on the American side.

Clause 'B.'—The company shall provide for use on the Canadian side of the international boundary line such amount of power as the Governor in Council may from time to time order after two weeks previous notice to the company of any application for such an order.

This clause (b) was thought by the counsel who represented Fort Frances not to be satisfactory. He did not think that that clause went far enough in the way of protecting the interests of those on the Canadian side of the river. Acting on behalf of the people of Fort Frances and the Canadian interests, the hon. gentleman from Alexandria, on the same day that the report was presented to the House, gave notice of certain amendments, prepared, as I understand, by the counsel of the town of Fort Frances, to be substituted for clauses (a) and (b). That notice was perfectly correct and regular. Then the counsel for the town of Fort Frances and the counsel for the company promoting the Bill put their heads together and agreed—and there is a memo. showing their agreement—upon certain clauses to be substituted for this amendment proposed by the hon. member from Alexandria and those are the clauses in the Bill before the House. Now, I suppose, to be strictly regular, notice of these clauses should have been given by the hon. gentleman from Alexandria in substitution for the clauses of which he had previously given notice, but the hon. gentleman did not do that. He said he authorized the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas (Mr. Wilson) to say that he dropped his amendment and consented to the substitution of this amendment. Everybody is satisfied, and really I think it would be a great pity after so much time has been spent by the promoters and by counsel employed by the parties, and by the Railway Committee, that this measure should be wrecked at the final stage. I appeal to the good sense and business sense of hon. gentlemen not to wreck this important measure. We know just what we are doing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman affirm that the Bill which we are asked to confirm as amended is in accordance with the report which he has read ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not in accordance with the report of the committee. It takes the place of the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Alexandria. The hon. gentleman from Alexandria proposed to drop——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the point I am asking about.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—This is in accordance with the motion before the House for concurrence in the report as presented by the Railway Committtee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—At the same time it is accompanied by this statement, that if the House will accept this proposed amendment, as it appears in the printed paper, the parties are willing to accept it.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—If a vote had been called immediately after the matter had been brought up this evening, I could not have voted at all. I would either have been obliged to go out of the House or ask to be excused. I happened to be in the committee room the other day, and there was sharp language and contention, the talk was loud, fast and furious. I never heard anything at a camp meeting or any other meeting to compare with the loud talking. The chairman was confused and I do not wonder at it. Now, the parties and interests have got together ; the hon. member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has explained the matter quite clearly, and I have a little better idea with regard to it. But now a point of procedure appears to come up. I have come to the conclusion that the interests at stake are large, and if the government of Ontario has not looked after its own rights in this matter, it must bear the responsibility itself. However, if the parties and interests have put their heads together, as some hon. senators have said, and as an outcome of that the Bill is acceptable, I feel bound to accept the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The question before the House is concurrence in the report of the committee. Am I correct in stating that?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—With an offer on the part of the promoters that they are willing to accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will put the case as I understand it. The question before the House is concurrence in the report of the committee. What is the report of the committee? It is just a piece of literature given us by the hon. member from Halifax. We are in a position to accept that or refuse it. If we accept the proposed Bill in lieu of the Bill that is before us, you must bear in mind that this Bill comes from the House of Commons. It has been amended by us. If we accept the amendments those amendments must be returned to the House of Commons. How could we, if we take a new Bill, return the amended Bill to the House of Commons? You see the difficulty. The hon. member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr), who for two days had that agreement in his hands, might have exercised diligence and given notice of motion, and then being on the order paper, it would have come before the Senate in a regular way and we could have dealt with the question, but there is a rule of this House, rule 71, which provides :

No important amendment may be proposed to any private Bill in a Committee of the Whole or at the third reading of the Bill unless notice of the same shall have been given on a previous day.

I think that is safer. We cannot proceed with that amendment unless notice is given and the proper way for the mover of the Bill, if he wants to proceed with it is to give notice immediately of the amendments which he desires to attach to the Bill, and to-morrow morning we can pass it immediately.

The SPEAKER—I think there is no question as to the regularity of the procedure. The modified Bill which is suggested would be passed by the leave of the House. But without the leave of the House one of the two following courses only are open to the Senate ; either to commit this Bill and its amendment to the Committee of the Whole, or concur in the amendments, and notice of amendments may be given for the third reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I agree to a certain extent with the hon. Speaker. He has taken the proper course. I understand the motion made was for the third reading.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move the adoption of the substituted amendments as therein set out, and which were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Then I move the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the motion was adopted it was done so quietly that no one knew anything about it.

The SPEAKER—The motion is for concurrence in the report of the committee, which has not yet been adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we adopt this report it is not in accordance with the Bill which we are asked to adopt, and the next motion would be for the third reading of the Bill. What Bill ? The Bill based upon the report ; not a new Bill containing altogether different provisions than those contained in this report. I am sure the Speaker or any member of this House would never submit to any such legislation as that. You would never be safe. It should be rejected at once. If he likes to adopt that rule we know where we are, but before these amendments are moved, ample notice must be given in order that we may consider what they are.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to exercise their rights and shut out the agreement that these parties have come to, and to which they have all become parties, then I am willing to accept the original report of the committee and ask the House to adopt it. If they are disposed to shut it out and say, 'No, we won't accept the amendments,' and resist them on the ground that the original Bill had not been adopted, then we will move the original Bill as it came from committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman makes that threat then he will require to have the amendments printed so that we will know what they are. There is no Bill drafted in line with that report. Then I raise the other question at once as to whether it is within the prerogative of this parliament to pass this Bill. The hon. gentleman from Wellington says we have no right, power or authority to interfere with the rights of Ontario, but might it not involve a law-suit to determine whether or not we have infringed the rights of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If these people are in the wrong, they will have to pay the costs.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my hon. friend was a lawyer, I could understand that kind of argument. Why should we legislate in a direction likely to create trouble and litigation ? If this Bill is confined exclusively to the powers which the Dominion government have to regulate and protect the navigable rivers, I would have nothing to say, but it goes further and says how the power shall be distributed. I should like to know if that is not an interference with what is termed property and civil rights in this country ? You might as well legislate to say what should be contained in a contract for the construction of a house. This Bill goes on to prescribe that the power-house, generators, transmitters, machinery appliances and connections necessary for the delivery of any such power, or electrical energy for use on the Canadian side of the international line, shall be on the Canadian side thereof. I submit to the House that that is just as much an interference with civil rights as to say a man should build a barn on the Canadian side of the river. Then it goes on to say how that power shall be distributed, and in case of a dispute it is to be referred to the Board of Railway Commissioners. It may be said, and with a great deal of force and correctness I think, that if you name the Lieutenant Governor in Council you are giving the authority to decide these questions to a power over which you have no control, while you can control the Board of Railway Commissioners. But that is not the question. It is for the Ontario government, having made a bargain with these gentlemen to do certain works, to see that they shall carry out their bargain properly, and then the question arises whether this Bill interferes with it in any way. My own opinion is that it does. But I must confess that I am somewhat surprised—very much surprised—to find old parliamentarians prepared to accept the Bill and the report under the conditions in which they are presented to us. If we adopt that course, I do not hesitate to say that there is no security for any legislation in the future. A report may come from a committee and then a Bill may be introduced, not based upon the report, but based entirely upon some new arrangement which may have been entered into. The question whether it is a great enterprise or not is a matter of no consequence in this connection.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to make the observation that when this Bill came in the shape it is now it was very confusing and very difficult indeed to understand. I have had time to look it over, and I must say that the Bill as it is proposed here with these additional clauses and safeguards is infinitely more in the interests of Canada and the town of Fort Frances than the two clauses agreed to in the Railway Committee. I was going to say to the hon. gentleman from Wellington that if he took the course which he threatened to take a moment ago he would not have much chance of getting his Bill through this session. Every stage would be contested, and a similar course would be adopted in the other branch. His Honour the Speaker has made a suggestion which seems to me to be a practical one, and we should try to come to some practical conclusion. That would be to refer this Bill to a committee of the whole House, and if it is found that these clauses, as they are read one by one, are calculated to protect the interests of Canada, not only in Ontario, but in Manitoba, and the interests of the people of Fort Frances, we could proceed to pass them. If it was found that any of them was objectionable, it would be open for any hon. gentleman to take his objection. But it should be with the understanding that if it was found that any clause did not protect Canadian interests, it would be open for any hon. gentleman to take any parliamentary objection and see that the Bill was advanced stage by stage. I therefore move that the Bill, with the report of the committee, be referred to a committee of the whole House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The question seems to be somewhat mixed. We have a report from the Standing Committee, and instead of adopting or rejecting it we are referring it to a Committee of the Whole, which is very unusual. It is drawing near the end of the session, and as my hon. friend from Marshfield has very well pointed out, the amendments which we have proposed in the Bill are more restrictive on those who are concerned in the enterprise and more in favour of the citizens of Canada than the amendments which were suggested by the Committee on Railways. Telegraphs and Harbours. In view of that we can adopt two courses. One would be with the unanimous consent of the House to adopt the suggestion my hon. friend has made, and the other would be to adopt the report of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, and set the Bill down for third reading to-morrow with notice of these amendments given to-night, so that they will appear in our votes and proceedings to-morrow. But if we go into a Committee of the Whole with the reservation made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield that he may take any parliamentary objection, when everything must be done by unanimous consent, you can readily see that those who are interested in getting the amendments into the Bill may find that we have only added one more stage to the Bill at this late period of the session. We have not to consider the promoter of the enterprise at all in the matter, because the people of Fort Frances who are directly interested in this enterprise have extracted from him unwilling concessions, which he did not intend to grant in the first place; and therefore these amendments as my hon. friend pointed out are in the interests of the people of Canada, and we should facilitate the passage of them as promptly as we can. If it is agreed upon that there will be no technical objection taken to the amendment in the Committee of the Whole, as covered by rule 71 which was read by my hon. friend, and which says that no important amendment can be made to a private Bill in Committee of the Whole without notice being given of that proposed amendment—if my hon. friend will move that rule 71 be suspended, then we can proceed with the Bill on its merits regardless of any technical objection that may be taken under our rule. If my hon. friend will adopt that course I will gladly second his motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The course which my hon. friend has suggested will not expedite the passing of the Bill at all, because every point can be taken to-morrow, and he is delaying it until the morning of prorogation. It is understood the House will prorogue to-morrow and the chances of carrying the Bill through the other House will be lessened; but if we come to an understanding to-night that the Bill will be sent down for a third reading and placed beyond every debatable stage I think it would facilitate matters. I found it necessary to make the statement I did for the reason that the matter has been thrown upon us without any previous chance to look into it, and the glance I have had at the Bill has been very hurried. Without an opportunity of examining it I could not be sure that there are not some things in it which I would not have to take every parliamentary objection to. I have no doubt if the House adopted the suggestion I have made, and the Bill was found to be all right there would be no difficulty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me at the present time there is no insuperable difficulty in our way. The hon. gentleman from Wellington has moved that the report of the committee be concurred in. Supposing that some hon. gentleman move that the report be not concurred in, but that all the clauses after the preamble be stricken out and the following substituted—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no notice of that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The notice is the notice given by the hon. gentleman from Alexandria which he waived in favour of this notice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do not bring in the waves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—if that course is pursued, and important amendments are moved, notice must be given, and I shall take objection to any motion for suspension of rules.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I move that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole to consider the report.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would vote in favour of the motion if the rule was suspended in order to prevent the necessity of its being followed, but if the hon. gentleman refuses to move at the same time for the suspension of the rule I will vote against the motion. If we go into committee of the whole it will be open to any member to raise the question of order that no notice was given of the amendment. The hon. gentleman from Wellington will make his motion and some of us can give notice that when the third reading is taken up these amendments will be proposed.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman from Marshfield insist on his motion?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is pointed out that it is of no value, unless the rule is suspended. My hon. friend to my left states that he will object to the suspension of the rules, and there is an end of it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is another suggestion, that we go into a committee of the whole to consider these amendments and then suspend rule 71—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You can simply move to suspend rule 71.

The SPEAKER—The motion before the House is by the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) that the report of the committee be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At least two months ago Bills (86) and (87) came down to the committee. We felt that the Bill as it came before us was unfair to Canadian interests. I think a majority of the committee blocked the Bill until the interests of Fort Frances and the Canadian interests were safeguarded. After a long discussion all the clauses were struck out except two. Those two gave an undue advantage to the promoters of the Bill. The promoters were told: 'You will not carry that Bill through the Senate.' I determined to oppose it, and there were others who determined to oppose it because Canadian interests were not safeguarded, and I said: 'Your Bill will not get through the Senate unless you come to an agreement with Fort Frances which will be fair.' After several discussions they finally felt that in order to get the Bill through they would have to yield. This was the result of the conference. I think it would be most regrettable for the Senate to destroy the work of the session. A large amount of money has been expended. All parties are ready to go on with a most important enterprise, and it would be exceedingly regrettable because we cannot come to a common-sense conclusion that the Bill should be destroyed. I certainly will not agree to the adoption of the report as it comes from the committee because it would not be fair to Canadian interests.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has put the case fairly. If the report is adopted then the Bill will have to be passed based on that report, and then the objections which will be taken to it in committee will be just as strong as they ever were. What I object to is that a motion is made to adopt a report of the committee, and then to give a third reading to a Bill that we have never considered; and no member of the House, unless he has read it privately, knows anything about it. Because it is a compromise between the two parties who are promoting, one on one side and one on the other, I do not see that the Senate must stultify itself by legislation of that kind. I cannot conceive a more monstrous proposition to lay before parliament. Let me put the case in this way. We adopt the report as moved by the hon. gentleman from Wellington. When this Bill has passed the third reading, because that is really what he intended and is placed upon the statute-book, some shrewd lawyer would get hold of the Bill, the report made by the committee, and compare it with the Bill on the statute-book and would find it totally at variance and a different Bill altogether. What position would the Senate be in? This is the result of bringing in Bills at this stage of the session when we do not know what they are and attempts of this kind made to do, I repeat, a monstrous thing. My hon. friend said and very truly that these Bills had been before parliament for over two months. The people of Fort Frances knew nothing about this new arrangement that had been entered into, which affected their interests materially, until these Bills were printed.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That is not true.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The people of Fort Frances declare they knew nothing of this scheme until this Bill was introduced in the House of Commons. Surely their word is as good as an interested denial. The province of Ontario, which had entered into an arrangement with this company for the construction of the work, knew nothing about it at all until these Bills were printed, then they wired down to stop its progresse until they could look into the matter. That is the history of the measure, and it looks like a piece of sharp practice from beginning to end. It would be a disgrace to this legislative body if they passed this Bill under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—As far as I am aware, there has been no sharp practice adopted. I would scorn to be a party to any sharp practice, but even admitting that there was such a practice, the shape of the amendments now satisfy the expectations of the people of Fort Frances to the letter. They are getting everything they ask, and I can tell him——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Deal with the Bill, and not with Fort Frances.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—And they are most anxious that this Bill shall become law and the work shall go on. My hon. friend says that we are legislating——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has that to do with our position ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My hon. friend says that we are legislating beyond our power, I do not claim to be posted with regard to the rules of the House like my hon. friend because he is an old parliamentarian, but it has been clearly stated by the hon. Secretary of State, that all the parties have come to terms and agreed that the amended Bill now before the House should become law. It fully comes up to the standard of the expectations of the people of Fort Frances—everything that they could reasonably ask. They have been fully satisfied.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has that to do with the surreptitious manner in which the Bill has been brought before the Senate?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I admit that they have not complied with every rule. I have not been a member of this House very long, and I do not claim to be as capable of following the rules as my hon. friend, but after all I have done the best I could to meet the wishes of every one.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think it is an unfortunate thing to talk about the surreptitious manner of introducing the Bill.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may be unfortunate but it is true.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—And to have it stated that the agreement was never known to Fort Frances until they saw a notice of this Bill is erroneous. I have in my hands, and showed to the Secretary of State after the meeting of the committee, a document showing that they knew of it in the month of October, and were party to the negotiation. This is apart from the question, but I am speaking now of the question of good faith. After a long contest the committee adopted the report with certain amendments to the Bill. That report and the amendments are now before the Senate. The promoters of the Bill say that since that report has been adopted certain amendments have been drawn up by the counsel for Fort Frances and those amendments were agreed to. The promoter of the Bill and his counsel were willing that those amendments should be adopted, and having agreed to that they are here to say that if the formal motion to adopt the report of the committee is passed, notice will at once be given that on the third reading the amendments will be moved according to this document. As to this being done surreptitiously, the Secretary of State has explained that the ink was hardly dry when it was sent to the printer.—A copy of it was furnished to the hon. gentleman who calls it surreptitious. The Bill itself was printed and distributed this morning, and a copy of it has been in his hands.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A copy of this ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It was put in the hands of the hon. member from Belleville.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have I had nothing to do but study this Bill since it was put into my hands ? If I had been devoting my whole attention to one particular Bill as the hon. gentleman does, I might.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. gentleman frequently complains of being interrupted when he is speaking, and he is the worst sinner in the House in that respect. I say he had that Bill in his hands because it was distributed this morning. He had it considering it this afternoon. He was consulting the officers of the House about it, I saw him doing so and he cannot deny it. He talked about this being surreptitiously brought in. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman saying such a thing. The whole question comes down to this. The motion before the House is for the adoption of the report and the promoter of the Bill gives his undertaking at the same time, that he will at the third reading move that the Bill be amended——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may be permitted——

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken several times on this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg to move the adjournment of this debate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Surely there must be some means of getting out of this tangle now; and I ask the hon. member for Belleville to suggest some parliamentary means of getting on with the work. If he will say what it is, we will conform to it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have stated the means, and they will not accept it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am not as familiar with the rules of the House as very many hon. gentlemen present, but it does appear to me, after listening to this debate, that there is not so much difficulty in the way as some of us suppose. I understand the motion of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield to be this: That the report be not now concurred in, but that this Bill with the report be referred to a committee of the Whole House. If that motion is accepted and the report were submitted to a committee of the whole, the Committee of the Whole could then, I have no doubt, report back to the House the Bill with these proposed amendments.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Suspend the rules.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think we can make the amendment in committee without suspending the rules.

The SPEAKER—Rule 71 is as follows:

No important amendment may be proposed to any private Bill in a Committee of the Whole or at a third reading of the Bill unless notice of the same shall have been given on a previous day.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You must get the rule suspended before, not after.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—What I was going to propose was that the Bill be allowed to go to a committee of the whole, and that when it was reported back to the House a motion should be made to suspend the rule.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I hope that the hon. leader of the opposition will permit me to appeal to him to facilitate our dealing with this Bill. I entirely agree with the statement as made by the hon. Secretary of State, and at this late state of the session, it seems to me it is incumbent on every member of the House to facilitate the work of the session. It would be a great responsibility if we had to detain the House unnecessarily because of technicalities raised this evening in regard to this Bill. For my part I have always been against the Bill, but I am perfectly satisfied with the form of agreement between the parties embodying the desire of the town of Fort Frances to secure for the Canadian side in a reasonable measure half the water-power to be developed. I appeal to the hon. leader of the opposition to facilitate that being done without any further delay. We have lost nearly two hours over this technicality.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto that I had this amended Bill placed in my hands is quite correct, but those who have witnessed the part I have taken in reference to the legislation that has been going on since the morning will know very well that I had not time to give a Bill that has been so completely changed, even from the report of the committee, that consideration which it deserves. I do not pretend to say that I have not had the Bill, and if the hon. gentleman thinks he has made a point he is welcome to it. There is just this difference between himself and myself, there is no question submitted to the House that I do not try to understand. The hon. gentleman has devoted his attention exclusively to this matter for reasons generally understood, and consequently with his keen intellect he might be able to understand it, but I could not in the time at my disposal.

It is true I had a conversation with the law clerk of this House, and I should like very much to know how the hon. gentleman knew what I was talking about unless he was eavesdropping and overheard the conversation.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I was not eavesdropping, but I happened to walk past where the conversation was going on and could not help overhearing something of what was said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman walked back and forward while I was speaking to the law clerk, two or three times, and I have no doubt it was for the purpose of hearing what I was saying. The law clerk had sent for me to see about something, and while in conversation with him I called attention to the clauses of this Bill, and asked his opinion as to how far we were infringing on the rights and privileges of the province. That is what I was discussing, and I have no objection to giving his opinion. He said he did not think, under all the circumstances, and considering it from its constitutional standpoint, that the Bill as it stands is worth anything. Has it become a crime if a member of this House consults an official appointed for the purpose of giving information on questions of this kind, so that a gentleman should rise in his place and speak of it as if he had committed a serious offence, which would justify the House in sending him to the tower ? I purpose pursuing the same course whenever I think it necessary, and the hon. gentleman may poke around the building and listen to what I have to say and repeat it on the floor of this House if he wishes. I commend him for the honourable course he has pursued in this matter. It is just what might be expected of him. I shall consult any official of this House when I think proper to do so in the public interest. I have no objection to acting on the suggestion of my hon. friend from Marshfield. You may go into the committee if you like and consider the report and make such amendments as you please and afterwards if I do not think they are in the interests of the province of Ontario, or if I think provincial rights are interfered with, I shall take the technical objection of objecting to the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We will accept the suggestion of the hon. member from Belleville. Let us suspend the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—With the permission of the House, I withdraw my motion.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn, and the motion to concur in the report of the committee was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the Bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It cannot be read until you know what it contains. I venture the assertion that scarcely a man in the House knows what it contains. What Bill are we asked to read a third time ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would suggest to give notice of the amendments that have been agreed upon between the parties, and that these amendments be made at the third reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In pursuance of the discussion that we have had, and so that the Senate will have an opportunity of amending this Bill in the direction suggested by the parties who have come to an agreement, I give notice that I shall move an amendment on the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Substituting this Bill for the other ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes ; it is an amendment to that Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (192) An Act respecting the powers of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. He said : This is a Bill empowering the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to appropriate a sum not exceeding $6,000 for the erection of a monument to the late Hon. John Young. The commissioners have not the authority to make the contribution under a by-law and require this legislation. The monument, I understand, will cost some $20,000, and this is their contribution.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask if the $6,000 which the harbour commissioners are given authority to spend will be sufficient for the purpose ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The monument will cost about $20,000 or more, and the balance will be obtained by public subscription.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the government do not propose to recommend the appropriation of any money to assist the construction ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should not object to it if they did, knowing the value of the services rendered by the late Mr. Young, not only to Montreal but to the whole country.

Hon. Mr. FROST from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

THE ALUMINUM INDUSTRY IN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE in the absence of Hon. Mr. Edwards, moved the adoption of the report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the production of anhydrous alumina and aluminum in Canada. He said : There is nothing more in this report than asking the government to assist us in finding bauxite if it is to be found in Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATIONS RELATING TO YUKON TERRITORY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the regulations made by the Governor in Council under the authority of section 47 of the Dominion Lands Act, applicable or relating to the Yukon Territory be approved. He said : Section 47 of the Dominion Lands Act requires that Orders in Council relating to the Yukon shall be laid before parliament every session. Last year I laid on the table the Orders in Council passed in 1903, and now I lay on the table the Orders in Council relating to 1904. There is none of them of any special importance.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are those reports to be printed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, they require to be laid on the table and confirmed before the end of the session. A copy was laid on the table of the House of Commons and confirmed by that House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Our confirmation amounts to nothing ; we confirm things that we know nothing about.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have been on the table for several days and no one paid any particular attention to them. If any hon. gentleman wishes to call attention to them he can do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The regulations I suppose will not be effective before being approved by parliament ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are in force to the end of the session following, but to continue in force they must be approved by parliament.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A year afterwards ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Any regulation regarding the Yukon country should come not before one minister but before the whole cabinet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So they do.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We have had extravagant bargains made in that country and the government ought to exercise care regarding the regulations that are made, and before they are fully confirmed they should be discussed in parliament. It is the only way to prevent the wrongdoing that is going on in that part of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no general principle involved in those regulations as far as I can see.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FORM OF PRAYER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, in the absence of Mr. Gibson, moved concurrence in the report of the Special Committee on the prayers to be used at the beginning of each sitting.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I do not think this report should be adopted just now. I want to see the business of the House go on. We are using prayers that we have been using all along, and that we will continue to use until the end of the session. Let this matter lie over until next session. I object to the last sentence of the Lord's prayer being omitted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman is labouring under a misapprehension.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—The last sentence of the Lord's prayer was struck out. We have had a great deal of discussion on matters of conscience during the last week. I have refrained from speaking on the educational clauses of the Autonomy Bill. I do not see why this prayer should be altered from the way I learned it. It is a matter of conscience with me. If in the judgment of the House the prayers should be mutilated I must submit, but I need not attend during prayers. The Lord's prayer as it appears in this report is used by one branch of the Christian church, but all the other branches use it the way I should like to see it.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Why did the committee leave out the words 'for thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory'? I move that the report be amended by adding those words.

The SPEAKER—As I am the only party present that was at the committee when this report was adopted, I will say there was no change from the former prayer as read in the House of Commons, and the prayer reported to the House is absolutely the prayer that the hon. gentleman for 19 years listened to in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.).

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—That is absolutely correct, but we are not the House of Commons. We are not obliged to copy the House of Commons. If we did, we would be here until Christmas.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not aware that any portion of the Lord's prayer was omitted. I was not present at the meeting when it was adopted, and I supposed that it was there in its entirety.

The motion was agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY ARBITRATION BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 199) An Act to amend an Act respecting arbitration between His Majesty and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. He said: This Bill is to amend an Act passed last session, making some changes in it which are not very important or material.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As hon. gentlemen are aware, the dispute between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Crown with respect to certain traffic arrangements was referred to a commission of which the chairman of the Railway Commission is chairman. One clause makes provision for continuing him as chairman, notwithstanding he is chairman of the other board.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that in relation to the Drummond County Railway?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is the exchange of traffic between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway under the original agreement.

On subclause 3 of clause 1:

3. The said arbitrators may adjudicate upon and decide any dispute or claim under the said agreements, or either of them, or arising out of any matter or thing which happened or was done at any time after the commencement of the proceeding for such reference, and before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and five, and which has been or may be brought before them by either of the said parties for adjudication.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why is the 1st of January mentioned? Would it not be better to say the 1st of July to bring their jurisdiction up to a recent date. The very difficulties and troubles they are adjudicating on may be continued from the 1st January up to the present time; is it not better that their jurisdiction should extend up to a very recent date.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is to meet their own views. I do not think it would be wise to interfere. They ought to know best what is the proper course.

The clause was adopted.

On subclause 4:

4. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 13 of the Railway Act, 1903, any of the said arbitrators who has been or shall be appointed a member of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada may continue to act as such arbitrator until the conclusion of such reference and the making of the final award or awards thereon.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is there not some control with the Railway Commissioners? Can they not review what has been done by this board of arbitrators?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We are referring the difficulties respecting these railways to the Arbitration Board a year after the organization of the Railway Commission, and it is almost certain that we have made it to fit into the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission, and there might be an appeal to it. If so, Judge Killam would not be a proper person to hear an appeal from himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not find that there is any reference whatever to it. It is a very short Act appointing arbitrators who shall possess the powers of a superior court and may render their award at any time within three months after their final hearing, and this period may be extended by any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. There does not seem to be any appeal. There are only four clauses respecting arbitration, the power of the arbitrators as to witnesses, the sessions, the clerk and the award.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the hon. gentleman will see that the fourth subsection provides that, notwithstanding anything contained in section 13 of the Railway Act, any of the arbitrators appointed to the Board of Railway Commissioners may continue to act as arbitrator until the conclusion of the reference. What is there in clause 13 to prevent him acting that it is necessary to add this proviso to it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Judge Killam had been appointed on this board, and he was also a chairman of the Railway Commission, and it was to legalize his action on the arbitration board, because a doubt had arisen as to whether he could be a member of that board and also a member of the Railway Commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the effect of clause 13 of the Railway Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Section 13 of the Railway Act reads as follows:

The commissioners shall devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duty under this Act and shall not accept or hold any office or employment inconsistent with this section.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (160) An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.' He said: This Act becomes necessary inasmuch as we have established two provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, out of a portion of the Territories and Rupert's Land, and this makes provision for the government of the remaining portion. It authorizes the Governor in Council to appoint a commission and advisory board and so on, to pass ordinances and make provision for the government of the Territories outside of the two provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend any information as to the population of those unorganized districts over which this provisional government would extend.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know, but it must be very sparse indeed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It comprises all of Mackenzie.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The population in Mackenzie is sparse.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the purpose of passing elaborate legislation in view of the fact that these unorganized districts of the Northwest have been administered by the territorial government? It seems to me that they could have been provisionally administered by the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, providing a dividing line had been drawn running north and south between those two provinces. If so emasculated a form of government as the territorial form of government could administer the unorganized territories under the primitive machinery they had, it seems to me they could administer it now much more effectively and efficiently than this provisional government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject was fully discussed by the members of the government, and the conclusions reached are now embodied in this Bill. It was thought better to have it governed by an independent commission instead of by the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time. The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee).

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How far north does Rupert's Land go?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—To the North Pole.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This would include through the Arctic ocean.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is my hon. friend's view of the westerly limit of Rupert's Land? There are no arbitrary lines to determine what is Rupert's Land in the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Rupert's Land was all the territory wherein there were rivers flowing into Hudson Bay, and it did not embrace all the Northwest Territories.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that there should be some qualification as to the professional standing of the magistrates to be appointed. The Bill does not provide that they shall have any legal training, and it seems to me, as they are vested with a jurisdiction quite equal to that of a Superior Court judge and possessed of a jurisdiction to try capital offences, they should certainly be men of legal professional standing at a particular bar for a specified number of years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would involve appointing an official with a very high standing and certainly in the primitive conditions which exist in the northern country, a stipendiary magistrate ought to be quite equal to any litigation that might arise.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But I might point out to my hon. friend that where a man is being tried for a capital offence by one of the stipendiary magistrates, the matter is quite as important to him as it is to a man being tried for the same offence in any of the organized provinces. Consequently where so important and so large a jurisdiction is vested in an official, he should possess all the qualifications to deal with the matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the observation of my hon. friend. I do not think it was necessary when the Territories were first established that these officials should have legal attainments until the population went in. This refers entirely to a country where there is sparse population.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The original stipendiary magistrates, who were appointed for the Territories which we are now creating into provinces were all lawyers of some standing.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it the Governor in Council in Ottawa who is to appoint the stipendiary magistrates?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Governor in Council. This Bill relates entirely to the Territory outside of the new provinces, and it is the Governor in Council who will appoint the commissioner and any official who may be appointed. I think clause 9 covers the point raised by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The promise of the hon. Secretary of State to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this clause—unless it be that he acts upon the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary and appoints a legal man to act—will not amount to very much. There is no restriction as to the appointment.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me no good reason can be shown why the same procedure is not adopted in this Bill that was adopted in the early Northwest Territories' Act—that is having an appeal to the court. The appeal provided for in section 9 only extends from the decision of a stipendiary magistrate to a judge. My hon. friend will observe that the finding of a judge will be conclusive and final. It seems to me that that appeal certainly should be to the highest appellate court in one or other of the new provinces. Under the old Northwest Territories' Act, the appeal lay from the stipendiary magistrate to the Queen's Bench of Manitoba and that appeal continued for a considerable length of time until the organization of the Supreme Court. I would venture to say that the attention of the Minister of Justice should be directed to that fact.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will mention the matter to him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Because quite as important matters will arise in the unorganized districts as in the provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is really another illustration of the effect of bringing down these measures at this stage of the session. We might just as well take these Bills, hold them up and say: 'First, second and third reading.' For if an attempt be made to correct or make them workable in the manner suggested by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, we shall be told by the hon. Secretary of State, 'it is too late in the session to make any change, I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter.' That will have no effect whatever, and it is rendering legislation, as far as this Senate is concerned, a farce.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Carried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is just it—carried.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 11,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out that it is going to be rather difficult to determine in the absence of witnesses if the testator wrote his signature.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the province of Quebec a holograph will is good as to personal property.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A will is to be made valid nothwithstanding the fact that it is not witnessed. I fancy the draughtsman had in view that it should be valid although the witnesses had not signed it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. In England until William IV, a holograph will was good to convey personal property, and the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry says that in Quebec it is good to convey any kind of property.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But if nobody saw him sign it how are you going to establish it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—In a country like that it might be impossible to get witnesses.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

SOUTH SHORE AND QUEBEC SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

COMMONS' AMENDMENTS ADOPTED.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the amendments made by the House of Commons to (Bill U) An Act respecting the South Shore Railway Company and the Quebec Southern Railway Company.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The Bill as passed by this House, provided merely for an extension of time for the building of the road. There was a Bill before the House of Commons, providing for the sale of railways which are under a receivership, and instead of passing that Bill which would have had a general application, this Bill was amended to enable the road which is under a receiver to be sold by the Exchequer Court. This I believe is a proper thing, because the road has been under a receivership for the last two years and the interest of the creditors demands that it be sold as soon as possible. The Bill provides that the sale by the Exchequer Court shall have the same effect as a sheriff's sale in the province of Quebec, it being a railway entirely in the province of Quebec. The Bill also provides for an extension of time. Having charge of the Bill I have no objection to clauses 1, 2 and 3, but I shall take exception to clause 4.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not this Bill interfere with the rights of creditors ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Clause 4 would, but I propose to have clause 4 struck out and another clause substituted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what way does the clause affect the creditors ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Clauses 1, 2 and 3 cannot interfere in any way with the rights of any third parties. It is only clause 4 to which I shall take objection in a minute.

On the 4th clause,

4. The creditors of the South Shore Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway and its accessories by preference to and before any other creditors ; and the creditors of the Quebec Southern Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway and its accessories by preference to and before any other creditors.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I move that this clause be struck out because it would seriously affect vested rights of third parties. It is a clause which would have the effect of changing the relations of the creditors to one another.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How is that ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The road has been under a receivership and there was an amount of $16,000 which was borrowed by the receiver from a bank for the purpose of paying arrears of wages which had accrued at the time the road was placed under a receivership. This debt would be affected seriously ; it would rank only after all the creditors of the two roads. Not only that, other creditors, for instance Hanson Bros., would also be affected. I do not know how many creditors it would affect, so I propose to offer, as a substitute for that clause, the following :

4. In the distribution of the proceeds of the price of sale of said railways, or of either of them, the creditors thereof shall be paid in order of priority according to law, and any amalgamation, merger or sale of either of said railways which might exist shall not in any way defeat or prejudice any legitimate claim existing against either of said railways, previous to such amalgamation, merger or sale, or affect its priority.

When the Bill was amended in the House of Commons, I find that clause 4, to which I take objection, was approved of by the hon. leader of the opposition for the reason indicated in the following words used by him :

What you are endeavouring to accomplish is this, that the rights of the creditors of each road shall not be affected by any amalgamation made without their consent.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. Exactly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is proper legislation.

Then the clause was adopted, but I called the attention of Mr. Brodeur and of other parties interested in the Bill to the effect of the clause and it was admitted that it was not a proper provision. I agree with the object for which the clause was adopted, to wit, to prevent the amalgamation which was made contrary to the wishes of the creditors affecting in any way claims existing prior to the amalgamation.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not think this honourable House should accept the amendment without looking into the matter more thoroughly and examining both sides of the question. There are two sides to the question in this matter, and it is well that the interests of the creditors should be fully and plainly set before this honourable House. To my mind the fourth clause as drafted in the House of Commons covers the situation entirely, and contradicts plainly what the hon. senator has said to this House, that it interferes with the rights of the creditors of these companies. The language is so plain that he who runs may read. It is as follows :

4. The creditors of the South Shore Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway and its accessories by preference to and before any other creditors; and the creditors of the Quebec Southern Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway and its accessories by preference to and before any other creditors.

Where does this clause interfere with the rights of any of the creditors, whether a bank which loans $16,000, or Hanson Brothers who may have loaned money? This clause protects the bank as it protects all creditors. They are to be paid according to the date of the claim and according to law. If they are paid against the law the others have recourse. The creditors of the South Shore road have nothing to look for in the proceeds of the sale of the Quebec Southern, nor have the creditors of the Quebec Southern anything to look for in the proceeds of the sale of the South Shore. They are two distinct roads and two distinct classes of creditors; and the clause adopted by the House of Commons is the most just and clear of understanding, because the end of that clause reads as follows:

And the creditors of the Quebec Southern Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway.

I ask the hon. member for de Salaberry where he finds any element of injustice, anything lacking for the protection of the creditors? This law declares distinctly, plainly and fully, that the creditors of the South Shore shall be paid according to the date of their claim and according to law, and it adds that the creditors of the Quebec Southern shall be paid likewise. Now, the hon. gentleman comes in with a clause, for what purpose? To make the law more clear? No, to make it indistinct and dark, to give lawyers a chance to fight in the courts, and not for the protection of the creditors. If the hon. gentleman will accept two words in his proposition, I am prepared, and the friends of this measure are prepared to accept his amendment. His amendment reads as follows:

4. In the distribution of the proceeds of the price of sale of said railways, or either of them, the creditors thereof shall be paid in order of priority according to law, and any amalgamation, merger or sale of either of said railways which might exist shall not in any way defeat or prejudice any legitimate claim existing against either of the said railways previous to such amalgamation, merger or sale, or affect its priority.

Mark what is the opening here 'The creditors thereof'—the creditors of either railroad shall come in and take out of the common product of that sale, which they have no right to do. The creditors of the South Shore have no right to interfere with the creditors of the Quebec Southern; but his amendment although not saying so, leaves it open to that interpretation, and leaves it open to be fought out in the courts. I say make the law clear and plain, it can be easily done by inserting the word 'respective' in two places, so that it shall read that the 'respective creditors thereof shall be respectively paid.' I do not know if the object of the hon. gentleman is to compel this honourable House to give the creditors of one company a right to take part in the proceeds of the sale of another company. If that is the case it is a question of violating rights, a question of injustice and what is more, I am informed that the acceptance of his amendment will seriously affect the credit of Canada in the money markets of the United States. I am not an authority on that subject, but I state it here on the authority of many who deal in foreign money markets. So under the circumstances if the hon. gentleman will accept the amendment I suggest, I am prepared to accept his amendment; but otherwise I think this honourable House would be doing an injustice to the creditors of the road.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I may say Mr. Brosseau who represents one of the largest creditors, the Hochelaga Bank, suggested that word but he agreed that it should be dropped when I called his attention to the fact that it would be affecting the rights of the creditors. We are not sitting here as a court of justice. We cannot pass upon the claims of creditors that are not before us? It is to be passed upon by the courts and every one should be at liberty to establish his right as it may appear, and that is why the words 'according to law' are used. The creditors will go before the courts and establish their claims and if there is a creditor who has a claim on both railways he will be paid out of the moneys of both railways. If there are creditors who have claims on one railway only, then they will be paid out of the moneys of one railway. What right should we have now to pass upon claims of creditors who are not before us at all, and who have not been notified. It is a private Bill and the nature of the Bill has been changed at the last moment. For my part I would not associate myself as promotor of the Bill with any such legislation as has been suggested.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—Drop it then.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I fail to see how a gentleman of such legal acumen cannot understand the meaning of the clause from the House of Commons, which I think is as plain as A,B,C. The creditors of the South Shore Road shall be paid according to law; that is the clause sent up by the House of Commons. It is clear they cannot get paid otherwise than according to law. This House is not passing on their claims, because this House simply says that they shall be paid according to law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the difference ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As a matter of fact there are creditors of the two roads, and by a stroke of the pen you annul their claim.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not at all. If I am a creditor of the South Shore for $50,000 and a creditor of the Quebec Southern for $50,000 when the Quebec Southern is sold am I to be paid my $100,000 out of the sale ? Is that what the hon. gentleman wants ? If so, it would be an injustice to give any creditor the right to go into the sale of another road and recoup himself. That is what the hon. gentleman's amendment would amount to. It is dark, it is deep-laid, it is a lawyer's amendment and my position on the floor of this House is to make the laws of the land as clear and as plain as possible and give as little latitude to the courts to interpret the laws as possible, to give no judge the right of interpretation when we on the floor of the House can make the law clear and plain. That is the object we have in passing laws, not to give the legal fraternity the right to swell up costs, not to place on the shoulders of the judiciary a burden which they sometimes refuse to assume. We have a chance to pass a law that is clear and distinct, doing no injustice, setting forth the fact that the creditors of one road shall be paid out of the proceeds of that road and that the creditors of the other road shall be paid out of the proceeds of the other road. I do not see how any senator can come before this House and ask us to pass a law that would be indistinct and unfair.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The clause is quite clear if it is read.

4. The creditors of the South Shore Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway and its accessories by preference to and before any other creditors; and the creditors of the Quebec Southern Railway shall be paid in order of priority according to law out of the proceeds of the sale of the said railway and its accessories by preference to and before any other creditors.

This has clearly for effect the wiping out of creditors who are merely creditors of an amalgamation, creditors of both roads. Then the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) which does not go as far as that, would go half way, but would have the effect by the use of the word 'respective,' of saying that the money of each road would be distributed and be paid in such and such a way as determined by this parliament. I say that is a matter which should be left to the courts to determine how they shall be paid. The amendment which I propose is that the creditors shall be paid as they appear according to law, and unless we decide to constitute ourselves into a court of law we cannot accept the suggestion which has been made. Therefore, I insist on my motion which has been agreed to by the creditors. It has been accepted by Mr. Brodeur who was the promoter of the Bill in the other House.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—From what attention I could give to this Bill, my individual impression is that we had better leave it as it came to us from the other House. It is sufficiently clear. It has an air of innocence and looks like an honest Bill. I think we had better not meddle with it. No doubt the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman may be all right, but it seems to mix up what was otherwise distinct. It complicates what was otherwise clear, it opens possibilities of loopholes where there was solidity before, so my individual impression is that the Senate should not accept the amendment of the hon. gentleman, but should leave the Bill an honest, simple Bill as it is. I think we will be doing—possibly remotely, but very possibly—injustice to some party by amending the Bill in the manner proposed. My individual opinion therefore would be to leave the Bill as it has been sent to us.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from de Salaberry says the two companies have been amalgamated. Has not the amalgamation of the two companies been contested in the courts ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, it has not ; but by my amendment I declare that the claims of the creditors as they exist before the amalgamation shall not be affected by the amalgamation. I have gone to that extent to satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman has not said that he would not accept my suggestion to insert the word ' respective.' Why would he not accept it ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Because it is substituting this parliament for the courts, and I know it would interfere with the vested rights of the parties. I am acting for the receiver. I know what I speak of ; I know the claims against the roads and it would seriously affect the rights of parties who are not before us.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Opinion is very largely divided on that, whether it would affect their rights or not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member has been told of certain things by parties——

Hon Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—And it is correct too.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Neither the hon. member from Victoria nor the hon. member from Rigaud has had anything whatever to do with it. They are not interested parties and do not represent any of the creditors. I represent the main creditors ; I represent the receiver, and I declare to this House that my amendment is the proper way to frame the clause.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman has just given to the House a reason why we should not take his suggestion in regard to this matter. He represents large creditors, perhaps that is his interest in proposing an amendment to the measure as it came from the Commons, an amendment which is not clear and which is liable to bring the matter before the courts. The clause as passed by the House of Commons covers all rights and protects all interests. It says the creditors of one company shall be paid by that company out of the proceeds of the sale of that road, and that the creditors of the other company shall be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the other road. What I want to know is this: If I am a creditor to any extent in the South Shore, and I do not receive any money out of the proceeds of the sale of the road, am I entitled to look to the proceeds of the sale of the Quebec Southern to get paid, or vice versa? If that is the object of his amendment I say that it is not fair and just and I do not see why he does not accept the word 'respective,' because that is the whole sense of the situation. Creditors of one road shall be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of that road and creditors of the other company will be paid out of the sale of the other road, and that is the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—The hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) states that he represents mostly creditors of the United Counties road. Of course, he represents the Bank of St. Hyacinthe, which is in for $16,000, and surely whatever he can get will be a benefit to his clients. It is perfectly absurd to provide that one road should pay the debts of the other. Let each road pay its own debts. This road owes about $80,000 and some other claims in addition. My hon. friend desires that his clients, the Bank of St. Hyacinthe, shall come in and obtain the balance out of the sale of that road after the $80,000 has been paid when they have no right to it. Surely this House is not going to give its sanction to the most odious measure ever passed, the most odious Bill ever concocted in this House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I should like to see what interest the hon. gentleman from Rigaud desires to protect. I would then be able to answer him. The difference between the hon. gentleman or these gentlemen whom I see outside the bar of this House——

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE——who want to obtain an advantage over certain creditors and I ask if the amendment I propose has the effect of giving any advantage to any one creditor.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I rise to a question of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—My amendment is for the purpose——

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The hon. senator called the attention of the chair to the fact that there were strangers in the House, which means that the sergeant-at-arms is to be called to empty the House and that every one should be ordered out. That is the effect of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN—I have not heard that observation made.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—It was loudly made.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I can make a suggestion which perhaps would meet the whole case. The amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry reads:

In the distribution of the proceeds of the price of sale of said railways or either of them, the creditors thereof shall be paid.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—Strike out 'thereof,' and we will admit it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I suggest the following: 'Shall be paid in order of priority according to law, under the direction of the court.'

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—'According to law' would mean the same thing as under the direction of the court.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Would it not appear that if the court found that there were some creditors of one road and some of another, and some joint creditors, that the court would direct according to what the equities would be, according to what the rights of what the parties would be. It would be a matter which could be disposed of by any officer of the court or any person interested conducting the litigation, but it would be done under the direction of the court. It seems to me that that would meet the case, and there would be no difficulty at all. The court would direct the way in which the money would go. It would be according to law and under the direction of the court. The funds would be conserved and if the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry would consent to that, I make the suggestion that it ought to meet the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That does not meet the situation at all. The clause coming from the House of Commons covers that. It says that creditors shall be paid according to law—adding the words, 'under the direction of the court' is altogether superfluous. When you say a debt shall be paid according to law that means by the direction of the courts and it does not require to add those words. That does not make the clause any clearer. Does he mean as representing the interests of the creditors of this company, or one of these companies, to ask this House to allow a creditor of the South Shore or of the Quebec Southern to be paid out of the sale of a road in which he has no interest. Is that what he means? That is what the clause means.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And that is the very reason he will not accept the word 'respective.' We will accept his amendment—'in the distribution of the proceeds of the price of sale of said railways either of them, the respective creditors.' Does the hon. gentleman want the creditors of the Quebec Southern to be paid out of the South Shore? His clause says so, because he refuses to accept the word 'respective.'

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He has no right to.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—He won't get it.

The House divided on the amendment, which was adopted on a division; yeas, 16; nays, 15.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported that they had gone through the said amendments, and had agreed to the same, with one amendment to the first amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I beg to give notice that when this Bill is up for third reading

I will move an amendment along the line I have suggested to-night.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The third reading has been passed. The Bill was sent to the Commons, amended there, and now we have discussed those amendments.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I beg to move in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau (Rigaud) that the word 'respective' be inserted in the third line and 'respectively' in the fourth line, and that it be referred back to committee to make those changes.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (196) An Act in amendment of the Criminal Code, 1892. He said : This Bill has been very much discussed. It is the measure known as the Bill relating to Trading Stamps. It has been demanded by all the Boards of Trade in Canada, and, I am told, by nine-tenths of the merchants of Canada. It has been very much discussed in the press and hon. gentlemen know exactly the working of it. The best authorities say that it interferes very seriously with fair and honest trade.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have no objection to the portion of the Bill which deals with Trading Stamps. I am entirely in favour with it, but the last clause of this Bill alters a very important section of the Criminal Code, and I cannot understand how it has crept into this Bill. If hon. gentlemen will look at the last clause they will see that it reads thus :—

> Section 523 of the Criminal Code, 1892, is amended by inserting after the word "conviction", in the second line thereof, the words "at the option of the accused."

In order to give the House an idea of the serious alteration which it makes I will refer to clause 523 of the Criminal Code. It reads as follows :—

> 523. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable on indictment or on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or three months' imprisonment with or without hard labour who, wrongfully and without lawful authority, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing anything which he has a lawful right to do, or to do anything from which he has a lawful right to abstain :—
>
> (a) uses violence to such other person, or his wife or children or injures his property ; or
>
> (b) intimidates such other person, or his wife or children, by threats of using violence to him, her or any of them, or of injuring his property; or
>
> (c) persistently follows such other person about from place to place ; or
>
> (d) hides any tools, clothes or other property owned or used by such other person, or deprives him or hinders him in, the use thereof ; or
>
> (e) with one or more other persons, follows such other person, in a disorderly manner, in or through any street or road ; or
>
> (f) besets or watches the house, or other place where such other person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be.
>
> R.S.C., c. 173, s. 12.

It is intended by this very innocent-looking clause at the end of the Bill to alter the whole proceeding of this section and make all the proceedings optional with the accused. If any person is guilty of any of those offences and declines to be tried by a magistrate or a justice of the peace, he can claim to be tried by a jury, and the result is that the police magistrate or the justice of the peace has no jurisdiction. He must consent to his being tried by a jury and all the police magistrate has to do is take his recognizance and security that he will appear at the court and be tried by a jury. Then we know perfectly well that out of twelve men it will not be very hard to get a mechanic or a couple of artisans closely allied with the striking party, and when it comes to trial a conviction cannot be secured—you will have great difficulty in getting a verdict. I object to this clause of the Bill; it is foreign to the other portion of the measure, and how it found a place here I cannot understand. It appears to me that it has been quietly attached to the end of this Bill for a purpose, and as far as I am concerned I shall certainly oppose, to the extent of my power, the passage of that clause at every stage. I am entirely in favour of the rest of the Bill, but that particular clause I object to; and if the Bill is pressed I shall move that that clause be struck out. If I cannot accomplish anything else I shall move at the third reading that the clause be eliminated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That will come up in committee. Why not move in committee?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am opposed to the principle of the Bill as far as that clause is concerned. I have no objection to the other portions of the Bill, but I do oppose that clause, because I say it is dangerous and will facilitate and encourage strikes. We will soon be as bad as they are in the United States; they cannot get a conviction there simply because their judges and magistrates are all elected. This will put us in a similar position.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That is all very well, but let us deal with it in committee.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I do not propose to discuss the merits of the Bill; I merely call attention to the fact that the matter with which it deals has been the subject of legislation by the legislatures of Ontario and Quebec, and the matter has been brought before the Superior Court and the Court of King's Bench in Montreal in litigation between the parties interested. The Superior Court held that it was a matter within the jurisdiction of the legislature of Quebec and that it was properly before it. An appeal was taken to the Court of King's Bench, and that judgment was reversed, the Court of King's Bench holding that it was an act in restriction of trade, and therefore came within the jurisdiction of this parliament. More than that, it is known that the Bill which was introduced in the House of Commons by the Minister of Justice, and now comes here as a government measure, was condemned by the Minister at the time he introduced the Bill. It is a matter relating to the criminal law, which is specially within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice more than within the purview of any other of his colleagues; and under these circumstances, at this late stage of the session, it appears to me that it is utterly impossible that the Bill can be passed. It will be strongly opposed in this chamber as I am told it has been strenuously opposed in the courts; and, as I have just said, it is utterly impossible that the Bill can pass. Therefore I submit to the Secretary of State the propriety of withdrawing the Bill without further taking up the time of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government have adopted the policy of placing the Bill before parliament and asking parliament for its approval of the measure as one in the interests of the great majority of the mercantile community. As I am advised, it has been asked for by all the Boards of Trade in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I have asked several persons, especially women, about this Bill, and they say it is a fraud.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—This may be a criminal measure but I think some good and substantial reasons should be given for the passing of such a law. Of course the government may decide that a certain thing is right and proper, but undoubtedly the Minister of Justice in bringing this matter before the other House showed that he was acting in a perfunctory way, because his observations clearly showed that he did not consider that what was proposed to be punished was criminal.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask if the arrangement made at the beginning of this sitting should not be observed. We were to take the unopposed Bills first.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Every Bill has been opposed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—None of them has been opposed excepting the last Bill. The hon. minister must not forget this, that item 3 has been passed over for that purpose. We did not take up the Militia Bill because it was understood we were to proceed with the unopposed orders on the paper. There are items in the orders which are not opposed, and the hon. minister should take up those items immediately. If he will not do so, we will discuss this Bill ; and if he has any cause to complain he must blame himself.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—To those who have followed the proceedings in the House of Commons, it is plain that public opinion as expressed in that House demands the passing of this Bill. As far as the Boards of Trade are concerned, the opinion of the Boards of Trade, from one end of the Dominion to the other has been placed on record in the Hansard of the House of Commons. The resolutions passed by them were read in that House, and the principle embodied in the Bill has the approval of the Boards of Trade generally. The question is as to whether it is a criminal offence that this Bill deals with. For my part I do not hesitate to answer that question in the affirmative, because the trading stamp is nothing else but a device to impose on the person who conducts a trade by holding out to him the promise that if he purchases, then the vendor of the trading stamps will place canvassers on the streets for the purpose of enticing customers from others to purchase in his shop, and with a further threat that if he refuses to purchase the stamps that he will go and trade with his competitor and adopt such means to destroy his business. Surely this is a practice which is a crime, and for my part I have no hesitation in approving this Bill, and I think it should receive the sanction of parliament. Possibly it might have been worded differently, but the object of this Bill is not to prevent any legitimate trade, simply to put a stop to the practice I have described.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I disapprove personally of the trading stamp system, yet I am bound to take exception to the hasty legislation involved in this Bill. In the dying hours of the session we are asked to place on the statute-books not merely an expression of opinion, but a declaration having the force of law that that is a crime to-day which up to a few days ago, in fact for some years, has been looked upon as a legitimate business. The moral susceptibilities of the government seem to have become suddenly aroused to the fact that a crime is being committed in connection with a business which apparently has been successful for at least a decade and has extended its ramifications all over the Dominion. It seems to me a grave injustice is being done to those who have entered upon and are now conducting a legitimate business. As I understand it, a very large amount of money is invested in these trading stamps in the way of manufacturing different articles and in the distribution of their trading stamps. I am informed that several hundred thousand dollars have been invested in this particular business. It is idle to say that the manufacturing of these goods can be a crime. It is idle to say that the sale of these goods is a crime, but it seems that the fact of an association being had between the manufacturer of these goods and the retail dealer is to be constituted a crime. It requires a refined distinction, in my judgment, to conclude that this is a crime. There must be some moral, or immoral element in a transaction of this kind if we are to be sustained in establishing a code of criminal law. It seems to me it is a fallacy to suddenly come to the conclusion that because retail merchants or boards of trade may condemn a particular system of trading, that condemnation must necessarily constitute the system a criminal one. If we are to be sustained in building up a proper body of criminal law the immoral element, or the offence against morality must necessarily be clearly defined throughout that body of law. I have heard no analysis of this particular class of business which would appeal to my mind as satisfactory in establishing it to be a crime. I take the view that the matter comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that the municipalities or other bodies charged with the work of local government have the right to say whether this class of business should be carried on within the community by license or otherwise or whether it should be suppressed. But that a class of the community should come to this parliament, three or four days before the closing of the session, and suddenly seek to impress on parliament that a business which had been a legitimate business for years past is a crime, and that the Minister of Justice, although introducing the Bill, should express his disapproval of it, is to my mind an extraordinary state of affairs. Parliament would not be doing itself or the community justice to suddenly pass a law of this kind which would wipe out of existence a large commercial interest, representing many hundreds of thousands of dollars, without a little more mature consideration being given to the question. This is a matter which might very well be taken up next session, and considered in the various aspects in which it presents itself to our mind; and after mature deliberation we could deal with the question. In the meantime the courts of Ontario and Quebec will have disposed of the various controversial phases of the subject which have come before those courts, and parliament will be seized of information along the lines which I have indicated; and I have no doubt that the judgments of those appellate courts will throw light on the subject so that we may be able to deal thoroughly with it. I therefore, without expressing disapproval of the Bill, would be most emphatically in favour of its standing over until next session of parliament.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. gentleman has expressed his disapproval of trading stamps, and I think has also gone further and said that the disapproval was more or less general throughout the community. We have as a fact the intimation that boards of trade have conveyed that impression, as well as experienced business men throughout the country, who have made known exactly what they object to and how strong their objection is to trading stamps. The argument is advanced that because it has not been an indictable offence——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It has not been an offence at all.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The argument advanced is because it has not been an indictable offence in the past, it should not be made one now. We all know that law, as applied to the conduct or relations of life, changes; there is that kind of accretion which has been found—the law growing stronger and stronger—to be able to deal with offences as from time to time they become offences. We know perfectly well there are many features connected with gambling of a speculative character, which are now punishable and indictable, which in former years were not. We all know that combinations against a fair sale of property were probably always considered so sufficiently tainted with fraud that a transaction or purchase based on them could be voided; but we know perfectly well also that in certain classes of cases criminal law has been applied, and the offence has been declared a criminal offence. The section of the statute which it is proposed to amend here is one of that class, where combinations against a fair sale are declared to be an indictable offence. It is proposed to amend that section and enlarge its operation so as to take in trading stamps. When the trading stamp business was in its infancy it probably did not do much harm, but with its growth and the extent to which it is taking hold of the people it is in its nature coming more or less to partake of a gambling character, and becoming unfair, unjust and unreasonable, and one which ought to be declared an unlawful interference with the ordinary channels of trade and buying and selling. As such the government after consideration determined to introduce this Bill, declaring that it is an indictable offence coming within the criminal code; and if the facts are as stated, if it is one which is making an inroad upon honest and fair dealing and creating an unhealthy relation between buyer and seller, then it is important that it should be stopped. The way which has been selected as the best method of accomplishing that is by bringing it within the criminal code and declaring it to be an indictable offence. The Bill is pretty plain as to its character. It does not interfere with an ordinary trade discount which is given by a merchant. It does not interfere with that which in ordinary buying and selling would be called a fair way of dealing—a man giving to his customers generally a discount for cash as compared with credit selling, but it does interfere with a man starting a system by which he will divert trade to a person or make a profit, instead of the customer getting the benefit of it, the customer getting the benefit nominally in a certain form but being in the dark as to what the benefit really is. Under the circumstances it appears to me that when a matter is brought forward by the government as an evil which should be stopped, and stopped in a summary way by aid of the criminal code, we ought not to hesitate about adopting it; and if so I do not think we should postpone our action.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I entertain the same views with respect to trading stamps as most people. I am not in favour of the system; but in looking at what has taken place in another Chamber, I find the Minister of Justice, who introduced this Bill, said it was a novel mode of legislation, and he goes a good deal further than that. He says: 'It must be admitted it is novel legislation,' and it is a novel sort of legislation to my mind from this standpoint; I think the company which carried on the trading stamp business was incorporated not only by the Dominion but by some of the provinces. We find the Dominion under the law which gives them the power to incorporate different companies to carry on business, issuing a charter to enable business of this character to be carried on, and then coming down immediately afterwards and declaring it a criminal offence. That I think, with the Minister of Justice, is exceedingly novel legislation; and if it be true, as is asserted that a large amount of money has been invested in order to enable the parties to carry on this business, it is questionable whether the summary manner in which it has been suggested to put down the system is fair and honest. If they have been acting under a charter obtained from the Dominion and charters obtained from provinces, it is a question whether it is fair and equitable to deal with them as this Bill proposes to do. In the face of that fact, should it be made a criminal offence to the extent of being punishable by imprisonment for one year and a penalty of $100 in addition? It does not strike me as being a fair and equitable mode of dealing with questions of this kind. It may be well, if deemed advisable, to annul these charters to which I have referred, and it would be proper if we desire to put down this class of trading to take a little time and pass a Bill making it illegal and a penal offence by which some penalty or fine might be attached; but in the meantime let the people engaged in the business, who have entered upon it lawfully and under authority of a charter, have sufficient time to at least close up their business. The question was put when this subject was under discussion elsewhere as to whether it would be considered a crime for a grocer to give to a customer a stamp upon purchasing an article, to be redeemable afterwards by himself, either in goods in his own shop or otherwise. That was declared by those advocating this measure and by the Minister of Justice not to be an illegal act, that it would be quite proper and within the law to give a purchaser a ticket in lieu of the 5 per cent or 10 per cent discount for cash and telling him that when he has secured a sufficient number of those tickets they will be redeemed in goods. But if the dealer gives the stamp with the understanding that another person shall redeem it, then it is a criminal offence and he is liable to be imprisoned. That is the proposed law. Now there are lawyers in the House and men of common sense. I ask do they see anything criminal in the granting of a stamp to be redeemed by another when it would not be criminal or illegal to give the stamp to be redeemed by himself. I must confess I cannot draw the distinction. I admit that the issuing of these stamps to a merchant when his neighbour refuses to deal in them might give one an advantage over the other, but is that an illegitimate mode of doing business? If it is, I suppose you could make it a criminal offence; but in ordinary business it would not be considered a criminal offence. While I am opposed to the system of trading stamps as a whole, I do not think it is of such an evil character as to justify legislation so stringent in its character as this. When we come to the last clause of the Bill to which the hon. member from Wellington has called attention, the House should be very careful about adopting it. It is an attempt to engraft an objectionable provision upon a Bill with which it has no connection whatever. It is an insidious attempt to make a change in the criminal law by which an object can be attained which cannot be attained now. If, as has been indicated by the hon. member from Wellington, a street riot occurs and some person's head is broken or property destroyed, street car windows smashed, cars thrown off the track and other damage committed, then if any person arrested for such an offence is brought before a magistrate, this clause would enable the accused to say whether he should be tried summarily by a magistrate or by a jury.

The hon. gentleman has very correctly pointed out what the effect would be if that were adopted. Why should such a clause be added to an Act of this kind? It was only last session we passed an Act affecting the general principle, I forget what it was now, but there were three or four lines changing the Criminal Code by adding a third clause to it. The hon. Secretary of State admitted when he moved the clause that it was not relevant to the Bill which we were considering, and if we are to amend the criminal law in the mode indicated by this Bill, why not introduce it and let it be discussed and considered upon its merits? We could then enter into a full discussion as to the effect it would have upon trade and business generally, and upon the people who commit crime and destroy property in the manner indicated. But if any one has taken the trouble to read the debates in the Commons on this question, I think he will come to the conclusion arrived at by the Minister of Justice himself that it is novel legislation. We grant charters to carry on a business and a year afterwards, at the instance of those who are affected by it, we make the business a criminal offence and propose to send a man to jail and fine him a hundred dollars for carrying it on. If that is correct legislation, I must confess that I form a very erroneous view of our duties as legislators. If any Bill is introduced at the next session of parliament to put a stop to the supposed evil, if evil it be, it would receive the sanction and support of every member who has considered the question; but if the House is determined to carry this Bill now, do not let us add to it a clause amending the Criminal Code in a most important point. Being a government measure I suppose the government members will support it. At twelve o'clock at night, on the eve of prorogation, these Bills are laid before us; and as I have repeated three or four times in accepting them in the manner which we are obliged to follow, we become mere recording machines. We do not consider these question calmly and coolly as they ought to be considered, nor do we give that weight of thought and consideration to them that Bills of this character demand. If there is one thing more than another that will bring the Senate of Canada into contempt it is by adopting the principle we have followed for the last two days of having half a dozen Bills of the most important character brought down and swallowing them holus bolus without the slightest consideration. That is what we are doing with six or seven of the most important Bills which have passed the Commons this session involving millions of money.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—A reference has been made by the leader of the opposition to the remarks of the hon. member from Wellington with reference to the third clause of the Bill. I do not know if this is the proper time to discuss the matter, but there was a time in the history of the world when trial by jury was denied the people, and I think evils existed under that system. The accused has the privilege of saying whether he shall be tried by one magistrate or two magistrates or by a judge or jury, even for the very greatest crime, where the liberty and life of men are at stake; and I never heard that any one would deny to a fellow-citizen who is charged with a crime the right to elect by what tribunal he shall be tried. Under this clause he is permitted to say whether he shall be tried by a judge and jury or by a magistrate who might not be very well versed in the law. I want hon. gentlemen to consider this matter. In a trial by judge and jury, the judge lays down the law to twelve sworn men, who pledge their oath that they will faithfully try the case, and they are either going to convict or acquit the party accused. I never heard the right denied to any person whose liberty was about to be taken from him to be tried by a judge and jury.

The law speaks of summary convictions, which means a trial before a judge and jury or two magistrates. I know that in the courts in our town they leave it to the accused to say whether he is going to be tried on summary conviction. He has the right of selection, but some other judges have interpreted the law differently, and this Bill is introduced to make the law plain, and it leaves it to the accused.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if I knocked him down on the street whether the magistrate would not administer the law and punish me without going to a jury ? The hon. gentleman said the right of trial by jury was never denied any one.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I said in the most important cases where life and liberty were at stake. The Magna Charta gives all men that right.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It was given them before that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I met the hon. gentleman from Lindsay on the street and knocked him down and he brought me before a magistrate, would the magistrate concede the right to me to be tried by a jury and not punish me summarily ?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That question comes before the committee. It is not necessary to discuss it now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask the hon. leader of the House if he would be inclined to accept a motion to adjourn this debate ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am very sorry in commencing my remarks to state that the agreement betwen the hon. leader of this House and myself a few hours ago has not been fulfilled.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg my hon. friend's pardon. There was no agreement that would involve my ignoring this Bill. We have been taking the Bills regularly from the beginning. I suggested that we should take the unopposed ones. That was not agreed to by the members of the Chamber, and we have therefore taken them in rotation from the beginning.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I repeat what I have said. I regret that the agreement between the hon. gentleman and myself at the beginning of this sitting of the House has not been followed. We were discussing the third order of the day at the time, and that order still remains undisposed of. The hon. gentleman knows that it has not been discussed, and why has it not been discussed ? Precisely because we agreed to call the unopposed Bills before passing to the measures that were opposed. That was the agreement and in consequence of that agreement the third order of the day the Militia Bill was allowed to stand, and we did not proceed with the discussion on it. My hon. friend must remember that when the House adjourned at six o'clock my hon. friend from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) was about to address the House on the Militia Bill. The discussion was adjourned until eight o'clock, and when we met again my hon. friend from Marshfield had the floor, but he did not proceed, and why ? Because the hon. Secretary of State agreed to the proposition that I made, that the unopposed Bills should be taken first so as to give these measures a chance to be passed by the House of Commons. That was the agreement and I am proving the agreement by the fact that we passed over the third order of the day because a long discussion would take place on that measure, and because my hon. friend from Marshfield intended to answer at length the observations made in this Chamber by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). Is that not a fact ?

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have refreshed his memory that an agreement was made ; and if the agreement has not been carried out it is not our fault. He does not remember having made the agreement, but when an agreement is made it should be lived up to.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Of all the Bills that have been introduced into this House. will the hon. gentleman tell me if there is one single measure that has been asked for by as many boards of trade as the present Bill ? We have considered Bills which have not been asked for, but this one has been.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman asked me if there is any Bill that has been asked for by the public more than this one. I never heard of any petition or any deputation asking the House to pass this measure. What took place in the cabinet I do not know.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The hon. gentleman reads the papers ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, but not all. I intend reading a book that my hon. friend has written with reference to the Prime Minister. It has been very well spoken of in the papers, and I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman on the sentiments he expressed in that book, although I have not read it. I know he has said a good deal in this chamber about the Prime Minister, but I want to know what he has written.

Some Hon. MEMBERS—Question, question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the question?

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—Do not excite him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill is in amendment of the Criminal Code of 1892. Let us see what the principle of the Bill is. The first clause states that the Criminal Code of 1892 is amended by inserting the following subsections immediately after section 536. That section of the code deals with offences connected with trade and breaches of contract.

Subclause 1 reads:

Section 526a. The expression 'trading stamps' includes, besides trading stamps, commonly so called, any form of cash receipt, coupon, premium ticket, or other device designed or intended to be given to the purchaser of goods by the vendor thereof or his employee or agent, and to represent a discount on the price of such goods or a premium to the purchaser which is redeemable.

I suppose the hon. Secretary of State, who has charge of the Bill, will consider it his duty to give all the information so that the clause will be made clear when we go into committee.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The hon. gentleman's conclusion is that the House will go into committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. I said when we go into committee, which I think may be next year. I suppose everybody understands the clause which I have read. If not, it is because it is very obscure. A grocer or tobacconist may sell his cigars or tobacco with stamps in a different box or with wrappers which if returned entitle the purchaser to a certain discount or to a certain present. That is the same thing that is done with the trading stamps.

Subclause B, the second provision, states that the expression 'goods' means anything which is merchandise or the subject of trade or manufacture. That throws a great deal of light on the subject. Then subclause C reads as follows:

(c) The expression 'every one,' 'vendor,' 'purchaser,' 'merchant,' 'agent' or 'person' includes any partnership.

This first clause is what we call the interpretation clause. The Bill goes on to describe what the offence is. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment and to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars—that is half of our surplus indemnity this year.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—This is all childish.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Subclause 2 of this Bill reads as follows:

2. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, who, by himself or his employee or agent, directly or indirectly, issues, gives, sells or otherwise disposes of, or offers to issue, give, sell or otherwise dispose of trading stamps to a merchant or dealer in goods for use in his business.

I will not make any comment on this clause. We will discover the principle of the Bill by reading it over in its entirety.

Now here is something very serious:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $20 who, being a purchaser of goods from a merchant or dealer in goods, directly or indirectly receives or takes trading stamps from the vendor of such goods or his employee or agent.

What is the meaning of that clause? Suppose the minister from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Templeman) has a daughter and she goes to a shop and buys an article and is given a trading stamp she may be prosecuted and if found guilty fined $20. Did the hon. Secretary of State ever imagine the position in which he is putting his colleagues by passing this Bill? One may be perfectly innocent of any intent to do wrong and yet by accepting a trading stamp become liable to this heavy penalty.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Does not the hon. gentleman think that a fine also should be imposed upon a man who has no pity for his colleagues, who talks merely to kill time?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to assume that I am killing time.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It looks like it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to insinuate motives. I am here in the performance of my duty.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It is a lesson to the government. It shows the necessity of bringing their Bills here in time so that no hon. member can, like the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, delay prorogation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We agree upon that point; it is a lesson to the government that they should bring their Bills here in time. More than that, it is a lesson to my hon. friend the Secretary of State not to insist upon forcing Bills through the House without giving time for proper consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had hoped to have prorogation to-day, but of course all the Bills on the paper have to be disposed of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. member wants that, he has the means of getting it. We made an agreement to which the hon. gentleman has not adhered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have done everything that is fair, but as I do not feel justified in keeping the House sitting and having this exhibition made I am willing that the debate shall be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that the hon. member suggests that this matter be suspended for the time being and that the orders which are not opposed be passed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for the second reading of Bill (170) an Act to amend the Militia Act. .

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said : I regret that I have to proceed with the observations I intend to make on this subject in the absence of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, because they are intended as a reply to his speech before six o'clock, and one of the reasons why I so readily consented to the laying over of that Bill was because I had hoped the hon. gentleman would be in the House this evening. I should prefer in his absence that the Bill be allowed to stand until to-morrow. It is not a very inviting hour of the morning to make remarks on a Bill of this kind, but if I were to discuss all the subjects that were referred to by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I fear that I would make almost as long a speech as we were assured the hon. member for Stadacona was going to make on another Bill. However, I shall confine myself to two or three points as to which I wish to place myself on record. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce claimed a great deal of credit for the present government on account of sending the contingents to South Africa. I do not think the government, especially the premier, can claim very much credit, because he announced in an interview published in the 'Globe,' a couple of days before any action was taken to send the contingents, that there was no intention on the part of the government to do anything in the matter. Possibly the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce knows how the hand of the Prime Minister was forced on that occasion. It may be that he was not one of those who were remiss in their duty in connection with that matter ; but certainly after the announcement of the premier, pointing out that they would only permit Canadians to volunteer at that time, it ill becomes the hon. gentleman to declare as he did in the House this afternoon that the government deserved credit for the course they pursued in that matter. However, that is not the worst of it The hon. gentleman went on to claim that the members of the government personally and individually had done wonderful things, that no less than seven sons of cabinet ministers were in the firing line in South Africa and that one of them was killed in battle. I know the son of the Minister of Militia was killed, but I think it was rather a Falstaffian statement on the part of the hon. gentleman when he said that seven sons of ministers were in the firing line in South Africa. I should like the hon. Secretary of State or some one who knows the families of ministers to tell me who these seven sons of ministers who were in the firing line of South Africa were. I think I would have no trouble in proving to the House how far the statement is correct. I see the hon. member from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) has his pencil ready to take down the names of those who were in the firing line in South Africa.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—They fought like men, and some of them died.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no doubt if they were there they fought very well, but if they were not there it is reasonable to doubt whether they fought well or not. I think I could go over the list and my hon. friend can take down the names. First, how many sons of the premier were there. Perhaps we would save time if my hon. friend, who is a great military man himself and takes cognizance of everything in that line going on in Canada, and I dare say in the world at large, could tell us off-hand who were those seven sons of ministers who were in the firing line.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILE—I did not make the statement, and I am not interrupting the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps he can give us the information.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I do not know.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I doubt if the hon. Secretary of State knows either. I have no doubt whatever that this statement about the seven sons of ministers who were within the firing line of South Africa is something like Jack Falstaff's men in Kendal Green. The number was increased every time the story was repeated, and I have very little doubt from the mood the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in this evening that if he had got a little gentle friendly interruption such as my hon. friend is giving me just now, we would have got twenty-seven sons of ministers in the firing line in South Africa.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—If the hon. gentleman would allow me to say one word, I never interrupted——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am very glad to have the hon. gentleman interrupt me. It was a very extraordinary statement on the part of the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in the first instance that the government are entitled to any credit whatever in connection with sending the contingents to South Africa, in view of the fact that the premier declared through the Toronto 'Globe' that the policy of the government was that they should not send Canadian troops to South Africa, and in view further of the fact that they apologized steadily and continuously for a very considerable time at least, for allowing any Canadians to go, alleging that they simply went as volunteers and that the government had nothing whatever to do with it. Now the Minister of Trade and Commerce alleges that the government is entitled to very great credit for what they did on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to claim a great deal of credit for the government on account of British preference. What had this to do with the Militia Bill? I confess I do not know very well, but I have no doubt if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce were present, he would be able to show me what that has to do with increasing the number of the regular troops from two to five thousand. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a very logical man, and I have very little doubt if he were present he would be able to show us the entire relevancy of that statement to the increase of the standing force of the Dominion. My hon. friend (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has put a memo. in my hand which entirely proves the correctness of the statement I have made, that Canada moved very slowly and unwillingly—as far as the premier and cabinet were concerned—in the matter of sending a contingent to South Africa. Queensland made its offer to the imperial authorities on the 11th July; Victoria on the 12th July, the Straits Settlement on the 17th July, New South Wales on the 21st July, Hong Kong on the 21st July, New Zealand on the 22nd July, West Australia on the 5th October, Tasmania on the 9th October, South Australia on the 13th October, and the last of all the colonies in the empire to make an offer was Canada. That was done on the 14th October.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—We were the second to send troops. Not only that, but while I do not want to put myself forward in any way, our corps were the first to offer for service in the colonies.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They were the last of all. I have given the exact dates.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend is talking of the colonies as a whole. I think you will find the Eighth Huzzars made the first offer of any member of the empire to go to South Africa.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It may be quite correct that individuals and individual corps made offers previous to that, but it was not what individuals did that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of, it was what the government did. We know there is plenty of patriotism in Canada, and not only patriotism, but as events showed, valour and the best fighting qualities. I am dealing entirely with the claim which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce made in this House that the government was deserving of a great deal of credit for what it did.

There is one other subject which I must briefly notice before I close my remarks and that is the hon. gentleman's claim to credit for the government because they brought about a preference for Britain.' I remember very well that when Mr. Fielding announced this tariff he stated most distinctly that it was not a preference proposition at all, but a reciprocal tariff, or as Kipling put it, 'We favour those that favour us, said the Lady of the Snows.' It was a proposition to give a lower tariff than our regular normal tariff to countries whose average tariff was less than or equal to our own. That offer was open to all countries. The government were told at the time they could not do that, but they knew better; and the legal gentlemen in the government claimed that any fledgling lawyer ought to know that it was very easy of accomplishment, that they had only to go to England and it would be put into effect. Sir Charles Tupper told them that the Belgian and German Treaties were in the way and would have to be abrogated. He told them of the efforts that had been made in that direction, all of which had been resisted, and he told them further that the favoured nations' clause in Britain's treaties with other nations would also be in the way of carrying out any such policy as they have announced. But they knew better than Sir Charles Tupper, and they passed this reciprocity tariff of theirs, and many of the ministers went to England for the purpose of taking part in the proceedings of the jubilee year. The conference was held in London, and they met Mr. Chamberlain and other members of the British government and were told plainly that what they proposed could not be done, that it was impossible to put this reciprocity tariff in operation until the Belgian and German treaties were got out of the way. They were not satisfied, however, with this statement; they went to the Privy Council and were told substantially that Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Borden and others, who had told them that the Belgian and German treaties were in the way, were right. What occurred later on? After the conference and after all the colonies were heard on the subject, Mr. Chamberlain made a speech to the delegates in that conference, and told them that although Canada had repeatedly demanded the abrogation of the German and Belgian treaties yet the British government had steadfastly declined, but that he had learned in the course of the conference that it was the unanimous desire of the colonies that the British government should give notice for the abrogation of the Belgian and German treaties. It was then, and not until then, that Mr. Chamberlain announced that such notice would be given.

I have no doubt that in the mood in which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was this evening, he would have claimed all the credit for the abrogation of the German and Belgian treaties, along with all the other matters that he claimed credit for,—the preference and other matters. We know what happened. It was due, not to any effort on the part of the government of Canada, not due to the fact of the reciprocity tariff we passed here, that the German and Belgian treaties were abrogated, but it was due to the action of the colonies in London, and when they became unanimous the British government decided to give notice for the abrogation of the treaties. But when that was settled Mr. Chamberlain informed Sir Wilfrid and his colleagues that there was another difficulty in the way. He pointed out to them what had been pointed out by our friends in opposition here, that even after abrogating the German and Belgian treaties, the most favoured nation treaties which Britain had with a great many nations, were still in the way, that this interposed a still more serious difficulty, and that the only Bill that they could pass in the nature of the tariff which they called a reciprocal tariff was a British preference. They then found that all they had been doing, practically from the time their tariff went into effect, had to be undone, and steps had to be taken to make good to Germany and Belgium the duties collected from those countries in excess of those collected from other countries which had most favoured nation treaties with Great Britain. In the face of this evidence that the preference was a matter of accident, that the government fell into it as a pure accident, without any intention of ever establishing a British preference, but in a zig-zag way, looking at one object and hitting another, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce this evening asked us to give the government a great deal of credit on account of the British preference. I know this subject must be of interest to other gentlemen. The Minister of Trade and Commerce must have thought it was interesting or he would not have referred to it as he did on the Militia Act and he must have seen the entire relevancy between the Militia Act and the subject of the preference. I was very much delighted to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce lamenting over one of his party's lost opportunities. He said 'if we had been in power when the late government were in power, we could have made an arrangement of a trade character with the United States which would have been most beneficial to Canada and which would have cemented together the Anglo Saxon race all over the earth and it would have been a blessing to the whole world? My hon. friend lamented the fact that they were not in power at that time; but if they were not in power at the critical moment—that tide in the affairs of men or in the affairs of government which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune—if they were not in power at that exact period with regard to the question of reciprocity with the United States, they were in power at a period when other opportunities presented themselves. The hon. gentleman was not very much stronger in pronouncing himself in years gone by in favour of commercial union with the United States or unrestricted reciprocity than he was with regard to changing the constitution of this honourable House. Yet he had an opportunity of doing that, but he did not take advantage of it. This honourable House still flourishes. I know that at a later period the hon. gentleman told us that he was going to leave the matter in the hands of Providence. It was very kind of the hon. gentleman—I am not going to discuss the doings of Providence in regard to this House. They have been very marked in a great many ways during the last few years—it is enough to cause a feeling of sadness and reflection to pass over our mind when we think of it. But what I do point out is the lost opportunity—lost because he has allowed it to be lost—which he has had for the last nine years to carry out the solemn promise that he would reform this House by changing the constitution of the Senate. I could point to several other lost opportunities the hon. gentleman and his friends have had. I might point to an opportunity for reducing the expenditure of this country from one to six million dollars. I think the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce took a kind of mean between one and six million. The expenditure of this country on consolidated revenue in 1896 was about thirty-six million dollars, and including capital account it was about forty-one million dollars, but the hon. gentleman solemnly promised that if the people of this country would give him and his friends an opportunity, he would reduce this expenditure about three or four million dollars, and the former Minister of Justice, who has now passed away, indicated that the reduction would be six million dollars.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We did not know the country would develop as it did.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There are a great many things the hon. gentleman did not know at that time, and a good deal he does not know now. But he did not put in a saving clause of any kind whatever. All he wanted was to have the opportunity. This extravagant, corrupt government, who were expending altogether on consolidated revenue and capital account $41,000,000 were an incapable lot, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his friends were only given a chance they would reduce that expenditure by three or four million dollars. We will ascertain to-morrow exactly how much they are expending this year and how far the Minister of Trade and Commerce is falling short of making use of this grand opportunity to reduce the expenditure of his country. The speech of the hon. gentleman opened up many other subjects, and I could point out many other lost opportunities of the government with regard to carrying out their promises. My hon. friend seemed to think the only difficulty in the way of bringing about the most happy state of affairs for the benefit of Canada, the empire and the whole Anglo-Saxon race, was that the late government did not drop out a little earlier and allow their opponents to get control of affairs away back in the years 1889, 1890 and 1891. It would have been very interesting if he had been a little more precise and if he had fixed the year in which he sighed because he had not the opportunity, because in one of those years I believe he was advocating commercial union with the United States—no custom-house between the North Pole and the Gulf of Mexico. And at another time he was advocating unrestricted reciprocity—and if the opportunity had come it would have been in the way of establishing unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States. If the opportunity had come in any of those years the herculean efforts of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and my hon. friend the Secretary of State would have been devoted to bringing about free trade as it is in England. I must complain of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he did not indicate to the House in which of those forms all the great blessings which he enumerated would have come to the people of the country. However, there was no doubt, in my hon. friend's opinion, that if they had been in power at that time they would have brought in some one of these measures ; any one at all, I presume, would have been sufficient to bring about a most happy state of prosperity, and to cement together the empire and the Anglo-Saxon community all over the world. The hon. gentleman appeared to have so much faith in any one of the various nostrums which he proposed that there does not appear to be any difference which one of them he advocated,—if they had not lost that opportunity of dealing with the trade question in 1888, '89, '90, and '91. The opportunity came a little later, when my hon. friends came into power, and they undertook to deal with the trade question ; but they forgot all about unrestricted reciprocity. They forgot all about commercial union with the United States. If I recollect aright, they had forgotten that before we went out of power. It was not altogether the fault of the miserable Tories who did not consent to die at the right time or to get out of office at the right time to suit them, because I remember a conference was held in this very city in 1893 and the wise men of the Liberal party gathered from all parts of this country. An important contingent came up from Prince Edward Island for the purpose of formulating a policy for the party. It appears that they had begun to lose faith in the nostrums that they had been propounding for some years, and they called their wise men together for the purpose of counselling which of these policies they would agree to accept and carry into effect when they would get into power. I suppose that is what they had in their minds when they came together. A gentleman turned up among the wise men on that occasion and said to them in effect : 'You have been a pack of fools.' Sir Oliver Mowat delivered a speech at that conference and a little pamphlet was published which I am preserving with care. It has often been referred to in the past, and will be referred to in the future.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman think he is treating the House fairly in discussing these matters on the Militia Bill ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have been following the Minister of Trade and Commence and would point out that he discussed the preference question in connection with this. The subject is a broad one which could be followed up with advantage. I read in the 'Globe,' the organ of the Liberal party——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Only sometimes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is the organ of the party, but as the party wobbles the 'Globe' wobbles. It sometimes does not wobble as quickly as the party changes its attitude, but it generally gets into line at last. The Toronto 'Globe' has some political biographies—it has announced that we are on the eve of very serious changes in our cabinet; that we are going to take our leave of the Secretary of State, that in September next he will retire from public life.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is not right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will say for my honourable friend that every hon. gentleman, be he Liberal or Conservative, will have a feeling of regret at parting with my hon. colleague from this House. We have had the pleasure of his presence with us since I was appointed in this chamber, and my hon. friend has been performing functions in this House, first as leader of the opposition for many years, and since that as an important member of the government, for a considerable part of the time leader of the government in this House. My hon. friend has not only proved himself a capable parliamentarian, but he has shown himself to be kind and courteous to the members of this House, and I am sure that I express the sentiments of the hon. members around me and those on the other side of the House, that if tomorrow or the day following when the Governor General comes down to prorogue parliament, my hon. friend takes his departure from this House and never meets us again, as the 'Globe' says—I may be wrong and I may have misunderstood the 'Globe.'—it may be that he is not going to retire from this House, but simply from the government, in any event there will be very serious changes—I desire to place on record—and I do it with all sincerity—the personal regard I entertain for the Secretary of State and my appreciation of his courtesy while I have been a member of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I think when the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) goes home tonight and says his prayers, he will sleep very soundly and with a good deal of self-complacency after the attack he has made on the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. minister is not quite as sound on his feet as the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, but when it comes to mental activity I think he is his equal in every respect. As a free trader—perhaps the only free trader in this chamber to-day—I rejoice at the benefit this country has received from the preferential resolution, and it has been a blessing to Canada as well as to the Empire at large. I always felt and still feel that we made too much boast of what we did in sending the contingent to South Africa. New Zealand with a population of less than nine-hundred thousand, did more than the Dominion of Canada and I think that the Dominion of Canada did no more than they should have done under the circumstances. I hope that there is not in this country a growing feeling in favour of anything like separation from the British empire; and I hope the day will be long distant when an idea of that kind will obtain ground in this House or in the Dominion at large. I was delighted to read a paragraph about Mr. Chamberlain in the newspapers and I will take the opportunity of reading it to the House. It is as follows:

> In his speech to the Canadian Manufacturers on the occasion of their visit to Birmingham, Mr. Chamberlain said:
>
> Only the other day I was reading some utterances of the Hon. Joseph Howe, of Nova Scotia, a man of great distinction, and I found to my shame that I did not know before that this scion of the British race fifty years ago, when we in this country were engaged in merely provincial affairs, was considering and setting before his countrymen of Canada the great object of preparing for the necessary union of the British empire in the future.

These were words that Joseph Howe, that great statesman, that great orator, the greatest man in Canada, uttered fifty years ago, and if hon. gentlemen will only take the time to go into the library here and read his speeches on the union of the empire they would find there a mine of thought and information superior to anything that can be got from any man in this House. This is from my good friend Howe with whom I had the honour of sitting in the legislature in Nova Scotia a long while ago.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The Bill was then read at length at the table the third time, and passed.

ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN ROAD ALLOWANCES BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (195) intituled An Act respecting Roads and Road Allowances in the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

He said: This Bill provides for the transference of the roads and road allowances in the two new provinces to the Crown in the right of the provinces instead of the right of the Dominion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (188) An Act respecting the Inspection of Water Meters.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (200) An Act respecting the Superintendent of Insurance and the Director General of Public Health.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

FALSE REPRESENTATIONS TO IMMIGRANTS BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (120) An Act respecting False Representations to induce or deter Immigration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time at length at the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has anything occurred to justify legislation of this kind?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From time to time instances have occurred.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have seen grave charges laid at the door of Dominion immigration agents in London and other places in the old country, but I have yet to see evidence to justify such charges. On the contrary, the government agents in Europe have positively denied them. This is another evidence of the attempts made by labour unions and close corporations to prevent people coming to this country who might in any way interfere with their interests in Canada. I shall not oppose the Bill, but I think we ought to be very cautious how we lend ourselves to the clamour constantly going on throughout the country in reference to matters of this kind. We are spending millions of dollars now to induce immigrants to come to this country. Some will come and declare that they were induced by false representations to leave their homes and come to Canada. On investigation it will be found, in nineteen out of every twenty cases of the kind, that there is no foundation for complaint. There are some people who, if they do not find every thing just as they expected them to be are apt to growl and attribute improper motives. I know it has been claimed that mechanics have been brought to this country when there was no work for them to do. I know of men in the country where I live who had been weavers all their lives before coming to this country and it was always supposed that such men were of no use as settlers, yet some of those weavers have proved to be the most prosperous farmers in our part of the country. They came here poor, but they were industrious and sober and succeeded, as all such people will. I do not think we ought to pay much attention to such complaints. Immigrants may not be able to find employment immediately, in the occupations to which they were brought up, but there is plenty of work for everybody and it would be much better for them if they would go on farms. I could give a number of instances within my own knowledge of persons who refused to work at anything but the occupation to which they were trained, but that is not the kind of men we want in this country. We want men who are willing to earn their living at any occupation they can find. We have plenty of such people coming to Canada who are a credit to themselves and their families, and who will, in the course of time, be as prosperous as any people in the community. We should be cautious how far we go in listening to the clamour raised, sometimes by manufacturers and sometimes by the labour unions, in connection with this subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is very often the case, but a very pitiable instance of misrepresentation occurred in Montreal four or five weeks ago where an Italian boss brought in about 100 men from the United States. They were stranded in the city and had to be taken care of ; and it was clear that they had been grossly deceived by false representations.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

APPEALS FROM SUMMARY CONVICTIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (66) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, with respect to appeals from certain summary convictions. He said: This Bill makes slight changes in the administration in the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The Bill is designed to amend the law respecting appeals from convictions. At present any person who thinks himself aggrieved by a conviction may appeal to the court of general sessions. This limits it to cases where the judge sentences the offender to imprisonment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the Bill introduced by Mr. Porter in the Lower House?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not know. The second part of it provides the manner in which the recognizances are to be entered into. At present the law provides that it may be done before a justice of the peace. This provides that it may be entered into at the Division Court.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The first clause of this Bill is in my opinion objectionable. It enables any person who has been fined by a police magistrate to appeal to the county judge of the first court that is held in the section where the conviction has taken place. That virtually means that if a person commits an ordinary offence and is brought before a police magistrate and fined $10 or $20, he has an appeal from that to the county judge the first time he comes round on circuit. The result of this will be you will not get magistrates to act at all, because their decisions may be reviewed by the county judge.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The Bill is designed to prevent that. Now any one convicted can appeal; this limits the appeal to cases in which there is imprisonment. Of course if there is an imprisonment and a man thinks he is wrongfully convicted, he should have a right to appeal.

The Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (204) An Act to amend the Act respecting Judges of the Provincial Courts.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (203) An Act respecting annuities to certain privy councillors.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 11 a.m.

ONTARIO AND MINNESOTA POWER COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the third reading of Bill (86) An Act respecting the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended as follows:

Page 1, line 11.—Leave out from 'follows:—' to the end of the Bill and substitute the following:—

1. The company may construct, develop, acquire, own, use and operate the water-power now or hereafter existing on the Rainy river at or near the town of Fort Frances, in the district of Rainy river, in the province of Ontario, and construct, develop, operate and maintain works, canals, raceways, water-courses, dams, piers, booms, dykes, sluices, conduits and buildings, in connection with the said power, including any increase of the said power on Rainy river by storage or other works on waters tributary to Rainy lake which the company now has or may hereafter have power to construct: Provided that no work authorized by this section shall be commenced until the plans thereof have first been submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council.

2. The company shall from the said water-power, including any increase thereof from time to time provide power or electrical energy for use on the Canadian side the international boundary line concurrently as it provides power or electrical energy for use in the United States, so that from time to time, except as herein provided, there shall not be less of the said power or electrical energy available for use on the Canadian side of the international boundary line than on the American side; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, such power or electrical energy shall be delivered on the Canadian side as and when demanded.

3. The power-house, generators, transmitters, machinery, appliances and connections necessary for the delivery by the company of such power or electrical energy for use on the Canadian side of the international boundary line shall be on the Canadian side thereof.

4. In case of any dispute as to the price for power or electrical energy in use or to be provided for use upon the Canadian side of the said international boundary line, or the methods of distribution thereof, or the time within which or the conditions upon which the same shall be furnished for use, such dispute shall, notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of the Railway Act, 1903, be settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada on the application of any user or applicant for power, or of the company, or of the town of Fort Frances.

5. No part of the power or electrical energy to be provided under this Act for use upon the Canadian side of the said boundary line shall be diverted to or used in the United States without the order of the said Board of Railway Commissioners made on an application of which two weeks notice in writing shall have been served upon the mayor and clerk of the town of Fort Frances, or, in the absence of either one of them, upon a member of the town council in his stead.

6. The said Board of Railway Commissioners shall have full jurisdiction to inquire into and hear and determine any application of the company for leave to make such diversion, and if, and so often as, it appears to the said board on such an application that there is not a reasonable prospect of the utilization within a reasonable time of power or electrical energy unemployed, though actually available for use, on the Canadian side of the international boundary line, the court shall make an order permitting the diversion of the whole or part of such unemployed power, or electrical energy, and may impose such terms and conditions, including the fixing of the time during which such diversion may continue, as the board may deem expedient.

7. The board may order and require the company or any person to do forthwith, or within or at any specified time, and in any manner prescribed by the board, so far as is not inconsistent with this Act, any act, matter or thing which such company or person is or may be required to do under this Act, and may forbid the doing or continuing of any act, matter or thing which is contrary to this Act; and shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine all matters whether of law or of fact, and shall, as respects the attendance and examination of witnesses, the production and inspection documents, the enforcement of its orders, the entry on and inspection of property, and other matters necessary or proper for the due exercise of its jurisdiction under this Act or otherwise for carrying this Act into effect, have all such powers, rights and privileges as are vested in a Superior Court.

8. The practice and procedure under this Act on applications to the board shall be as nearly as possible that followed on applications thereto under the Railway Act, 1903, and otherwise shall be subject to the direction and control of the board.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am quite willing to accept the amendment as proposed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that the motion is to substitute as an amendment the Bill laid before us for adoption instead of the amendment made in committee and reported to the House?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Practically that is it. In other words I am moving that all the clauses be struck out after the preamble and substituting therefor the amendments of which I gave notice last night, which incorporate the agreement arrived at between all the parties interested, including the town of Fort Frances, and which I am advised have been distributed to the members of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While I still hold the opinions I have expressed in reference to this Bill and the manner in which it was introduced. I am not prepared to give it any further opposition.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill as amended was read a third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for second reading of Bill (196) an Act for the amendment of the Criminal Code of 1892.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I take exception to that; this is not the second Order of the Day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was understood yesterday that this should be the second Order at this sitting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There was no understanding.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The debate was only adjourned on that understanding.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—According to the rules of our House that motion should be at the foot of the orders.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—When the hon. gentleman proposed to adjourn the debate last evening, the Secretary of State consented on condition that it was made the first Order of the Day for this morning. Another hon. member suggested that the third readings take precedence of this, which was admitted. On that understanding the House consented that the debate should be adjourned. If that arrangement had not been made, the debate would not have been adjourned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it was the hon. gentleman himself who said that the third reading should take precedence of this.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not on that Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was certainly stated by somebody.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I could not agree to that, and the proposition was not put by the Chair that this Bill should be the second order of the day. The adjournment of the debate took place, and immediately after the hon. member rose in his place and asked my hon. friend from Marshfield to proceed with the other Order of the Day. I appeal to the Speaker to say if he ever put the motion in the way that has been mentioned.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It was done by common consent.

The SPEAKER—I have no recollection of putting the motion that way, but I am informed that the entry was thus made. If the hon. gentleman objects to the minutes, then he should move to amend them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be just as well to proceed with the other business, and consider this later on. I have no recollection as to what the agreement was at the time the adjournment of the debate was moved, but the practice in this House is to place an order of this kind at the foot of the list. In the House of Commons, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce knows well, the government always take the responsibility and have the right of calling any order, particularly if it is a government measure. What has been the practice here I do not know. A question of this kind has not arisen in my experience in the Senate, and I am not prepared to give an opinion; but the right has always been reserved to the government to call any order, and I see no reason why the same practice should not prevail here, although it has not been the practice in the past.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion put from the Chair was that the debate be adjourned, and the order should go to the foot of the list. If there has been any alteration in the minutes it was done without the consent and knowledge of the House.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I am within the judgment of every member of the House who was here last evening that when my hon. friend proposed the adjournment of the debate, the hon. Secretary of State agreed to that and said it would be the first order for to-day. Then an hon. member said that third readings should take precedence of this, and it was on that understanding that the debate was adjourned. Surely the leader of the government in this House, particularly in the dying hours of the session, has some right to say in what order the business shall be taken up. Now, it is the desire of the government that this Bill shall proceed. It was the desire of the government that prorogation should take place to-day, but due to what I regard as the unfair opposition of my hon. friend prorogation will not take place to-day. I am not very sure whether it will take place to-morrow or not. It will all depend on the course pursued by my hon. friend. The goverment desires that this Bill should pass and that it should be discussed and disposed of before any other Order of the Day is taken up. There are several important Bills to follow after this one is disposed of. If my hon. friend wishes to obstruct the business and delay prorogation two or three days, the responsibility must rest upon his own shoulders. The government have intimated their desire, and the majority of the House are in favour of the policy the government purpose to pursue, and if two or three members hold up the House the responsibility for the delay must be on their shoulders.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will be just as well, and facilitate the business of the Senate much better, if the ministers will not hold out threats of that kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no threat.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman ought to know from his parliamentary experience that two or three members could keep the House sitting a fortnight longer if they chose. I do not say that anything of the kind will be done, but a covert threat is not at all in accordance with parliamentary practice, and the hon. gentleman had better not in future attempt to coerce the House as he attempted to do in his remarks to-day. We would have got on with the business much more rapidly and pleasantly had the government adopted my suggestion, to get rid of all the other Bills and then take this one up. That would allow the other important Bills to go back to the House of Commons if they should require amendment. Like all the other members of the Senate, in this sweltering weather, I am very desirous to get through with the business and go home, but we are more likely to get through quickly if hon. gentlemen will refrain from throwing out threats.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I disclaim any intention of making a threat. If that meaning could be taken from anything I said certainly I did not intend it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was no difficulty in understanding it.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman is willing at all times to read me a lecture and I am quite willing to listen, but I did not intend to utter a threat. I simply explained that if the House had to remain in session two or three days longer it would be in consequence of the unfair tactics of the hon. member from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If we cannot agree upon the understanding of last night, we should at least accept the minutes. The clerk has made an entry that this Bill shall be taken up after the third readings. In a court of law the entry made by the clerk is law, and we ought to regard an entry in the minutes in the same way.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to contest that. I say the clerk has no right to put anything in the minutes that was not put by the Chair. The Chair did not state that this was to be the first order after the third readings. I come now to the reference to third readings. That did not arise on this question at all, but the hon. Secretary of State, after the second reading of one of his Bills, moved that the third readings be the first order of the day. On that I rose and said such a motion was unnecessary, because by the rules of the Senate every third reading must be among the first orders of the day. The hon. member from Halifax may shake his head; I know what I said. My remark was that all third readings were first orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona appears to be under the impression that no other member of the House remembers anything correctly except himself; that if he happens to differ from all the other members as to what has taken place he must be right and all the others must be wrong. The hon. gentleman is as a rule pretty correct, but he is not always correct. In this particular matter the circumstances to which he referred may have occurred, but I am within the hearing of hon. gentlemen who also heard what took place, and I state most positively that the hon. Secretary of State asked to have a certain matter which was not a third reading put first on the Order of the Day; then it was said by some hon. gentleman—I thought it was the hon. member from Stadacona—that the third readings took precedence and that it was not a third reading the hon. Secretary of State spoke of. At any rate we have the minutes and we are bound to take them unless, as the hon. gentleman beside me says, the minutes are amended.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—This is an extraordinary thing; we are quarrelling about what is on the Orders of the Day and nobody has seen them yet. How can we discuss this question until we get the Orders of the Day?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In the House of Commons the right of the government is undoubted, but I would suggest to the hon. leader of the opposition if there is any difference of opinion between hon. members on either side, that as I understand the habit and custom of the Senate it might very well be decided by a vote of the whole House. If the House orders a particular measure to be proceeded with, I think that it is clearly within their right. If my hon. friend from Stadacona chooses to dispute the position taken by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, he can refer it to the judgment of the House.

The SPEAKER—I have already decided that the minutes being as they are, the order was properly called by the clerk of the House, and if objection is taken to the minutes, then it can only be by motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it not unpardonable on the part of the printing office, with the facilities they have for printing, that they could not turn out a couple of pages of minutes between four and eleven o'clock to-day. It is only another instance of the way in which this House is treated. I am not holding any official of the Senate responsible, but the clerk tells me that the Orders of the Day were sent to the printing office at four o'clock this a.m., and they were coolly told that they could not be sent up here until half-past eleven. It is not more than should occupy them an hour and a half, yet here it is nearly twelve o'clock and we have not received the minutes yet to guide us as to our proceedings.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that the Orders of the Day be read.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—The minutes were read as follows :

After debate,
On motion of the Honourable Mr. Landry, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Macdonald (Victoria), it was Ordered, That further debate on the second reading of the said Bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that it do then stand as the first item on the Orders of that Day after third readings.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I appeal to the Speaker himself. I ask him if he put the motion in that form when he put it from the Chair?

The SPEAKER—I have already said that I have no recollection of the form of the motion. As to that I have to be governed by the minutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was with the common consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Such consent was never asked and I never gave such a consent. I asked the hon. Secretary of State to go on in the regular way with the Orders of the Day. He will not save time by the course he is taking. I have the floor and I intend to speak.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman intend to make a motion against the minutes ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly I will make a motion. I move that the words in the motion conveying the idea that an agreement was made that this Bill should be the first on the Orders of the Day after the third readings, be struck out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I remember very well hearing the words mentioned by the hon. member from Halifax but by whom they were spoken I do not know. It was not by myself, but I am not at all surprised considering the confusion that prevailed in this House last night at the time to which we are referring if the clerk was misled in making his entries. I remember very well my hon. friend moving the adjournment of the debate and what followed. The hon. Secretary of State then asked the hon. member from Marshfield if he was prepared to go on with the discussion of the Militia Bill and he said he was while regretting the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Then some confusion took place as to what the procedure should be in reference to this Bill to-day. A suggestion was made by somebody to proceed with the Bill and some one else suggested that the practice was that third readings should come first and there it seemed to me that the matter ended. If the Secretary of State had accepted my suggestion, we would have got through half the Bills by this time. I am not aware of any Bills except this one that are of a contentious nature or that there is likely to be a long debate upon. As intimated by the minister without portfolio, the government have a majority and can do as they like. I do not intend to offer him any advice, nor do I desire to read him or any one else a lecture, though he seems to think I want to lecture him. I merely stated what the practice of parliament was, and while the majority intimate that they will pursue a certain course, the hon. gentleman must remember that the minority have certain rights which may enable them to delay the prorogation. The hon. gentleman has told me two or three times that I am given to lecturing him. I have not done so ; I have merely stated what the practice of parliament is and the rights of the minority. I am quite convinced that when this question comes to a vote the government majority will carry it. I think even now if the hon. gentleman will go on with the other Bills and pass them we could take up this matter and deal with it more satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In all the years I have been in the Senate I have never yet heard it disputed that the government could take up any Bill they named. If there were a number of private Bills on the paper and the government could by passing them over obtain an unfair advantage, it might be a question ; but there is only one private Bill and that is not likely to be proceeded with. Where they are all government Bills surely the courtesy of the Senate ought to give the government a right to proceed with such of their Bills as they think proper. I have never known it to be disputed. It is unfortunate that I should have to appeal to the majority to support such a reasonable proposition. While I was on the other side of the House I never knew a case of the government being interrupted in taking up any particular measure unless it was interfering with some private Bill which was entitled to precedence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has forgotten his own record. He has forgotten that he and one or two others delayed prorogation two or three days simply because they wanted to defeat a measure before the House. We do not want to repeat that.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was rejected.

The Order of the Day being called a second time:

Resuming of the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for second reading of Bill (196) An Act for the amendment of the Criminal Code of 1892.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY said : The Bill now before us contains a very important principle. I do not oppose the Bill itself, but we have been told that the government will accept no amendments whatever at this stage of the session, and consequently, it is intended to pass this Bill with all its imperfections. I as one of the members of the Senate shall record my vote against the Bill. This Bill was introduced in the House of Commons early in the session. It could have been discussed and passed long ago and we should have had it in time to give it thorough consideration. Why was it delayed ? Because the promoter of the Bill knew that it was liable to undergo some very important changes, and it was kept back until now when it is brought to us in the dying hours of the session. I should be glad to see any improvement made in our Criminal Code, but this Bill contains such dangerous provisions that I think it should be rejected. This Bill is designed to make it a criminal offence to sell trading stamps, though that is at present a legitimate business. The company which deals in stamps is working under letters patent obtained from the government. One of the titles of the criminal code says that it deals with offences against religion, morals and public convenience. I have nothing to say with reference to any offence against religion, when we have just now before us the report of the special committee named to amend the Lord's Prayer. But has not my hon. friend who is amused by this title of the Criminal Code, the right, when we go into committee, to move an amendment declaring that every one would be guilty of a misdemeanour who would omit to recite the last three or four words of the Lord's Prayer.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I have better sense that that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What would the hon. gentleman do ? Do nothing at all. If by doing nothing at all he is supposed to have better sense than those who did something, this government would be credited with having a good deal of common sense for they are doing nothing at all these days. Yesterday my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Church) protested in very indignant terms against the suppression of these last few words in the Lord's Prayer.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Parliament might decide if we amend the Criminal Code that the suppression of these words might constitute a criminal offence. Parliament is asked to decree that the sale of a few trading stamps is a criminal offence, and as I said yesterday, if a young girl goes into a shop, buys a few articles, and puts them in her chatelaine bag, if she receives a trading stamp with the goods she is a criminal and may be brought before the court and sent to jail. We are asked to declare that a criminal offence.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I am not disposed to have my hon. friend put nonsense into my mouth. I spoke as I felt, and said I was under no compulsion to come in here and hear the form of prayer recommended by the Committee if it did not suit me. The instructions in this House were to leave out certain portions of the prayers. I found no fault with that, but I have conscientious objections to eliminating any part of the Lord's prayer, and I stated my position briefly and was done with it. If I see fit to take up that question another session I will present it in another form. My hon. friend need not waste the time of this House alluding to a matter like that, and I will not consent to have him put in my mouth words which I never uttered.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What has the Lord's prayer to do with trading stamps?

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—We French Canadians believe in the Lord's prayer, but the shorter you make it the better.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the same thing applies to this Bill, the shorter it is made the more acceptable it will be. I was simply speaking by analogy, and saying that if you have a right to declare one thing an offence you have a right to declare another thing an offence. If my hon. friend finds it absurd to take that stand then I have a perfect right to say it is nonsense to take the same stand in the other case. The government told us the other day that at this stage of the session it was impossible for the House to amend Bills because it meant that they would be killed. The government know very well that it is not killing the Bill when we move amendments to it. We know the intentions of the government. First of all, to choke off any proper discussion of that serious question. That is their policy. When the Autonomy Bill was before us, I took care to inquire of the government if we were allowed to make any changes and was answered that we were not, that the Bill was perfection, and every hon. member on the government side who spoke regarded the measure as perfect. No amendment or improvement could be dreamed of. We tried to improve the Bill but we were met by the majority who declared the Bill was perfect. I suppose they regard this trading stamp Bill as perfect also. The fifth title of the Criminal Code contains provisions concerning offences against the person and reputation. Could we not include here an amendment declaring it an offence to present this Bill now, because you are offending the rights of the party to whom you gave the letters patent for the sale of those stamps. But perhaps it might be better to put it under the following section :

No. 6. Offences against rights arising out of contracts, and offences connected with trade.

This brings us to the sections which are sought to be amended by this Bill.

In section 24 theft is defined. Section 25 deals with receiving stolen goods ; and section 26 declares what shall be the punishment for theft. Section 27 deals with obtaining property by false pretenses. Section 28 deals with fraud, false accounting of officials and so on. I think that the falsification of a document falls under this heading. A document which relates to an event which never took place should come under that heading, and should be a criminal offence also. If we have not the right in the House to obtain documents which are the real reproduction of the facts as they took place, if the documents should by the authority of the government be changed into other documents, then I think we have the right to punish those who falsify or who are accomplices in the falsification of such document. Then come robbery and extortion, burglary and housebreaking, then forgery and offences resembling forgery. Then section 33 relates to forgery of trade marks, and fraudulent marking of merchandise. Then come personation and offences relating to coin and counterfeit money ; then section 37 applies to mischievous acts.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That applies to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, that is an attempt to commit arson. The definition of mischief is found in the present law, section 481 of the Criminal Code and reads as follows :

> Every one who causes any event by an act which he knew would probably cause it, being reckless whether such event happens or not, is deemed to have caused it wilfully for the purposes of this part.

That kind of mischief is divided by the law into different parts. There is the attempt to commit arson, setting fire to crops, threats to burn, injury to poll books, threats to injure cattle, and so on. Under the title of 28, we find cruelty to animals, which has nothing to do with the question here, unless somebody is keeping a cockpit.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is very applicable.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To those who keep cockpits.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman is keeping us here a long time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman does not for a moment consider that the chamber is a barn and I protest against his insinuation that I am guilty of cruelty to animals.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We are animals.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The law defines what an animal is. Then we come to the offences connected with trade and breaches of contract. It is to that sub-title that the present legislation is designed to be attached. What does this law say ? It is divided into two or three sections ; there is 526a and 526b and other subsections of the first clause, and then clauses 2 and 3. The definition says that a trading stamp may be a premium ticket or a receipt or coupon given to the purchaser by the vendor as a discount to the purchaser. This ticket is redeemable either

(i) by any person other than the vendor or the person from whom the goods have been bought or the manufacturer of the goods, or (ii) by the vendor or the person from whom he purchased the goods or the manufacturer of the goods, or in cash or goods not his property or not his exclusive property ; (iii) by the vendor elsewhere than in the premises where such goods are purchased, or which does not show on its face the place of its delivery, and the merchantable value thereof or is not redeemable at any time.

And so on. Before proceeding with the Bill I wish to call attention to the fact that the records of the House of Commons show that an amendment was moved to that definition in the House, and I observe they have substituted another paragraph for the one I have read. The hon. Minister of Justice moved the amendment. It reads as follows :

For paragraph (i) of paragraph (a) substitute 1. by any person other than the vendor or the person from whom he purchased the goods or the manufacturer of the goods.

Another amendment was moved to subparagraph (ii) as follows :

(ii) By the vendor or the person from whom he purchased the goods or the manufacturer of the goods.

I call attention of the House to the fact—and it is a very grave matter—that there is a marked difference between the Bill we have presented to us and the Bill passed by the House of Commons. I think it should be made a question of order, inasmuch as the Bill we have before us is not the one which passed the House of Commons. In the House of Commons they struck out the words ' or in cash or goods not his property or not his exclusive property ' in the 20th line of the Bill. However, we find them still in the Bill before us. I regret that the hon. leader of the House does not pay more attention to the grave statement that I am making and I think he ought to listen. I do not wish to interupt the conversation between the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is not interrupting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call attention to the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. He says an amendment was made in the House of Commons, and he can prove it by the record. That amendment does not appear in the Bill before us. I think the hon. Secretary of State should pay some attention to that statement and ascertain whether it is really a fact.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to make the inquiry if the hon. gentleman will give me a memorandum.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It appears in parts of lines 18, 19 and 20 in the Bill before us. We are entitled to have the Bills introduced into this House in the shape in which they leave the Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman explain where the omission is ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will be found in paragraph (ii) of section (a) of clause 526A. I have explained the matter to the House twice already, and on reference to the records they will find that these words have been erased. The first section of clause 526 gives the definition of what is meant by trading stamps. Now comes the clause of the Bill which makes it an indictable offence, punishable by imprisonment and fine, not exceeding five hundred dollars, to issue, give, sell or otherwise dispose of trading stamps to a merchant or dealer for use in his business. The offences may be the same, but they are dealt with in different manners. The second section of clause 526a deals with the offence of the vendor of stamps disposing of his goods to another merchant or dealer for use in his business. The third section deals with the offender who is not a manufacturer of trading stamps, but who sells or gives them away. It deals with the merchant who has purchased trading stamps from the manufacturer, and who, in doing his business, gives those stamps to the public. In his case the offence is punishable by a fine of two hundred dollars and six months' imprisonment. In the other case it is five hundred dollars or one year imprisonment. Then we come to the most objectionable clause in the Bill, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen to say whether we should permit such a provision to be enacted. The clause makes it an offence for any one to receive trading stamps from the vendor of goods or his employee or agent, and the offence is punishable by a fine not exceeding twenty dollars. We are asked to decree that a person who receives a stamp from a merchant as a premium, or as a discount, is guilty of an offence.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Is the hon. gentleman acting on principle in this matter, or how is he acting ?

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—Acting on principle and devotion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to qualify my own actions. I will leave that to the hon. gentleman himself. I am trying to convince the government that they are doing an absurd thing when they are decreeing that any one receiving a trading stamp is making himself a criminal, and I ask hon. gentlemen if one of their children goes to a shop to buy ten cents' worth of candy and receives a trading stamp, are they willing to declare that that child is a criminal ? We are asked by this legislation to do so.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Why does not the hon. gentleman move an amendment to the clause instead of making a very long speech ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have succeeded in opening the mind of my hon. friend, and I glory in that fact. He sees the danger of this legislation, and I am proud that I have accomplished that feat. I hope before resuming my seat to persuade the representatives of the government in this House to accept amendments that I shall propose. We are now debating the second reading, and I cannot propose an amendment. When the House is in committee I will move an amendment. In the meantime I am laying the facts before the House, and I want the House to understand the provisions of the measure. Will the government accept an amendment striking out that clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I must convince the government that they should accept. If the amendment is reasonable why should the hon. gentlemen not accept it?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The more the hon. gentleman talks the less he will convince hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that he is right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not trying to convince those who think I am right, but I want to convince those who think I am wrong, and I want to show them that it is a very objectionable piece of legislation and that it will be a stain on our statute book to declare it a criminal offence for a young girl to receive a green or red stamp from a vendor of goods when purchasing a box of candies. Could there be a more monstrous proposition? The government will not accept any amendment and what is our duty? Are we obliged to yield to the government's dictum and say: 'Oh, the government are powerful; they may impose any law they please on the country and we shall not protest.' I consider my duty is to protest, and I am doing so. I do not agree with the statement that we cannot improve Bills which come before us. The Bill is radically wrong. The government know that it is a bad Bill, but will not consider an amendment. The Minister of Justice, the guardian of the laws of the country, says that he will never take the Bill under his protection—he will not accept the paternity of the Bill. But as he was a member of the government and the government forced the Bill on the House, he was obliged to present it. Mr.

Borden stated in the discussion in the other House that he saw the Minister of Justice was against the Bill, and Mr. Fitzpatrick said: 'You know I am introducing the Bill on behalf of the government.' I say the Bill contains a vicious principle, and if you want to make it an offence to issue trading stamps you must remember that there are acquired rights which should be considered by the government. Those people who are dealing in trading stamps have obtained a patent from the government and have been incorporated. They are doing what they consider right and should not be dealt with in this way. The government say it is, in the interests of the country. Is it in the interest of the country to make it a crime to receive these stamps when the government themselves have given these companies permission to issue trading stamps? A memorial giving the history of those trading stamps has been submitted to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada, and to the government of Canada on behalf of an advertising company in answer to an application made by certain traders for legislation prohibiting the use of trading stamps and cash receipts and declaring their use criminal. There were two questions submitted to the government by this memorial. The first was the question of the legislative authority to deal with this subject. The memorial states that the question is sub judice, and they claim that no Act of parliament should be passed before that question is settled by the courts. In the second place they deal with the merits of the question itself. The principal point for us is the first question. We know that in Ontario an Act was passed by the legislature of that province, 1st Edward VII, chapter 26, under section 26 of which by-laws may be passed by the councils of cities and towns. Under that Act each town and city has the power to pass by-laws for prohibiting the giving, selling, distributing or receiving of trading stamps, coupons or other similar devices, and for prohibiting the giving selling, or dealing therewith by any person, firm or corporation engaged in trade or business. It is further provided that no such law shall apply to any merchant or manufacturer who places in or upon packages of goods, or delivers to the purchaser goods sold or manufactured by him tickets or coupons to be redeemed by such merchant or manufacturer either in money or merchandise. The constitutionality of that Act of the legislature of the province of Ontario has been maintained by a judgment rendered upon a reference to the Court of Appeal in Ontario. So that seems to put the question into the hands of the provincial government, and the only way that the government found to put this question into our statutes was to declare it a criminal offence. We know that the legislature of this Dominion has jurisdiction in criminal matters, and it is for this reason that such legislation is proposed with regard to trade just for the purpose of making it a criminal offence for your child to go into a store and receive a stamp. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—When will the hon. gentleman be graciously pleased to permit this session of parliament to be closed?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will move that the second reading of Bill (196) be the first order at the next sitting of the chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I accept that suggestion.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I desire to make a little explanation before the House adjourns. I am informed that a statement that I made yesterday on a matter of some importance was disputed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have a right to say that it is one o'clock.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have a right to speak, and will speak.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to speak.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The statement I made was disputed in this chamber yesterday, and I desire to say that whoever raised the dispute was considerably in error. I stated that seven sons of ministers had been in the firing line in the war in South Africa and I will state now who they were : Two sons of Sir Henri Joly, two of my own, one son of Sir Frederick Borden, one son of Hon. Mr. Dobell and one son of my colleague Sir Alphonse Pelletier, ex-Speaker of the Senate and Privy Councillor.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, oh. He was not a member of the cabinet.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—He was a Privy Councillor and a colleague of my own.

SECOND SITTING.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Routine proceedings.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That from now until the end of the session rules 41 and 70 be suspended in so far as they refer to Bills which may come before this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not that asking too much ? Measures may come before us of which we have no notice yet and to which some members may have serious objections, and these rules will be the only way of stopping what might be regarded as objectionable legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are no other Bills to come from the House of Commons. If there is any particular Bill that it is the sense of the House should be postponed until another sitting I am always willing to meet the wish of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With that declaration from the Secretary of State, that it will apply only to measures before the House, I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

GRATUITIES TO MESSENGERS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved :

That the caretakers of the Senate reading room and the assistant clerk in the Stationery Department, be paid one hundred dollars each in recognition of their services during the present long session.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have no desire to say anything against the officials mentioned in this motion, but I desire to point out that if you single out by a resolution of this kind one or two faithful servants and leave out many others who have an equal claim for consideration, manifest unfairness will result. To my mind the proper way to dispose of these matters is to deal with them through the committees. We have had from time to time reports from these committees and it would be far better in the interest of fair-play and justice that all the officers should be considered together. Since this motion has been put on the order paper, others in the service of the Senate have requested me to move a similar resolution on their behalf, and I have declined to do so. In all fairness at this stage we should adopt some system, some policy by which every servant of the Senate would receive justice and fair-play, instead of dealing with isolated cases. I do not wish to reflect in the slightest degree on those mentioned in the resolution, but as a matter of principle we should not adopt this patch-work method of dealing with officers of the House.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I wish to say with regard to these gentlemen named in the motion that it embraces the whole class. There are others who are equally worthy of an increase. I suppose the contagion of so many increases has affected them all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This matter was really decided by the House when it dealt with the last report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. It will be remembered that at that time a strenuous effort was made on behalf of the assistant postmaster, who is a zealous officer and much more entitled to some bonus than either of the gentlemen referred to in this motion. It was decided at that time by a large majority that there should be no increases during the present session ; that the committee charged with the duty would, at the beginning of next session, undertake to deal in a systematic way with all the servants of the House. With respect to these caretakers of the reading-room, I wish to make one observation ; for a number of years during my early experience in this House there was only one caretaker for the reading-room, and that caretaker was an old man. For several years before the present caretaker was installed, the caretaker was an old man named Gilbert and before him a gentleman named Taylor, also an old man ; yet they were able alone to do all the work, and I venture to say do it much better than it is done now. Under the circumstances, there is no reason whatever for singling out these officers for special treatment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I take this occasion to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the committtee has decided to classify all our employees next year. A measure should be brought in at the beginning of next session, or a report of the standing committee, preparing a scale for advancement, and in that way we will have peace. It will work automatically, and when a man deserves promotion he will get it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And on that report base a Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The sense of the House seems to be against the motion, and I think the hon. gentleman had better withdraw it.

The motion was withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Scott for the second reading of Bill (196) An Act in amendment of the Criminal Code of 1892.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY said: When this House rose at one o'clock I was just preparing to examine the position those trading stamp companies occupy in Ontario and Quebec. The following memo. has been furnished :

The Traders Advertising Company have the honour to submit, for the consideration of His Majesty's government : (1) That the question of the legislative authority to deal with the subject is still sub judice, and that no Act ought to be passed by the Dominion parliament until it is settled ; and (2) That upon the merits, the business carried on by means of trading stamps is a perfectly straightforward, honest business, which ought not in any event to be interfered with.

(1)—The question is undecided as to legislative authority.

In Ontario.—In Ontario the matter stands thus : An Act was passed by the provincial legislature, 1 Edward VII., chapter 26, section 26, under which by-laws may be passed by councils of cities, towns and villages, 'For prohibiting the giving, selling, distributing or receiving of trading stamps, coupons or other similar devices, and for prohibiting the giving, selling, or dealing therewith by any person, firm or corporation engaged in trade or business.'

'No such by-law shall apply to any merchant or manufacturer who places in or upon packages of goods, or delivers to the purchasers of goods sold or manufactured by him, tickets or coupons to be redeemed by such merchant or manufacturer, either in money or merchandise.

The constitutionality of this Act of the legislature has been maintained by a judgment, rendered upon a reference, by the Court of Appeal of Ontario.

In Quebec.—An Act was passed in the province of Quebec, 3 Edward VII., chapter 39, almost identical in terms with that passed by the province of Ontario, giving power to municipalities to prohibit dealing in trading stamps. Under the provisions of this Act the council of the city of Montreal and the council of the city of Quebec passed by-laws which, upon contestation, have by two judgments of the Court of Appeal been declared ultra vires, the Act itself being held to be unconstitutional.

We have, therefore, the Court of Appeal of the province of Ontario holding the provincial legislation to be intra vires, and the Court of Appeal of the province of Quebec holding the contrary, by two judgments.

The city of Montreal has appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and it is submitted that until the judgment of the final Court of Appeal is obtained, which will be at latest before another session of parliament, His Majesty's government ought not to have been asked to bring in the legislation suggested.

(2)—There is nothing wrong in the business of trading stamps.

It is respectfully urged upon the government that, unless there be something wrong in the business itself as carried on, legislation should not be asked to suppress it. Trade is continually seeking new channels, and traders are adopting new methods. Almost every new development in trade has been met by impassioned demands to the legislature that it should be suppressed. So that every effort has been made by means of cumulative taxation, &c., to suppress the modern departmental store, upon the pretext that departmental stores disorganize trade and ruin the small trader. In rendering the judgment of the Court of Appeal for the province of Quebec, in April last (1905), the chief justice, Sir Alexander Lacoste, describes the business of the Traders Advertising Company in the following terms :

'This is the way the trading stamp commerce, which the city by-law has prohibited, is being carried on :

'A person or a company, who is generally designated under the name of 'advertiser,' gives stamps to certain traders of his selection which these latter give to customers who buy for cash.

Each buyer, therefore, receives an amount in stamps equivalent to the amount of his purchase. The trader pays to the 'advertiser' 5 per cent of the amount of stamps which he has given to his customers, in return for which the 'advertiser' advertises the trader's store, and redeems the stamps, stating at the same time that stamps are given at that store. The cash buyer, as soon as he has $100 worth of stamps, calls upon the 'advertiser' who gives him an article worth from $4 to $5. Every one evidently is satisfied with the transaction. It is true that trader pays 5 per cent. of his cash sales to the 'advertiser,' but in return he reaps the benefit of the advertising and the redemption of the stamps.

'The buyer, over and above what he pays for, receives stamps with which he may procure an article worth from 4 to 5 per cent. The proprietor of the stamps thus disposes of his goods and also benefits of a number of stamps which are not redeemed.

'This system is in vogue in the United States, and in our province it has reached considerable proportions. The trade of those who give stamps has increased, whereas that of those who do not do so, has diminished.

'A number of people see in this system a disorganization of business. This is why a certain number of traders have addressed themselves to the legislature to obtain a law prohibiting it.

There is nothing in this kind of commerce which is, in itself, immoral or against public order. It is a means of advertising where, as I have said, every one finds benefit.

The practice among traders of giving some advantage or inducement to customers in order to secure their business, has long been in vogue. Some grant a cash discount, others have added something in the way of a premium, &c. The latter finds more favour with the public than even the cash discount, people preferring to have something in kind, as an object of furniture or of decoration, as a result of their cash dealing. The natural outgrowth of this system was that there should be some central store or depot where these articles could be procured, as it was most inconvenient, if not impossible for individual traders to devote the necessary space or the time to this feature of their business. The coupon system followed, and it developed into the trading stamp system as the most convenient for all concerned. The Traders' Advertising Company gives its stamps to the retail trader, whether he be grocer, boot and shoe dealer, baker, or engaged in any other trade. The trader pays to the Company five per cent of the face value of the stamps ; i.e., for stamps having a face value of $100 the trader would pay $5. The customer can procure the same stamps from the butcher, baker or grocer, and thus can complete a book representing $100 worth of cash purchases. He can then go to the depot or store of the Traders' Advertising Company and purchase any article up to $5. The company dealing in a very large way can itself purchase at the very lowest rates, and can give better value for the $5 than can be obtained in the ordinary shops. The company also can contract for advertising in a large way and thus can advertise all the shopkeepers who give trading stamps more effectively than they themselves could. The advantages and profits to the several parties concerned in the transaction may then be stated as follows :—

1. The retail purchaser for cash, obtains what is equivalent to a discount, or obtains an extra inducement to trade for cash in a form that is evidently attractive, or the business could not have grown to its present proportions. The stamps are principally used by traders dealing in staple goods, the prices of which are perfectly well known to the consumers, so that the retail trader could not recoup himself at the expense of his customer by adding to the price of his goods. And it is here to be observed that not a single complaint comes from the consumers or the purchasing public. The system has been in operation for a long time and has shown marvellous growth, there being now in the city of Montreal upwards of 30,000 customers asking for and receiving trading stamps. The people wish to deal in this way, or they would not do so, and no one comes forward to say that he has been deceived, or that he is not entirely satisfied with the articles he has received from the company, or that he has any fault whatever to find with the system. It is a safer and more wholesome method for the purchasers to buy for cash than to run bills.

2. The retail trader in return for the advantage which he gives to his customers by giving them the trading stamps, has the advantage of the extensive advertising of the company, and in addition he reaps the great benefit of carrying on his business on a cash instead of a credit basis. In proportion as the trading stamps are used he is relieved from the exposure to bad debts.

3. The Traders Advertising Company reaps its profit in the large business it is able to carry on in the articles purchaseable by the trading stamps, and incidentally reaps some profit in interest owing to the time which elapses between the delivery of the stamps to the trader and the redemption of the stamps from the customers.

There is no element of chance in the business, for each customer knows exactly what he can procure with the stamps, nor is there any possible deception, for each customer can ascertain beforehand what he can obtain when his book of stamps is full.

The only complaint comes from traders who do not choose to give their customers this or any other similar advantage. 'A' complains that 'B' is taking away his customers simply because 'A' is unwilling to give his customers some additional benefit or inducement to trade with him.

There is nothing in the world to prevent these disgruntled traders from doing as we are informed was done in Winnipeg, associating themselves together, having a central depot of goods and issuing their own trading stamps. It is said a disorganization of trade results from the use of these stamps. The disorganization results purely and simply from the fact that certain traders rigidly refuse to adopt new and ingenious methods of attracting trade. The first advertisers must have quietly disorganized trade in their locality.

Curiously enough no one seems to see anything wrong in a trader giving a stamp when he sells his goods, provided he redeem that stamp himself. Both the Ontario Provincial Act and the Quebec Provincial Act declare it to be perfectly lawful for any trader to give a stamp, provided he redeem it himself, and throughout the United States, wherever it has been sought by legislation to suppress the trading stamp system, a distinction has always been made between a trader giving a stamp to redeem himself and giving one which is equivalent to an order upon a third person for the goods. What possible distinction in morals can be drawn between these two cases it is difficult to say. The only difference is that one is much more convenient than the other. As the trading stamp business is an American development, it is appropriate to refer to American authorities.

In New York, in the case of the People vs. John Dycker (72 App. Division 308) the Court said :

'The prohibitive part of section 335a aims at the practice of issuing trading stamps that are to be redeemed by any other person than the merchant who distributes them, or the manufacturer of the goods sold. Just what there is in the thing prohibited differing from the thing expressly authorized that makes it inimical to the public welfare and general safety, does not appear.'

In Rhode Island, where a similar Act was declared unconstitutional in a case of the State of Rhode Island vs. Benjamin Dalton (48 L. R. A., 775), the court said:

'It is to be observed that the Act does not prohibit the vendor himself from giving, or "throwing in" as it is sometimes termed in common parlance, some other article in addition to that sold, but only prohibits the seller from giving anything in the nature of a check or order upon some other person which shall entitle the holder thereof to obtain from some other person some article of merchandise, in addition to the thing sold. In other words, the Act recognizes the right of a person to give away an article of merchandise in connection with, and as an inducement to the making of a sale of some other article, but provides, in effect, that the giving of such additional article must be done by him directly, and not through a third person. We fail to see that there is any substantial difference in principle between the two methods, or that either bears resemblance to a lottery.'

'The thing sought to be accomplished by the vendor is the sale of goods by means of the inducement held out to the purchaser in the form of a premium; and if he may himself give and deliver the premium, as he clearly may, he may also give it through a third party.'

'For, as already intimated, it can make no possible difference that the article given away with the sale is delivered to the purchaser by a third person instead of the seller himself. We think it is clear that such a proposition is an unwarranted interference with the individual liberty which is guaranteed to every citizen, both by our state constitution and also by the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

Also in Vermont, in the state of Vermont vs. Walter B. Dodge, (76 Vermont Reports), the language of the court was to the same effect:

'It only prohibits the seller of the property from giving a stamp or coupon which entitles the purchaser to receive and demand property from the third party, and the delivery of goods, wares and merchandise upon such stamps or coupons. The seller is still at liberty to give such stamps or coupons redeemable by himself in property and payable in cash by a third party. In principle there is no substantial difference in the two methods. They both accomplish the same results, and in neither method is there an element of chance. The Act, in effect, makes it lawful for a merchant to give a trade stamp redeemable by himself in cash or merchandise, and by a third party in cash, and it makes it unlawful for him, under like circumstances and conditions, to give the purchaser a trade stamp which is redeemable in some well defined article by another merchant. This is equivalent to declaring that a man shall not give an article as an inducement to a buyer to purchase another article, for it can make no possible difference that the article given with the sale is delivered to the purchaser by a third party instead of the seller himself.

The Traders' Advertising Company cannot ask His Majesty's government to read numerous reported cases dealing with the question of trading stamps. The decisions are all referred to in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law (2nd Ed. Vol. 28, p. 442) where the following statement of law is given, based upon the numerous decisions to which reference is made:

'Trading stamps, within the meaning of statutes and decisions regulating the subject, are tickets, coupons, or similar devices which a merchant gives, without extra charge, to a customer, in connection with and on account of his purchase, and which are redeemable in some article or articles of value either by the merchant himself or by a third party who has contracted with the merchant so to do.

'The decisions are practically unanimous in holding that a statute which makes it unlawful for the vendor of goods to give away to the purchaser, at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, any stamp, coupon, or other device which will entitle him to receive from the vendor himself or from any other person or corporation a certain well-defined additional article, is an unwarranted interference with individual liberty, and violates the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, and similar personal rights clauses in the state constitutions. The article procurable by the stamps being definite and certain, the transaction contains no element of chance, does not offend the public morals of the community, and consequently is not prohibitable in the proper exercise of the police powers of the state. It can make no difference whether the stamps are redeemable by the selling merchant or a third party, the third party being in effect, no more than the agent of the merchant from whom the original purchase was made.'

Upon the whole it is respectfully submitted that no valid reason whatever has been shown why parliament should be asked to pass an Act suppressing a business which has been entered into in good faith and carried on honestly and successfully. Parliament is asked to limit the individual capacity to contract, and to prohibit a business in which a large amount of capital has been bona fide invested, and this prohibition is asked in the interest of certain traders who refuse to accommodate themselves to methods which have met with general popular favour. The 30,000 customers in Montreal, and proportionate numbers in other places, wish to continue this method of business which the courts of law have uniformly declared to be untainted by any immorality, and not in any manner subversive of public order.

Yesterday I heard an hon. member say that he wanted to vote for a Bill on account of its innocent appearance. That was the Bill relating to the South Shore Railway to which my hon. friend from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) moved an amendment. One of our friends would not accept that, and wanted to allow the Bill to pass the Senate without amendment because it had an innocent appearance. I suppose this measure has an innocent appearance, coming from the House of Commons. Notwithstanding that innocent appearance the amendment of my hon. friend from de Salaberry was carried, and I rejoiced that it was carried. I voted for it because I had confidence in it. We should give the same justice to the people who have the coupon system as to the trading stamp company. Why make a discrimination? This Bill has not an innocent appearance and the clause that I read shows that it is not as innocent as hon. gentlemen suppose. We should not enact hasty legislation, because we are really interfering with provincial rights, and here in this House we have all the apostles of provincial rights and I am sure all these members will be united and refuse to consent to the measure being passed in its present shape. If the companies which are carrying on the business of trading stamps, which have received from the Department of State the right to do business all over this country, do not comply with the law or with the restrictions that might have been imposed upon it by their letters patent, let the government sue those companies and bring them within the law—put an end to their business, but if these people are doing a legitimate business why should we prevent them from going on with it? If the public interest requires that those companies should be abolished altogether, let the government take the proper proceeding and do it in a legitimate way, compensating them for the loss of the privileges which they have obtained under their letters patent. I know that expropriation is a proceeding which comes in conflict with private rights and that private rights must give way before public necessity. But wherever the state steps in and expropriates the law says they must compensate. That is a sound principle which should not be forgotten in the present arrangement. Have we anything in this law protecting or compensating these people for the rights we take away from them when we make it a crime to sell trading stamps? No, nothing of the kind. I say it is against all the principles of justice. What is liberty? Is it the freedom to do what one pleases? No. The individual owes certain duties to society and the performance of those duties restricts in a certain manner his own freedom. If public interest demands that legislation, I know that private interest must yield to public interest, but if public interest necessitate that legislation why do not the government treat the company the same way they would a private individual when they expropriate his land in the public interest? Why do they not recoup the company? We have issued letters patent giving them permission to use trading stamps. They are acting in a legitimate manner in carrying on the business of trading stamps, and we are going to declare that they are guilty of a crime if they continue the business for which we have given them a charter. They have gone to very heavy expense in their business and should be treated with justice. I have stated that I considered this Bill contained a monstrous clause which made it a criminal offence for a young girl to receive a trading stamp. What has been the argument against that contention? It is said: 'If the Bill becomes law there will not be any more of these sales so that that clause is useless.' Well, if the clause is useless, why not expunge it? I do not think the argument is a very convincing one, or one that will persuade us to withdraw our opposition. I have understood—although I may be under a false impression—that there would be some amendment in committee, and if so, we might come to an understanding? But if the government has decided not to allow any amendment, I do not see the utility of the Senate. Why are we here? Is it to swallow the Bills sent to us from the Commons, or is it to study and endeavour to improve them in the public interest? Are we not entitled to study the measures that come before us in order to ascertain if they are in the public interest. If we have no duty to perform, why does the Senate exist? Is that the reform which was promised by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House when they were in opposition, when they said they would reform the Senate? Did they mean that they would have a Senate which would be disposed to accept every measure presented to them without discussion? If that was the reform anticipated by the hon. gentlemen, what is the meaning of the word reform? Are we simply here to be voting machines to please the government? If the government are greatly interested in this Bill, they must desire to improve it. I say that they are courting suggestions so that it may be improved in order to serve the public interest. I hope the hon. gentleman will confess that the Senate has something more to do than simply accept legislation from the House of Commons without even reading or discussing it, or without improving it if improvement is possible. I thought the government this afternoon would be in a position to give some explanation in regard to the question I raised before the adjournment, in reference to the differences which exist as between the Bill presented to us and the Bill as it came from the Commons, why the amendment that was carried in the Commons was not put in the Bill. We have no explanations at all. I propose this evening to repeat in French the remarks I have been making in the English language and those who do not understand French will be punished for refusing the French language in the Territories, and will have an opportunity of studying the language in those few hours. I see my hon. friend from Mille Iles is quite agreeable to that proposition.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I do not think it would do credit to our language to use it for such a purpose.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the purpose ?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Of talking to no purpose.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not at all. I convinced the hon. gentleman that clause 1 was a bad clause; he admitted that. If I take another day to convince him that the next clause is a bad one, I will have gained my point.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I said it could be discussed in committee. I said that there might be something in the clause, but I did not say more than that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman said he thought there was something in the clause, I should like to know what it is that is bad in the clause—there is something that is against every principle of justice. The hon. gentleman did not say all that he intended, but I am sure that I convinced him that the clause was bad, and he knows that the clause is bad. He will not deny that either in French or English.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I will explain the clause when we go into Committee of the Whole. If the hon. gentleman wants to force me to speak, I will not speak.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is speaking to say that he will not speak. Perhaps when I am speaking in English I do not show all the ugliness of the clause, but when I come to speak in French, before going into Committee of the Whole, I will make myself more clear, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will better understand what I mean. The Bill which is now before us contains another clause, 520b, which reads as follows :

> Any executive officer of a corporation or company guilty of an offence under subsection 2 or subsection 3 of the next preceding section who in any way aids or abets in or counsels or procures the commission of such offence, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to the punishment stated in the said subsections respectively.

That is the punishment which is meted out to any accomplice in the action that is condemned by law. That is the consequence of the provisions of subsections 2 and 3, as enacted before. Then 2 declares :

> This Act shall not apply to any trading stamp issued by a manufacturer or a vendor before the first day of November, 1905.

This Act declares that it is criminal to do such a thing, but it will be criminal only on the 1st day of November. The crime will commence only on the 1st day of November. If I understand the language of the clause the Act shall not apply to any trading stamp issued by a manufacturer or vendor until the 1st of November, but it will apply to other persons. Am I to understand that the manufacturer or vendor of the trading stamps will be permitted to go on with his business up to the 1st day of November ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From my reading of it I drew that interpretation, but it is not for me to interpret it. I understand they have up to the 1st November to sell stamps.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It says this Act shall not apply to any trading stamp—it will not apply to the stamp. Will it apply to the manufacturer or to the vendor ? Will it apply to the person who buys the stamp—the purchaser ? This clause does not exempt the purchaser ; the application is made to the stamp itself. I think the clause should be amended if you want to attain the object you have in view. You do not protect the purchaser. He becomes a criminal. The clause should be amended. In its present form it means nothing, or it means anything; it is a monstrosity. I now come to the memo. submitted on behalf of those who wish to abolish trading stamps. It is as follows:

We beg to submit very briefly to the members of parliament of the Dominion of Canada, the following facts concerning trading stamps:

Why do we ask the Dominion government to pass at the present session a law prohibiting the use of trading stamps, coupons and all similar devices?

Because provincial laws already enacted are being contested before the courts.

Because the trading stamps companies have stated their intention to bring their case to the Privy Council, should they be unsuccessful before Canadian courts. This means one, two or more years delay, during which time they will be permitted to carry on their nefarious business.

Because provincial governments have only the power to impose a fine which is not sufficient.

Because the House of Commons alone has power to amend the Criminal Code.

Because trading stamps and similar devices are based on a theory that proves to be a failure in practice.

Extract from American and English Encyclopedia of Law, volume 28 (second edition), page 443, reads as follows:

'In the district of Columbia it was held that such an enterprise is demoralizing business, and generally illegitimate, and that it is competent for Congress to prohibit same by legislative Act.' Further it is said: 'When the stamps given by the vendor of goods to the purchaser thereof are redeemable in an article or thing which is uncertain, undetermined or unknown to the purchaser of the goods at the time of the purchase, there is present an element of chance which appeals to the gambling instinct and the prohibition of such a transaction is clearly a valid exercise of legislative power.'

New scheme.

As this scheme of trading stamps is somewhat recent in our country, and that no legal books of ours mention its meaning, we beg to quote the definition given by the American and English Encyclopedia, volume 28, page 442, which reads as follows, and which is quite in accordance in theory, at least, with the claim of the trading stamps companies.

What is a trading stamp in theory?

'In the greater number of trading stamp schemes which have been the subject of litigation, it seems that the stamps are sold to the merchants at a certain sum per hundred by a person or corporation whose business it is to furnish them. Only certain merchants, by preconcerted agreement, may purchase these stamps, and in consideration of the purchase thereof it is the duty of the trading stamp company to distribute to the homes of the community books explaining the trading stamp scheme, giving the names of the merchants from whom the stamps may be had, and containing space in which the stamps are to be pasted and thus collected. The merchants give the stamps to their customers in quantities according to the amount of goods purchased, and with the stamps, when a certain number has been collected, the holder may obtain from the trading stamp company his choice of certain articles, to which his number of stamps may entitle him according to the offer previously made.

What are trading stamps in fact, in reality, in practice?

In fact, trading stamps are little squares of coloured paper representing each, ten cents of purchase.

In fact, trading stamps are sold to the retail merchants at the rate of half a cent each, or $5 for a thousand little square papers.

In fact, trading stamps, thus purchased, are given by the retail merchant to the customers with every ten cents of goods purchased.

In fact, trading stamps are redeemable only by the person or company that issue them.

In fact, trading stamps are issued by any persons or companies, whether they have capital or not.

In fact, trading stamps have been and are being issued in quantities amounting to many hundred thousands of dollars.

In fact, trading stamps are paid for by the retail merchants, cash on delivery.

In fact, trading stamps are redeemable only in quantities representing one hundred dollars worth of goods purchased.

In fact, trading stamps as an inducement for the customer to deal for cash only, are a failure. Because retail prices are fixed on a cash basis.

In fact, trading stamps are not an advertising medium, since any one can make use of them, and moreover, the merchant has to advertise that he is giving stamps.

In fact, where is the guarantee to the retail merchant who paid cash for these little square papers, that they will ever be redeemed?

In fact, where is the guarantee that trading stamps will be redeemed, at a value equal to the amount paid for by the retail merchants?

In fact, where is the guarantee to the public, to the gatherers of trading stamps, to the poor families, who must accumulate one hundred dollars worth of them, that they will ever be redeemed?

In fact, where is the guarantee that the companies issuing stamps will be still in a position to redeem them when called upon?

In fact, in case of the companies' bankruptcy would the merchant who distributes those stamps be liable for same as endorser?

In fact, a trading stamp is a device by which the public has but very little for nothing, the trading stamps companies a great deal for nothing, and the retail merchant nothing for his good money.

What is understood by the expression 'trading stamps'?

The expression 'trading stamps' as we understand it, must include, besides those little square papers, any form of cash receipts, coupons or premiums, given or supposed to be given as a gift discount or as an inducement of trade, and which is redeemable.

Our contentions.

Our contentions are not to take away the liberty of the individual, but simply to prevent the speculation on the discounts.

We desire that every merchant be fair and square in his dealing.

We are of opinion that if a merchant can afford to give one, two or five per cent discount to his customers, we would like him to do so in a way that will deceive no one. If he prefers to give a discount under the form of a coupon or cash receipt, we insist that he should put on the face of it, his full address, the actual value thereof, redeemable on demand and only on the premises where the goods were sold.

What necessity is there that a merchant should be compelled to give his customers a ticket or coupon whose value is uncertain, unknown and undetermined, and that the holder of such a ticket should be compelled to run miles and miles to have them redeemed in any kind of goods whose value is also uncertain, unknown and undetermined.

If a purchaser of goods has placed his confidence in his dealer, why should he be directed to a stranger to obtain the value of his discount ?

As we have demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that an urgent need exists, we pray the Dominion parliament to put a law in force at once.

Any further information will be cheerfully given on application by the undersigned.

Taking up the reasons given, let me tell you that the first one is a very fair reason why we should not pass this law. Here is a man vested with certain rights ; he goes to the courts. Some decide against him and some in his favour ; and at the present moment that company is before the Supreme Court and because they have stated their intention to have a final decision in the case given by the Supreme judicial authority, we are told, 'You must not let them do so. You must interfere. You must come in with special legislation that will deprive them of their right to appeal to the highest tribunal of the land.' That is an absurd reason ; no one with common sense will accept that as a good reason.' Then what is the third reason ? Because provincial governments have only the power to impose a fine, which is not sufficient. What is the weight of that reason ? Does it destroy the rights of the company ? It might set forth the insufficiency of the power of the local legislature, but it does not attack in any way the rights of the company or of any company or of any man or individual who might operate under the laws passed by the provincial government or by this government. This is no reason at all. They want you to interfere, to have special legislation, because the provincial government can impose a fine only. What are you doing here by this legislation ? You are imposing a fine of five hundred dollars upon the manufacturer, two hundred dollars upon the vendor and twenty dollars upon the purchaser. If that third reason given by those who submitted that petition to us is a good one what they claim cannot stand. Why refuse to recognize provincial legislation because a fine is imposed, when you are asking for Dominion legislation which enacts a fine also to meet the cases? The fourth reason is that the House of Commons alone has power to amend the criminal code. Well, if the House of Commons has power to enact the criminal code, is that a reason to enact this law ? The House of Commons has power to do many other things. Is that a reason for depriving people of their rights if they have any ? The courts are here. If the company do not comply with the laws of the land, if they do something which is an infringement against the laws of the land, they are amenable; but you tell us that because the Dominion of Canada is the only power to amend the criminal code, we must rob those people of their rights, and enact the monstrous proposition that a child buying one single stamp from any manufacturer is liable to a $20 fine or 15 days imprisonment, not even knowing the law. The answer may be that everybody is supposed to know the law. Yes, everybody is supposed to know the law, but the section which I have read just now from the criminal code surrounds the commission of an offence with such circumstances that it becomes very hard to commit such an offence. The section reads as follows :

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable on indictment or summary conviction before two justices of the peace to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars or three months imprisonment with or without hard labour, who wrongfully, without lawful authority, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing anything which he has a lawful right to do or to do anything from which he has a lawful right to abstain.

All these circumstances must accompany the commission of the crime as defined in section 523. But when you come to section 526 you make a crime of the simple act of receiving a trading stamp from the manufacturer or vendor, without putting in the words, 'who knowingly commits that offence.' The good faith of the person will not prevent the commission of the crime or the punishment thereof ; there is no restriction at all, there is no qualification whatever. Anybody who commits the crime of buying that stamp will be amenable to the courts, may be prosecuted in the criminal courts and may be sentenced to jail or to pay a fine. Then the fifth reason is :

Because trading stamps and similar devices are based on theory that proves to be a failure in practice.

I have cited already decisions given in the United States, in Vermont, Virginia, Massachusetts, and New York showing what the law says on that subject, the judgments of the courts being that there was nothing of a gambling system in it, and that there were no elements of chance. What is the chance ? A man goes into a shop, buys five or six dollars' worth of goods and receives a discount in the form of a trading stamp.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It is not a chance if we are obliged to listen to all those things.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not obliged to listen. He can turn right round and go out. If he considers it beneath his dignity he may retire. I call attention of the Chair to the fact that there is not a quorum in the House.

The SPEAKER—There is a quorum.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, they are coming in now. The trading stamps are simply a device resorted to by tradespeople, in these days of sharp competition, to promote the sale of their goods. It does not differ from any ordinary business except in the method of advertising and in lawful trade inducements. It is true this method of doing business may enable a trader to do more business than he otherwise would, and more than his competitor across the street, who does not choose to incur the expenditure incident to advertising. But this furnishes no reason for prohibiting the business. This memorandum says that those trading stamps are based on a theory which proves to be a failure in practice. In order to prove that it points out that this scheme of trading stamps is somewhat recent in our country, and that no legal books of ours mention its meaning. When the merchants sell their goods they distribute their stamps to the purchasers. The purchasers then go to the place where the stamp company keep their goods, select the goods they prefer, and pay for them with these stamps. If that is the way it is worked out, it does not seem to me that this Bill should be opposed on the ground that trading stamps are based on a theory which appears to be a failure in practice. It is not because it is a failure in practice that we are asked to pass this legislation. It is because it is not a failure that parties who are opposed to it combine and come here asking for this legislation. If it is a failure in practice why is its prohibition asked for ? There are still more reasons given in this memorandum. What are trading stamps in reality, in practice ? This question is put in the memorandum. Trading stamps are little squares of coloured paper, each one representing a 10c. purchase. The memo. says : 'Trading stamps are sold to the retail merchants at the rate of half a cent each, or five dollars for a thousand little square papers.'

These companies have always the articles in stock to redeem those coupons—watches, albums, furniture or anything you like—purchased out of the capital of the company. The assertion that trading stamps are issued by persons in business whether they have capital or not is not a very strong reason. It is not very material whether they have capital or not. Trading stamps have been issued in quantities amounting to many hundred thousand dollars. That may be so, but it simply proves that the business is flourishing. Those stamps are given only when a cash payment is made where the merchandise is sold. Some merchants will allow five per cent off if you pay cash, and some 10 per cent. What is the difference between that discount and giving you a paper which entitles you to the same amount in a present ? I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And this debate will be the first order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I accept that.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till 8 p.m.

THIRD SITTING.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Routine proceedings.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before proceeding with the debate on the important Bill we were discussing at the last sitting, I have a proposition to submit to the government; and I submit it with the hope that it will be accepted so that we may come to an understanding. The proposition is this: to strike out the words in the 2ud clause 'by a manufacturer or vendor,' so that the clause will read:

> This Act shall not apply to any trading stamp issued before the first day of November, 1905.

That would settle the whole question. If the hon. gentleman does not desire that, he might include with the manufacturer and vender the Trading Stamp Company. We want to include the stamp company with the others.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or say this Act shall not take effect until the 1st November.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If this proposition is accepted, the parties will bind themselves in honour not to offer any further opposition in either House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If my hon. friend had accepted the amendment I suggested he would have had a much better clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Wilder, a gentleman deeply interested in this Bill called me aside, and in discussing it I said to him I thought he had up to the 1st November—that sales of stamps up to that time were allowed. He said, 'if that is the case I am quite ready to acquiesce.' 'Well,' I said, 'I am not giving that as a professional opinion. I have read the Bill very carelessly, but according to my reading of section 2, it applies to the stamps rather than the individuals issuing them, and provides that any stamp issued before the 1st November may be redeemed at any time thereafter,' but I said 'you had better consult the Minister of Justice.' He said, 'if that opinion is accepted I am quite content to wind up the business on that basis.' I said, 'you must not accept my opinion as final, because I have not had an opportunity to critically examine the Bill and had nothing to do with the drafting of it.' I do not know whether he has succeeded in seeing the Minister of Justice. Since coming to the Chamber I find there is an eminent counsel here who does not place that interpretation on the Bill. Probably he has given the subject more thought than I have, and therefore I do not pronounce an ex cathedrà opinion upon it. I simply say, without carefully considering it, that I think they have up to the 1st November to sell stamps and that any stamps sold up to that date could be redeemed at any time thereafter. That is my reading, but I am told that it is not the correct interpretation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is because there are such doubts as to the interpretation of this clause that I desire to remove those doubts by striking out the words 'by a manufacturer or vendor,' or by adding the words 'The Trading Stamp Company.' I think that is really the idea of the Bill, but the clause is framed in such a way it is difficult to give it an interpretation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not in a position really to accept such an amendment, because I did not draft the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to have the opinion of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Mr. Beique.) To my mind the object of the clause is that the law shall not take effect until the 1st November. Was that the intention of the government when introducing the Bill, and if so, would it not be well to make it plain and simply say that this Act shall not take effect until the 1st November? From the confidence I have in the ability of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), I have asked his opinion. Does not this give permission to the vendor and the manufacturer to deal in stamps until the 1st November? If it does, then the contention of the gentlemen who are opposing this Bill is met; if it is not and it is not intended to bring the Bill into operation before the 1st November, let it be made plain.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—My reading of the Bill is to this effect: that the word 'vendor' in clause 2, refers to 'vendor' in paragraph (a) of the Bill where you find

> The expression 'trading stamps' includes, besides trading stamps commonly so called, any form of cash receipt, receipt coupons, premium ticket or other device designed or intended to be given to the purchaser of goods by the vendor thereof.

It refers to the vendor of the goods and therefore clause 2 of the Bill is clearly to this effect, that the Bill takes effect as far as the Trading Stamp Company is concerned from the passing of the Bill, but delay is given until 1st November to the vendor of the goods. There are persons who have bought the trading stamps, who have them in stock, and they are allowed until the 1st November to give them to their customers, and their customers can either, before the 1st November or any time after the 1st November, call on any of the parties who have issued trading stamps before the passing of the Bill to redeem them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On reading it again, I quite concur in the opinion expressed by my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If my hon. friend concurs in that opinion, then clause 2 does not apply to the company.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It applies to the company. I think that while the interpretation that has just been given may be put upon it, there is another interpretation to be given, and that is that the vendor in this case is a vendor within the meaning of subsection (c), which is as follows :

The expression 'everyone,' 'vendor,' 'purchaser,' 'merchant,' 'agent,' or 'person' includes any partnership or company or body corporate.

And therefore it would read this way :

This Act shall not apply to any trading stamp issued by a manufacturer or any partnership company or body corporate, &c.

If that interpretation is put upon it, which I think may fairly be done, it does not make much difference one way or the other, as to what we are here considering. It may make a difference to Mr. Wilder whether he can continue his business from now to November or not. That is a matter on which he must take his risk, but it protects everybody else. I think it protects Mr. Wilder or the company, though I do not wish to be bound by that opinion, because I have not considered it more than casually. I think it is open to the two interpretations. It certainly is open to the interpretation put upon it, that everybody but the trading company can use the stamps up to the 1st November, but that after that they cannot be used by anybody. It may mean that the Trading Stamp Company may go on using them. The difficulty is just this, the Bill cannot go back with an amendment. We have to dispose of it and send it back without alteration. If we return it with an amendment the debate might go on there as it has gone on here. The Trading Stamp Company can take their chances, as to whether they should issue more stamps in the meantime, but the holder of the stamps can in the meantime use them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that the Bill be allowed to receive its second reading and be referred to committee. Then on reaching that clause give time to the Secretary of State to consult, as he intimated he would, the Minister of Justice upon that point. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Landry) is afraid that it will prevent him from completing his speech, which he says is not half finished yet. I have suggested to him that if an amendment is not made to read so that it is clearly and distinctly understood, he has the right and privilege to go on with his elaborate argument afterwards. It is quite evident from the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State, who has been practising law for more than half a century, that he differs from the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) and the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) whose interpretation is somewhat in the line of mine. Surely the government should word it in such a way as to make it possible to understand it, in order to avoid difficulty and lawsuits in the future. If the hon. gentleman will accept that suggestion, we may go on and complete the other business of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would not be in a position to make promises as to what may be done at the third reading. All I can say is that I will consult the Minister of Justice and the Premier about it and see if they are disposed to make any such arrangement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I ask is, would you consent to go into committee, pass the Bill up to that clause and let that stand until you can consult the Minister of Justice ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I find that all the discussion and the different opinions expressed with reference to this Bill, leave me no option in the way of making suggestions as to a compromise. That would be absolutely impossible. I am not in a position to do it. There are various interpretations placed on the Bill, and I am not now in a position to say what interpretation is correct. Those who are behind the Bill and are most interested in doing away with the selling of stamps, put the liberal interpretation upon it. I put the question, 'Are you willing, as far as you can control, to accept that interpretation ?' and they said they were.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What interpretation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The interpretation that the Bill would not be operative in any sense until the 1st November. They put that view upon it. I, of course, do not concur in the opinion that they are right. However, they say they are willing to act in that spirit. If they are, no harm will be done. Mr. Wilder would be quite satisfied if he had a margin up to the 1st November, but I could give him no assurance ; nor can I make any change in the Bill that would make that more definite and positive. There is another objection to its going back to the House of Commons, for reasons which I need not here explain.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If the parties are practically agreed upon that point it appears to me the Bill might go through without alteration. If the hon. Secretary of State representing that side of the House, and the leader of the opposition representing this side of the House, should both express the opinion that that is what the Bill meant, showing on the records of this parliament what the intention of parliament was in passing this Bill, it appears to me that the courts would interpret it according to what was the plain intention expressed by the leaders of the House in passing the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would not like to state professionally that that would be my absolute opinion. What I would say is the persons who are endeavouring to have the system done away with, those who are behind this Bill—they are represented here by important members, manufacturers and merchant associations—say that is the view they are willing to act upon, that practically the Bill will be inoperative until the 1st November. All I can say is I should hope that they would adopt that interpretation, as they profess to be willing to do now. Of course we are not controlling them, but I presume it is the best that can be done under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Is not the English language clear enough to frame a clause to express that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not frame this Bill. We have to deal with it as it is, unfortunately. Circumstances are such that we cannot make changes in it.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—A gentleman who is a member of the House of Commons, and who represented the parties in Montreal and has had more to do with it than anyone else, says that the interpretation stated is the interpretation he puts on the Bill, that in no respect is it to be operative before the 1st November.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would advise my hon. friend to accept that statement, with the statement of the hon. Secretary of State, that the Bill is not to become operative in any respect until the 1st November, and let it go on record, and in case any difficulty should arise in the courts, that could be pleaded as a justification for the course the parties were pursuing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understood my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) aright, the explanation he gave a moment ago was the explanation he was authorized to give by Mr. Gervais, one of the members from Montreal, and that is the interpretation which Mr Gervais himself puts on the Bill. I heard the hon. gentleman say so in the presence of Mr. Gervais, who is just behind the curtain, and the Hon. Mr. Gervais nodded his head to signify that it was the interpretation. I want the hon. gentleman to say that he was authorized to give that interpretation to the clause—that it would not be in operation before the 1st November. Is that it ?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I was authorized by the gentleman just mentioned to make the statement

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Mr. Gervais himself told me that the intention of the Bill was that it should not be in operation before the 1st November.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have just spoken to that hon. gentleman, and he assures me that that is not only their interpretation of the law, but that he on behalf of those who are promoting the Bill will act in accordance with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am very glad that this agreement has been made in the interest of the parties, but I am very sorry for the House, because you are depriving yourselves of the most valuable part of my speech.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On subclause 4 of clause 1,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that this clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not in a position to agree to striking it out. There is a great difference of opinion about it, and I am told the House of Commons would dissent from it. It was first taken from a Bill Mr. Guthrie introduced.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is clause 3. I am speaking of subclause 4 of clause 1.

The clause was adopted,

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This clause was not part of the original Bill. I consulted the Minister and he tells me that it was not intended that this should form part of the Bill. It was added in the Commons, but the Justice Department has no desire to adhere to it and is willing that it should be struck out. I am in favour of the trading stamp law but I am opposed to tacking on to the end of the Bill a provision of this kind. An understanding has been arrived at that this clause should be dropped.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It would jeopardize this Bill to adopt your amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I understood no amendment could be made to this Bill. Although this clause was improperly inserted in the Bill, it has received the sanction of the House of Commons and it might jeopardize the Bill if we struck it out because it would have to be referred back to the Commons for reconsideration and the matter would be opened up again in the House of Commons, which we want to avoid. If any injustice results it will be easy to remedy it next session.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. We should not make any alteration in the Bill, but let it go. I suggest that we amend our rules and provide that from four days previous to prorogation the Senate shall have no right whatever to amend any Bill which comes before it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the opinion of most lawyers this clause is not necessary, because the theory of the law is that the choice of being tried summarily or by a jury rests with the accused and not with the court. I do not think it was necessary to include the provision in the Bill, but inasmuch as it has been put in, if we were to strike it out it would leave the impression that the accused had not the right, and I think it would be undesirable to expunge it. This is aimed at a certain class of offenders; they are not a class I have very much sympathy with, but the right to be tried by his fellows is supposed to be one of the inalienable rights of a British subject, and I do not think this House should do anything to put that right in doubt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I take objection to the reasons advanced for not amending the Bill. If the doctrine which has been propounded just now in reference to amending a Bill and considering a Bill in this House is to be the rule, the sooner we adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from Stadacona the better. If the principle is that when Bills are brought from the House of Commons, even at this late stage of the session, we are to be told that we cannot make any amendment or even suggest an amendment, because it might jeopardize the Bill if it has to go back to the Commons, that is tantamount to an abrogation of our functions in toto. That is really the position in which the gentleman who takes this ground places the Senate. The general principle of being tried by jury in serious matters is no doubt a correct one. It is the inalienable right of a British subject to be tried by his peers, but there is no man in this House or in the country who knows better than the hon. gentleman from Halifax that there are scores of offences—I was going to say crimes—committed that are dealt with exclusively and entirely in a summary manner by a magistrate ; and the only question at issue, if we are to argue this question, is as to whether the offences to which this amendment would apply are among those which should be dealt with summarily by a magistrate. If we adopt the broad principle laid down by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, you must readjust and amend all the clauses of the Criminal Code. We all know that for ordinary offences a man appears before a magistrate who disposes of the case. In many other cases a little more serious the police magistrate, who as a rule is an experienced lawyer—I am speaking of the province of Ontario just now—deals with the question. I do not want to be offensive, but it strikes me as utterly absurd to lay down the broad principle proposed in this clause. It is a repetition of what took place during the last session, of tacking on the bank Bill an amendment to the Criminal Code. The clause is just as irrelevant to the Bill which we are considering as one thing possibly can be irrelevant to an other. I do not think there is any doubt that, and I certainly understood the hon. Secretary of State was inclined to that view, and was willing to drop this clause. I have not the slightest fear or apprehension that if you drop the clause and the measure is sent back to the Commons, they are going to reject the Bill altogether. The feeling is too strong in that House in favour of the Bill to adopt such a proceeding, and lose all that the merchants and others who are demanding the Bill expect to obtain by it. I am quite sure if that was struck out the Bill would be passed, and that would be an end of it. I would say that if they refused to pass the Bill as amended, and it came back immediately with that proposition, I would be ready to say at once, 'Well, as the Commons refuse to accept it, the Senate had better recede from their amendment.' I merely throw out that suggestion in case the difficulty should arise.

Mr. McHUGH—I spoke for a few minutes on this question last night, and made the statement that it was in order to make the Criminal Code clear that this amendment was made. As that was simply the opinion of a layman, I am glad to see that it was backed up by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. In these cases the judges hold that the accused has the right to select what court he shall go before, but there are some police officers in this country who are not lawyers, and who have taken upon themselves to say that the magistrate trying the case has a right to decide for the accused. I think we ought to make the law clear. The crimes for which these penalties are imposed, come under the Conspiracy and Protection Act passed in England in 1875. Hon. gentlemen will find it is a copy of a provision in that Act, which was an enlargement of the Labour Union Act of that country. The offences are under clause 7 of that Act, and I say it is only making the law we have to-day clear, that there may be but one opinion upon it when any person is on trial for any crime of the nature mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—To my mind this clause is in the right direction. As the law stands on the statute-book, the option is given to the accused to ask for a summary trial, and my only regret is that the principle of this law is not made more general. It would tend to reduce the cost of administration of justice because it would tend to avoid trial by jury, which is very expensive. The law should facilitate matters where the prisoner is willing to be tried in a summary manner ; as a rule they would rather be tried by a judge who has a legal training, than go before a jury. Last session I prepared a Bill to extend that principle to a number of cases as far as it could be extended, but my suggestion was not favourably received. I am therefore altogether in favour of the principle which is embodied in this section, and I propose next year to make the attempt again of suggesting the application of the principle to other cases. I desire to add one word in answer to what the hon. leader of the opposition has said. As far as I am concerned, when I make up my mind to accept this Bill as it comes before us, it is not because I am satisfied altogether with the drafting of the Bill. I am not satisfied with the wording, I am satisfied with the principle embodied in the Bill and I believe that the principle is supported by the country at large. The people demand the immediate passage of this Bill, and if it has not been put in more appropriate language, and if it has been enacted in the House of Commons at this late day in the session, that is not our fault nor the fault of the promoters of the Bill. It is due to a number of circumstances which we cannot control, and which the government themselves were unable to control. This, to my mind, is complete justification for my supporting the Bill in the form in which it appears, in order that all parties dealing in these stamps may have proper warning. If they go on with that kind of business they will do it at their risk and peril. If the Bill proves to be defective, then parliament next session will see that the arm of the law is made long enough to reach the guilty party.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. leader of the opposition is a little astray in regard to the right of the accused to elect by what tribunal he shall be tried. There is scarcely a case where the prisoner has not the right to be tried by a judge if he wishes. There are only two cases where a man has not the option to be tried by a judge, and those cases are treason and murder. In charges of forgery, violence, or incendiarism, the party has a right to be tried before a jury. Those are the facts, and my experience in that matter has been quite extensive. I have been informed by the gentleman who is the father of the Bill, and who deserves a great deal of credit for the way he has managed it, that it would be a dangerous thing to accept the amendment, and he would not be agreeable to it, nor would it be agreeable to the Commons to consider it now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, and also the hon. leader of the opposition, indicated that this clause was tacked on and did not really form part of the Bill, but if hon gentlemen look at the title of the Bill, they will see that it is an Act in amendment of the Criminal Code. Under that title this clause comes in very appropriately.

The motion was declared lost.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

INSPECTION OF WATER METERS ACT.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (188) An Act respecting the inspection of water meters.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a curious thing that the government should take hold of this matter. Should it not be dealt with by the municipality?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. It is placing the matter under the control of the Inland Revenue, the same as the inspection of gas is under the Inland Revenue Department.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I wish to strike out this clause and insert a clause which I have prepared.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I oppose that amendment because it is going to jeopardize the Bill and it will not be accepted in the House of Commons. By amending the Bill we are inaugurating a new policy. It is an outrage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The city of Winnipeg asked for some changes in the Bill, and the measure will have to take its chances in the other House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this Bill permit the government to appoint employees of the Department of Inland Revenue as inspectors of meters under the Act without examination ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume they must be examined. The object is to inspect the meter and see that it is kept in order.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read a third time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to compliment the Senate on the thought and study they have bestowed on this scientific Bill. I am sure there can be no errors in it after what has occurred in the Senate; and it is a matter for congratulation that we have devoted so much attention and thought to this matter. Let us hope that all Bills that come before us in future will receive the same thought and consideration, and if so it will not be necessary to make any amendments for ten years to come.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (66), An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, with respect to appeals from certain summary convictions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of this Bill is to give an appeal in Ontario to the Division Court instead of to the General Sessions of the Peace in all cases under the Summary Convictions Act except 'when the conviction adjudges imprisonment only.' This is done by clause 1 of the Bill. The other clauses of the Bill merely make changes in the procedure which are necessitated by this provision of clause 1. For instance, clause 2 makes special provision for the district of Nipissing, where the appeal is to be to the nearest division court in the county of Renfrew. Clause 3 makes the necessary provision as to notice, and clause 4 makes provision as to bail.

The change proposed has been advocated strongly for some time past by Judge Fraleck of Hastings and others, and it undoubtedly will result in a great simplification and cheapening of appeals in the cases to which it applies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Probably the Bill is all right.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I am very much afraid that if this Bill becomes law it will seriously interfere with the duties devolving upon police magistrates and magistrates generally. In trivial cases where a man is brought before a magistrate and tried summarily, if he is not satisfied he has an appeal to the county judge, and the result will be that magistrates will refuse to try cases at all if their decisions are to be reviewed and all the witnesses have to be brought back and examined again. I am afraid it will interfere with litigation.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was read a third time and passed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (202) An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is there any alteration in the reference to the 15 days' grace ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it still continues.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to ask the Secretary of State what the position of the leader of the opposition would be. He is to get a salary. Will he have to resign his seat and be elected again ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he receives an addition to his indemnity.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (de la Vallière) reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (205), An Act to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad the British Columbia judges have been remembered at last. I have been pressing the matter for years and years. I think the governor of that province should have his salary increased to ten thousand dollars, but I am very glad the judges' salaries have been raised. The salaries of the judges in Quebec and other parts of the country were raised, and now they receive a nice salary. I congratulate the government on the action they have taken in this matter.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is a great deal of difference in those salaries. There is no judge in Quebec receiving less than $5,000. There are 84 judges in Ontario and 43 in Quebec. The amounts are $291,000 for Ontario and $261,000 for Quebec. If you strike an average it would realize about $6,000 for a Quebec judge and $3,000 for an Ontario judge.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—We have no county judges in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That makes a difference. I do not know what the examinations may be. I do not say it is wrong, but a great discrepancy exists. Our judge has been clamouring of late, and that is the only reason I am speaking of the matter to show that I had his case in mind. The salary of our county court judges is $2,500; after a certain number of years it is raised to $3,000. I do not know that they can go above that, and it is hardly fair. I do not think there is that difference in the examinations nor that difference in the standing which should cause this great discrepancy to exist. I do not know whether there is any means of overcoming this difficulty, or whether it would be necessary to cut down the number of judges in Ontario. I presume the law is much the same in both provinces, with the exception of the city of Quebec. Whether that assumes to require a greater degree of intellect or a more profound knowledge of law I cannot tell you, but as they appear to the ordinary layman I could not see any preponderating difference which would make a difference of even $100. Although I make these remarks I would also mention the high opinion I entertain of the judges of Quebec. But I say this discrepancy exists and it is a great discrepancy, and should be remedied if possible. I am speaking on behalf of our judges, who are unsurpassed by any judges for learning and devotion, and no one has laid any complaint against them. I regret that no Ontario lawyer, or gentleman connected with the judiciary is here to lay the case before the Senate. Of course there is no use in my speaking, but I put my views on record as a layman, knowing the judges of both provinces. I do not criticise any of the other provisions, but it is a pity that a measure expending half a million dollars annually should not be scrutinized with more care and a stronger desire to arrive at a conclusion which would equalize the salaries of the judiciary according to their legal and general qualifications.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no advantage in continuing the discussion to-night, but there is a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman says with reference to the payment of judges and the relative position of judge in Quebec and our county court judges in Ontario. There are many Superior Court judges in Quebec occupying positions not so responsible, and whose duties are not as great as the county court judges in Ontario. We discussed the matter fully at a former session of parliament, when it was shown that really many judges in the province of Quebec, owing to the system that prevails there, have comparatively little or nothing to do, and they receive their salaries on account of the position they hold, being Superior Court judges. Take the county of York: we have a senior and a junior judge. There is a riding of 120 or 130 miles long, and 30 miles wide. However the litigation, owing to the prosperous state of the country, is not as great as formerly. When I spoke of the prosperous state of the country my hon. friend smiled and nodded his head with approval. I think I could tell him why it was prospering, and if I did I would tell him it is not owing to the policy he or his government is pursuing. There is no objection to our expressing opinion in this matter although we could not make a change if we desire to do so.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—In York county the judge begins at a salary of $2,900. Are all judges restricted as to outside duties ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that provision will apply to all. They will have to resign the chairmanship of insurance companies or any other position of that kind.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1897, ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (190) An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1897.

He said : A few changes were made in the tariff during the present session. The first one refers to wine. We receive very few articles from South Africa, while they give us a preference. In giving them a preference in return they suggested that probably the only article they would send us would be wine, and their wine was a little stronger than the wines of France, and they are allowed to run up as high as 40 per cent of spirit in proof.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is a great deal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then the next item is a reference to rolled oats. There is a slight change in the duty on dry white lead, and there is some provision in regard to the importation of Portland cement. The changes are very minor.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—Is it not against the provisions of the Scott Act to give a preference to strong wines ? It would not affect me very much because I do not drink wine.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,

8a. Wines of all kinds, except sparkling wines, containing not more than forty per cent of spirit of the strength of proof, whether imported in wood or in bottles (six quart or twelve pint bottles to be held to contain a gallon), when the produce or manufacture of any British colony or territory in the South African Customs Union Convention, twenty-five cents per gallon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it not strange that the wine from the colonies of South Africa should be put on a better footing than the wines from other British colonies. The reason given seems to me an extraordinary one and can hardly be in the interest of the teetotaller. The Secretary of State tells the committee that the wines of South Africa are stronger than the light wines from the Rhine or from France, and in order to create a trade in South Africa strong wines they reduced the duty upon them by increasing the strength. Now can the hon. Secretary of State tell me why the wines of Australia are not placed in the same position as South African wines?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because Australia has not given us the preference. It is open to Australia to get the same advantage by giving us the same advantage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are not dealing with the question of preference at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—South Africa gives us a preference. They are buying a great deal from us and we wanted to give them some advantage. They said, we can send nothing to Canada that we know of except wine, and our wines are stronger than those that are now on the customs tariff, 25 or 30 per cent of spirit. They wanted the wines further up, to 80 per cent of spirit. As they said, they were giving us considerable advantage in their market and we are selling a good deal in South Africa now, we thought we should give them this preference. It will make a good appearance and we are not likely to take much from them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is an admirable argument. We are told by the hon. Secretary of State that they adopt this policy because it has a good appearance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was the only article they were likely to send us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not find fault with any change in the tariff which will cultivate trade with our own colonies, but if my opinion is of any value, the Australian wines are of much better quality than the South African wines. I remember the late Cecil Rhodes, when he was in London, speaking of this question and advising the use of light French wines, because the South African wines were not fit to drink. The wines of Australia were quite to the contrary. We have imported a large quantity of light wines from Australia. They have been used here at the club, and judges of wines pronounce them good. I have Australian wines in my cellar that I bought nine years ago, and Sir Julian Pauncefote, when lunching with me here, said the Australian hock was equal to the best European hock. I mention that to show that in our dealing with our colonies we should be as liberal as possible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt of that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I approve of any policy which will increase the trade with other portions of the empire, and I hope the government will go still further with that policy. Why is the duty increased on rolled oats? It is a protective policy, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is all right.

On items 3 and 4 :

3. Item 158 in the said schedule is amended by striking out the words 'white and'

4. The following items are inserted in the said schedule immediately after item 158:—

'158*a*. Dry white lead, thirty per cent ad valorem.

'158*b*. White lead ground in oil, thirty-five per cent ad valorem.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—These clauses affirm strongly the principle of protection and come admirably from a free trade government. Of course they meet with my warm approval.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Ever since the late government was in power, and long before, the duty on white lead, of which there was none made in Canada was 5 per cent—a mere nominal duty. The duty on pig lead, the raw product from which white lead is made, was 15 per cent. This was a very serious and inconsistent condition of the tariff. Due to the bounty given by this government for the protection of lead ores in British Columbia, we are now producing probably twenty thousand tons of pig lead per annum; and up to the present time, notwithstanding this very large product of pig lead, the white lead which is the lead for paints, has been imported from the United States subject to a duty of 5 per cent, whereas the raw product for making that white lead was subject to a duty of 15 per cent. This was an inconsistency in the tariff, and the government thought it was only proper to adjust the anomaly by increasing the duty on white lead. My hon. friend will be glad to know that the policy of the government including a bounty on lead has not only revived the lead idustry of British Columbia, but has been the means of establishing a large corroding works in the city of Montreal where all the white lead used in paints in Canada, some 6,000 or 8,000 tons per annum, will in the future be manufactured. This industry was established by the manufacturers of white lead with the tariff as it stands, but they certainly expected that the duty on leads would be made consistent with the duty on other imported articles, which has been done.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Could the hon. gentleman inform us whether the paints which are made in this way are sold as low in the market as the imported paints, and if the quality is as good ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The paints will be made from lead manfactured in the country. I believe the very best white lead in the world will be made from the lead of British Columbia in the city of Montreal, and that in the future the paints made from Canadian lead will be much better than the lead paints sold in the past. There has been no change in duty in the case of mixed paints. The manufacturers of mixed paints do not ask for or insist upon any higher tariff in respect of their product.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If the facts are as stated, I understand the effect of this change will be to enable the Canadian manufacturers to produce an article quite equal to the imported article, and at as low a price, which is certainly another instance of the advantage of protective duties in fostering and encouraging native industries of this kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must express my very great pleasure at hearing the protective speech made by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia an erstwhile free-trader. I was aware, from reading the reasons given by the Finance Minister, why this change was made, and I was going to ask the question whether the duty on paints manufactured in this country, the groundwork for which is white lead, is sufficiently high to enable the trade to continue to manufacture paints. I presume it will be for this reason—the only reason, I think, that can be given—the duty on paints is 35 per cent. The argument we have always used in favour of protective duty has been that unless white lead is produced in Canada trough the protection which is given it, the manufacturers have to use the imported article, and it would be a disadvantage to them if the paint does not bear a higher duty than the white lead. It will have this effect, I am satisfied : the white lead manufactured in Canada will be of a superior quality, being unadulterated, to that which is imported, and consequently even if it costs the consumer a little more it will be cheaper in the long run. I again congratulate the government as having become as strongly protectionist as we were, and a little stronger. Our policy was to put a low duty on white lead in order that the manufacturers of articles produced from white lead might produce it as cheaply as possible. Now you have given a high bounty on this article, adopting a policy which you condemned strongly when you were in opposition. In addition to that, you increased the duty, giving them a combination of protection in the way of bounties and duties. So long as it has for its object the development of the industry it has my most hearty approval, though I do not often agree with the government.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—If it is any gratification to my hon. friend from Belleville. I will reiterate the statement I have so often made, that I am absolutely opposed to all protective duties.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman vote against the Bill ?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—If my hon. friend will move against it, I will support him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not fair. My hon. friend who is a protectionist cannot be expected to move a free trade motion in order that the hon. gentleman who is a free trader might support it. If he wants to put his views on record he should move himself, but I find that while he always speaks from conviction, he votes for the policy he condemns.

On the 5th clause,

187. Cement, Portland and hydraulic or water lime, in barrels or casks, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty, twelve and one-half cents per one hundred pounds ; in bags, twelve and one-half cents per one hundred pounds together with twenty-five per cent ad valorem on the bag.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The change is this ; the bags were coming free and it was found that it was giving a preference to cement coming from the United States over cement coming from Great Britain or Belgium, and therefore it was thought only fair to put a duty on the bag.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It is something like the duty the United States placed on the cans containing lobsters.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a step in the direction of a protection to the bag manufacturers in this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We thought the Yankees ought not to have an advantage over the Belgians and the Englishmen. The cement comes in bags from the United States and in barrels from Europe.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the barrel, being the package, is not dutiable ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then this is a protection to the bag manufacturers. Will the hon. gentleman tell me whether the barrel which contains the cement is included in the weight on which duty is charged, or whether it is the cement alone ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The package is included. As the law stands it is all to the advantage of the manufacturer in the United States, and it was to equalize it that the change was made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the actual practical effect of this change is to make cement imported from the United States cost the consumer in this country considerably more. The duty on bags comes to something very considerable.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—All protection does that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a departure from the general principle of adding duty on the weight of the article. The old law was that the packages were made dutiable, and that was repealed by Sir Leonard Tilley or Mr. Foster. Now you calculate the weight of the barrel or cask with the cement for duty and then you put a duty on the bags, and put on a duty of 12½ cents per hundred pounds together with 25 per cent ad valorem on the bags. This is a departure from the principle advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite in the past. They always condemned specific duties as being monstrous in character; I always supported them. Now, in addition to weighing the material contained in the bag they have to ascertain the value of the bag. You will give a great deal of trouble to the customs officials, and I am quite satisfied there will be plenty of trouble over the value of the bags. It would have been much better to have thrown the bag and the cement into the scale and charged a duty on the whole. However, I am not objecting; I am only explaining what the effect will be.

On the 6th clause,

455. Settlers' effects, viz.:—Wearing apparel, books, usual and reasonable household, furniture and other household effects; instruments and tools of trade, occupation or employment, guns, musical instruments, domestic sewing machines, typewriters, bicycles, carts, wagons and other highway vehicles, agricultural implements and live stock for the farm, not to include live stock or articles for sale, or for use as a contractor's outfit, nor vehicles nor implements moved by mechanical power, nor machinery for use in any manufacturing establishment; all the foregoing if actually owned abroad by the settler for at least six months before his removal to Canada and subject to regulations by the Minister of Customs: Provided that any dutiable articles entered as settlers' effects may not be so entered unless brought by the settler on his first arrival, and shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of without payment of duty until after twelve months actual use in Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the change?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The change is the introduction of this sentence:

All the foregoing if actually owned abroad by the settler for at least six months before his removal to Canada.

Why should a settler be obliged to own the article for six months before he removes here? If he chooses, two or three months before coming, to purchase certain effects such as are mentioned here, why should he have to pay duty on them? Supposing he buys a suit of clothes, under this amendment, if he bought it three months before coming to Canada, he would have to pay duty on it. I think it is highly objectionable.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—It is to prove that the articles have been in use. If you are going to reduce the time, they might buy new articles that had not been in use at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. member from Halifax would look at the very first words of the clause, he would see that it includes wearing apparel, consequently if he bought clothing before removing here, he would not be asked about it. The provision making the time six months is a very wise one if you carry out the principle of protection. Under the old law the policy of a term of ownership only extended to certain articles. My hon. friend who was collector of customs will recollect that—pianos and such articles as that. Unless that provision was made, a a person might buy a piano and enter it as effects, and evade the duty in that way. The six months' prohibition is a still greater protection in one respect, and more liberal in another.

On the 9th clause,

9. Section 18 of the said chapter 11 of the statutes of 1904 is amended by inserting, after the word 'production' in the fourth line, the words 'or from any British country.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The object of this clause I believe is to cultivate a trade with Newfoundland in the article of molasses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the old Act molasses could be entered at a certain rate of duty when imported directly from the country of production. This extends the clause and gives the same rights and privileges to the importer of molasses if it is brought from the country of production to Newfoundland and from Newfoundland imported into Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to see this policy. I have given a good deal of thought to that Newfoundland question and I wish to express my approval of the course that has been pursued, although I do not think the authorities of Newfoundland deserve any consideration. They have in every way possible frustrated trade with Canada, and no man knows that better than the hon. gentleman opposite to me (Mr. Ross, C.B.) from his experience while he was Collector of Customs at Halifax. From communications that have been exchanged with these gentlemen we have always experienced the same difficutly in trying to open up trade with them. In fact they went so far as to demand and collect duties in Canadian territory up the Labrador Straits, and were not satisfied until we built them lighthouses in their territory, because they refused to do it, in order to assist navigation. So far as my experience goes they have acted towards Canada in every respect in anything but a friendly spirit. If we can cultivate their trade and get them to have a better opinion of Canada, I shall be very glad.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN, from the Committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading (Bill 206) An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1905, and the 30th June, 1906.

He said: It is usual simply to give a resume of the figures, and I am glad to have an opportunity of stating exactly what the Supply Bill contains. For this year on Consolidated Revenue Account the first estimate was $58,000,000; the next $8,000,000 and the last $294,000, making a total of over $67,000,000. On capital account, in the three estimates the total was $15,000,000, making altogether $82,000,000, the total amount voted by parliament. That would be in excess of last year's vote. I will just give the figures: Increase on consolidated revenue account, $5,000,000; on capital account, $2.000.000; making altogether an increase on capital and consolidated revenue account of $7,900,000. Of course the amounts are never wholly spent. There is always a considerable amount left over for public works not carried on and other items.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But on the other hand there are supplementary estimates for last year. This year we have voted in that way $3,547,000. That is not included in the estimate of the hon. gentleman; and it was not in the estimates of last year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume it was. This is made up by the Finance Department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is useless to discuss this question, and I do not purpose doing so further than to call attention to the increased expenditure of the country. The answer to that has always been that it is a growing time. If there is any evidence of the growth of this country presented to its people that is more convincing than another it is the advance of about 50 per cent in the expenditure, including capital, in the last nine years. The hon. gentleman and the late Minister of Finance, Sir Richard Cartwright, were horrified at our extravagance. They used to go through the country telling the people that they were ground to death by taxation. The Premier and the late Mr. Mills told the people of Ontario that if they came into power they would reduce the expenditure by three to four million dollars per annum, that so extravagant were the old Tories that they were ruining the country. We have evidence in the estimates before us of the manner in which those promises have been carried out. I do not intend to deal with that subject any further, no possible good can result from it; but there is one point to which I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I remember hearing his sonorous voice sounding for hours in the House of Commons in condemnation of violations of the Civil Service Act. I ask him to look at the last supplementary estimates presented to us, and observe that in nearly every item in which an increase of salary is proposed to be paid to the civil service, these convenient words are used, 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary.' Has the hon. gentleman changed his opinions on that subject? It would be much better to repeal the Civil Service Act altogetner than to continually violate it in this way. My experience has been that applications for positions in the Civil Service are as numerous as blackberries in June, and the applicants are quite willing to come in at any rate which will secure a situation, but after their appointment they never cease using all the influence they can bring to bear on the government to increase their salaries.

There are men in the civil service who can scarcely be paid too highly for their services. Their ability, their talent, their assiduity in the performance of their duties, and the interest they take in the management of their departments, make them invaluable; but there are many who come as late as possible in the morning, and go away at the earliest possible moment in the afternoon, and howl from January to December for an increase in salary. The object of the Civil Sevice Act was to prevent these constant increases of salaries, until civil servants had earned an increase by attention to their work. I admit there are cases in which men have proved themselves invaluable in the positions they held and who deserve recognition, and this is the only way to get over the Act, but these violations have become so numerous that it renders the Act valueless. It renders the Act which was placed on the statute book for the purpose of regulating the salaries and protecting the ministers against constant applications, of no effect. However, the House of Commons having affirmed this, we must accept it; whether it will ever be remedied or not I do not know. Certainly no one can expect a reform until the government changes, and the sooner that is done in this respect the better for the country.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—In his own experience, has not the hon. gentleman found in the custom houses officers who never passed the Civil Service Act, who are as competent for their work as if they had done so?

Hon, Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have, but that is not the point I was discussing. I was speaking of the restriction placed on the government in the advancing of salaries. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that there are many men in the customs service designated preventive officers who do not require any examination. It may be an indirect evasion of the Act, but many a man has been appointed a preventive officer in the manner indicated by the hon. gentleman and been found very valuable, who could not have passed an examination.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I admit that the Civil Service Act should be recast. My hon. friend will no doubt remember that during the incumbency of the government of which my hon. friend was a distinguished member, no less than two commissions were appointed to investigate and report upon the best method of securing an efficient civil service staff both in the inside and outside service. After an extended investigation a report was handed in, and I regret to say that the government never carried out a single recommendation of that commission. Had the government adopted the recommendation that was submitted, we would have got over the difficulty that is here set out, increasing salaries notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act. Hon. gentlemen during their incumbency continuously violated the law, and I admit I found fault. I drew attention to the reports of the several commissions recommending that the civil service should be placed under the control of a Board to be appointed, including heads of departments, with power to arrange with regard to salaries and everything connected with the service. That recommendation was never carried out, although there was a great deal of money spent upon that commission. The hon. gentleman did the very thing the present government are doing,—granted increases in violation of the civil service law. I should like to see that Act recast so that the civil service could be dealt with on equitable terms, recognizing able and efficient service, and also recognizing cases where very large salaries are paid to some servants who do not render ten cents of labour for every dollar they draw. I should like to see those things adjusted. I hope the government will undertake to recast the Civil Service Act and put it upon a proper basis under a Board of Commissioners so that efficiency will be recognized. I have not the slightest doubt that very great improvements can be made in the civil service.

With regard to my attitude in the past when I challenged expenditure in the House of Commons, I admit that I tried to discharge my duty in that respect. The reason I found fault with the increasing expenditure in those days was that we were expending every year more than the revenue of the country and building up a public debt. We have a very different position of things now. We have a respectable surplus, the government have plenty of money and it is their duty in proportion to the revenue of the country to provide for the public necessities. When a man's income increases he can always find a means of laying it out to improve his own comfort and the comfort of his family; and it is the same with national matters. The condition of the country is very prosperous, the revenue is buoyant and increasing every year. It is not the duty of the government to gather taxes from the people and hoard it up in the treasury. It is their duty to provide for the necessary services of the country. No country on the face of the earth has developed more rapidly in a desirable direction than Canada in the last ten years. I hope it will continue to develop in that way, and as long as the government spend the money prudently in the development of the country it will be well spent.

Another point my hon. friend referred to is the fact that many civil servants are no sooner appointed than they begin to demand increases of salary. That is unfortunate, and I should like to see a law in the statute-book to provide that every one in the Civil service must depend entirely on the recommendation of the deputy head for increases, instead of writing to members of parliament and to friends worrying and teasing all his relations to make demands in his favour for an increase of salary. All that should be abolished, and we should have a law prohibiting any civil servant from exercising any influence whatever to secure an increase. Every man should be given to understand that he must depend upon his own personal record in the department, and that he would get only the advancement to which he is entitled. Every minister is bothered with letters from all directions urging and pleading for increases to the clerks in his department. It must take up half a minister's time answering such letters. I should like to see all that abolished and every civil servant required to depend on his own efficiency and the recommendation of the deputy head for promotion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The winding up of my hon. friend's speech is admirable. He does not seem to know that those are the regulations which are supposed to govern the civil service in Ottawa at the present time. They were framed by the Treasury Board and were adopted by Order in Council, and have existed for years and years. They may continue to exist for the next fifty years, so long as departures from the law continue such as those to which I have called attention. All a minister has to do when he is asked to make an appointment of an unqualified person, is to say, 'you have not passed the examination, and you cannot get it.' and if appealed to for an increase, to reply, 'the law says you shall have a certain increase every year, and when you reach the maximum you can be promoted.' All that is now provided for in the law, but no attention is paid to it. I do not say that our government was free from blame in this respect, but I say the present government has not only duplicated, but quadrupled the evil. You never saw an estimate brought down during the administration of the Conservative government with so many items in violation of the Civil Service Act as you find in the estimates of this year. As I have explained, circumstances arise in which it is desirable and justifiable to use these words, 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act,' but it is only in such cases that it should be done.

Here is the same old story about Rideau Hall.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I dare say my hon. friend has heard of Rideau Hall. I am not finding fault with placing Rideau Hall in a proper state to be the residence of the Governor General, but why did not the government, after the fire took place, come to the conclusion to build a new residence which would be a credit to the country, instead of going on year after year, as we have been doing for the last thirty years spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on that old shack. I do not know whether my hon. friend who is a resident of Ottawa and a member of the government, has called the attention of his colleagues to this question; but it has been mooted over and over again. The expenditure of half a million in putting up a residence which would be creditable to the country and fit for the Governor General would be an actual saving in the long run. In these estimates we have sixty or seventy thousand dollars appropriated for the purpose of making improvements, not for the purpose of keeping it up—that is additional—and I suggest to my hon. friend that before this money is spent it would be well to decide upon getting a proper residence. I can tell him where they can get one. They could pull down that old shack and put up a building that will be suitable for the Governor General. Let us have an end to such large expenditures for these large improvements. I think the country would justify them in doing that, and I am quite sure parliament would give its approval.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill passed through its final stages.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee of Debates and Reporting of the Senate. He said: The first item recommending the payment to Holland Brothers, is based on the fact that they have to keep a staff during the adjournments of this House from time to time, making it very hard on them, especially when the session is prolonged, and the volume is not very large. This report was unanimously adopted by the committee. A like report was made two years ago and adopted by the House. The next item is in relation to the special reporter. A weekly arrangement is made with him for the ensuing session, but it is an agreement which could be put an end to on one week's notice. This is the usual report which is always adopted at the end of the session. The third item recommends the payment of $100 to each of the French translators of the Debates, Messrs. Bouchard and Chapman. Mr. Bouchard is a very old employee, and has been in the service for many years, and has a salary of $1,300. Mr. Chapman receives $1,100, and they are doing the work very efficiently and properly. They are almost up to date in the translation of the debates and the committee unanimously came to the conclusion that a bonus of $100 to each would be fair. There was almost a promise last year that the question of placing our employees on a scale, would be carried out this year, but as it has been postponed until next session, the committee thought it would not be dealing properly with these employees if we did not recommend these bonuses.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Has the attention of the hon. gentleman been called to a decision in another place in a matter identically the same as he is proposing? I understand a decision was given by the premier of the country that committees had no right to make such recommendations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has not been here long enough, or has not studied the question of how our contingencies should be disposed of.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is the same thing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the House of Commons, it is quite a different thing. There is a certain appropriation placed annually at the disposal of the Senate to be used as the Senate thinks proper. That is the sum out of which these moneys are paid. I do not find fault with the report. I have been of the opinion for two or three years that the expenditure of money for the press reports of the proceedings of this chamber is simply money thrown away. I want it distinctly understood that I find no fault with the reporter. I am quite satisfied with his work, having gone up into the clerk's room and looked into the reports which he has prepared. He gives a very fair synopsis of what takes place, but I should like to ask any hon. gentleman who has taken the trouble to look at the newspapers, what kind of reports have been published.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are none.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We go to the expense of furnishing them with a synopsis of the proceedings of the Senate. It is sent away to the leading newspapers in Toronto and Montreal and other cities, where the night editor puts his pencil through it. A debate lasting four or five hours in the Chamber, is condensed into a dozen lines. I do not find so much fault with that, but in the manipulation of the report which is sent to them, the essential points made by the speaker are left out, and in too many cases he is made to appear like an ignoramus. The reports appearing in the 'Globe,' 'Mail,' 'Gazette' or 'Citizen' do not give the slightest idea of what takes place here. It would be better to have no report at all than reports of that kind. If the newspapers desire a report of anything that is done here, let them send their own reporters or go without it. We are just as well with no reports at all as we are with the mutilated reports which are published at present. I attribute the fault altogether to the newspaper offices and not to our reporter. My own view of it is that the sooner we cut off that report, the better it will be for the Senate. It may be we are getting rid of a good servant, but that has nothing to do with it. We are dealing with public money, and if we are receiving no return for what we spend, I cannot for the life of me see why it is continued.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—When an hon. member who engages the attention of the House pretty frequently, takes the ground that the reports of our debates as prepared by the newspaper reporter do not fulfil the requirements or do not answer any good purpose, I think it is quite competent for one who occupies very little time in addressing the House to coincide with him. I heartily concur in the views expressed by the hon. leader of the opposition. I think we can discuss this question without reflecting on the gentleman who does the reporting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not do that at all.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I am bound to say that, as far as I have seen the reports, they are excellent but it seems an extraordinary thing that a deliberative assembly of this kind should have to pay a reporter for furnishing a synopsis of our proceedings to the newspapers. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition and I myself are newspaper men and it seems to me utterly ridiculous that we should contribute any sum of money whatever to prepare reports of the proceeding of this Senate for the use of the newspapers of Canada. If they are not worth reporting then do not report them. If they are worth reporting let the newspapers send their own men and report the proceedings. If they are not anxious to do that, then we might facilitate the publishing of the Debates a little more rapidly, and they could use the official report. It would be considered a most extraordinary thing if the House of Commons had to adopt our method of getting their proceedings before the public of Canada, or if any of the provincial legislatures had to resort to such a method. It is absolutely ridiculous. It seems to me that when the Senate adopted that method it could not have been reported for a long time, and was very anxious to get its name in the press of the country. If the proceedings are worth reporting they will be reported by the newspapers of the country, and I think the newspapers would not go very long without having a reporter of their own here to report our proceedings, because they cannot ignore what takes place in the Senate. The recommendation to re-engage Mr. Holmden for next year I shall vote for heartily, but we ought next session to reconsider what we have been doing in this respect. I do not think it reflects very much credit on the Senate that we have to pay a man to report our proceedings for the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I have taken very little time in discussing matters in this chamber. I have often been tempted to speak, but refrained from doing so because the great question we had at issue did not affect the province to which I belong, and I am proud to say we have not had heretofore so much of the race and religious feeling displayed in my province as has been exhibited in parts of the Dominion further west, because we agree to differ; and as the hon. gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) said the other night, we get along very nicely without having any cast-iron law as regards the great question of education. I agree with the hon. leader of the opposition, in regard to the subject now before the Senate, and I also agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Templeman). The first session I was here the question of free trade and protection was discussed in the chamber, and I made a few remarks. Anybody who knows anything about me knows that I am not a protectionist in the sense in which the question has been discussed in the last few years. Well, somebody—I suppose it was this same reporter to whom reference has been made—had me standing in my place in the Senate as a protectionist, when I am the very reverse. That statement—diametrically opposed to what I did say—was published in the 'Morning Chronicle' in Nova Scotia, and I never succeeded in getting the matter put right until I wrote a letter to the editor of the 'Chronicle' and told him it was very hard, particularly for a man who did not care to see his name in print, who did not discuss matters much,—but who had his feelings and views, nevertheless,—that he should be reported in that manner. That is the only way I could set myself right. I agree with what the hon. minister has said. Why have not the newspapers, the great organs of this country, sufficient enterprise to have good reporters here, who could give us a fair digest of the proceedings of this House? Talking about the circulation of the 'Hansard,' I should like to ask how many people read it? Not one in five hundred looks at the copy of the Debates, but every man in the country reads his newspaper and if the newspapers had enterprise enough to give a fair report what took place in our chamber, the Senate would not be as much misrepresented as it is. As a member of this body, I very often feel indignant at the remarks made about us. I came here supposing I was coming among a party of old men in their dotage who could not discuss public questions; but I find men here of calibre, of common sense and practical ability, who are the equals and peers of the members of the other House, and we should not be misrepresented before the country. So far as I, a young member of the Senate, am concerned, I intend hereafter to maintain the dignity of the Senate, even if I have to take my pen and write myself. I think a better system should prevail.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This discussion, or something like it has taken place on various occasions before. The theory that our proceedings should be interesting enough to induce the newspapers of the country to send reporters to report them, has been laid down on several occasions, but for some mysterious reason the newspapers will not send their men here; and it was with a view of bringing our proceedings before the eyes of the public that the system which has been in operation now for some years was adopted. It appears now that it is not satisfactory. This discussion and the experience for the last few years suggests to me the question, is it not time that we changed our 'Hansard' system altogether?

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And that we adopted the system which prevails in the United States, England, and Australia, that there should be one staff of reporters for both Houses, and that the reports of the debates of the two Houses should appear in the same 'Hansard. In that way each day's debate in the Senate would appear in 'Hansard' the following morning just as the House of Commons debates appear, in the same form and in the same pamphlet. In that way we would secure what we have been anxious to secure, more general reading of the debates of this House, and we would have altogether a better system. I should not advocate anything which would result in anything like unfairness or hardship to the gentlemen who have been doing our reporting for a number of years, but I think really that we should adopt the same system which prevails in other English-speaking countries, and that we should have one report, which should embrace the debates of both Houses. I trust the committee of next year may see their way to take some steps in that direction, and I am satisfied if that were done our reports would be more extensively read than at present, and the public at large would know more of what we are saying and doing.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—A statement which appeared in a prominent Toronto paper a few days ago causes me to make a few remarks. I am sorry I have not the paper to read to the House, but it reflected very considerably upon this body, stating that the Senate was practically useless in so far as dealing with Bills and legislation generally was concerned. This House, as is well known, is a revising body primarily in so far as legislation is concerned, and I will say from my own experience, having been in parliament for some years, that during my term in the Senate we have had Bills submitted for revision which I, personally, was very sorry to see coming from any legislative body, and but for the existence of this branch of parliament, a very great injury would have been done to private interests in Canada in many instances. For that reason I firmly believe that this Senate exists in the very best interests of Canada, and I am sorry indeed that the newspapers of Canada do not take more cognizance of the very efficient work done here.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I simply wish to say that it is the fault of the Senate. No amount of effort on the part of this Senate will make our proceedings more interesting to the public. If the press do not wish to report the proceedings of this body, it shows we are not up to the mark. If it were possible to initiate legislation here and bring forward measures then it would make a difference, but being intended merely to revise measures which pass the House of Commons, the people do not take much interest in the Senate. After three months debate on the Autonomy Bill in the Commons, what part of the public are likely to read the opinions of the Senate ? Very few do it. But all this should not endanger the position of the gentleman who is reporting. He has done his duty and I think he should be rewarded, and not interfered with.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (204) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts. He said : This Bill deals with the judges of the higher courts of the various provinces, and also with the district judges of the province of Quebec and the county judges of Ontario. This matter has been very fully discussed in the public press, and I think it was the universal consensus of opinion that the proposal to increase salaries to the extent set forth in the Bill is a very fair and proper one. Some judges in Ontario complain that their salaries will be less in future under this Bill than they have been in the past. It appears that in Ontario the practice has been that the judges are allowed $100 for each court. There are about nine different districts allotted to each judge half-yearly, representing about $1,800 a year. That allowance has been cut off by this measure, and they simply receive their actual living and travelling expenses. A judge attending the Ottawa court would be here perhaps six days. His expenses would be $40, $50, or $60, instead of $100. There is also a provision that the judges are not to sit on boards. They are not to take positions outside of those immediately connected with the duties in the court. I presume some of them have had an allowance as chairman or as members of various insurance boards and trust boards. However, it was thought very much better that they be required to give up the positions they have held of that nature.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In that case, would it not be just to fix a date for that provision to be enforced ? Certain judges, if I understand, are engaged in occupations where they might require a little time to sever their connection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot interfere with that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Can we make no change in this Bill ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is a money Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the last clause be altered in any way ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, if there was a reason for the change ; if the proposition appealed to members of the Senate as worthy of adoption.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In so far as it does not affect at all the revenue of the country.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman took the other side of the question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg pardon ; I did not take the other side of the question, and the hon. gentleman does not understand the question yet. I am asking if we could amend or alter the clause which would not change in any way the financial provisions of the Bill. I am answered yes. What the hon. gentleman alludes to is a change that was made in this House, which altered the financial conditions of the Bill. That is not the same case. I know the case the hon. gentleman is alluding to. In that particular instance the money clauses of that Bill were changed by this House, which we had not a right to do. But I am putting another question, and the position I take today is that we have a right to amend any clauses which are quite independent of money matters, and we have done it more than once on other occasions. If the Bill comprises money matters and contains no clauses which we could alter, then we do not need to go into committee, but if there are clauses which might be altered, we could go into committee.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—We have an Equity judge in our province who receives $1,000 as a judge in Equity, and as judge of the Admiralty court. How would he be affected by the Bill ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are not disturbed. I think, as a rule, the Admiralty court judges receive $1,000 extra under this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As the hon. Secretary of State has been discussing the general principle of the Bill, in relation particularly to increases of salary, and has referred to the 7th clause, I may say that unless it is intended to amend the clauses, it may be just as well discussed now as in committee. The question in my mind is as to how far the 7th clause goes. It goes too far or else not far enough. The clause reads :—

7. No judge mentioned in this Act shall, either directly, or indirectly as director or manager of any corporation, company, or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties but every such judge shall devote himself exclusively to such judicial duties.

The clause is clear enough so far as relates to acting as directors or managers of any corporations. That will include the directors or managers of life, fire, and trust, and loan companies, and banks. Could a judge carry on a farm under that clause ? Does that clause prevent a judge from acting as a commissioner appointed by the government ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it would.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to know that, because Mr. Justice Britton was taken from the Bench, sent to the Yukon and kept a month or two in the investigation of the Treadgold concession. Then we had Chancellor Boyd and Chief Justice Falconbridge engaged in a semi-political investigation for the province of Ontario. I understand my hon. friend to say that the judges are precluded from acting on these commissions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was the design and intention when the clause was discussed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to hear that. If my hon. friend from Marshfield were here I should compliment him on the result that has followed the motion which he made a couple of sessions ago.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—This is the result of his speech.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know that he was complimented by the judiciary, and by many judges who were opposed to appointment on these commissions, for the speech he made and for the research which he displayed in that matter. I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to a point that is perhaps of some importance, that while I think every citizen of Canada who has given this matter any consideration will approve of the clauses which prevents the judges from occupying positions similar to those to which I have referred, there are many judges holding positions, on boards of loan companies, for instance, who have been there for 15 or 20 years and have a very large interest in them, and to prevent them from continuing there will, I am informed, actually reduce their incomes. Take the case of Chief Justice Meredith of Toronto. He is allowed $1,000 from the Ontario government. That allowance was, I am informed, in direct violation of the law. When attention was called to it, Sir John Thompson said he did not like to inferfere with the appropriation which had been made by the government of Ontario, but he intended in a short time to increase the salaries of the judges, and when the salaries were increased this allowance would be cut off. That $1,000 is cut off not only from that judge but from all other judges in Toronto and the travelling allowances are cut off to a certain extent. They are prevented from earning any money by being directors of companies, and I have a telegram from Sir William Meredith, sent to a member of the Commons, which reads as follows :—

'Hope provision as to judges will not prevent judge heretofore appointed being director of Life companies. Several Ontario judges are on such boards and in England the same occurs. Will derive no benefit from increase if I must give up my directorship of North American Life.'

And he mentioned some other companies. There is no doubt that in a case of that kind, where a judge is deprived from earning anything on these boards and loses the $1,000 from the Ontario government, the increase of $2,000 will be of no advantage to him at all. On the contrary, he will lose by it. I may say that he was offered certain commissionerships, and believing that judges should not accept commissions such as had been accepted by other judges, he declined to accept. There is a judge in Montreal in precisely the same position, and his salary will be decreased by this measure. I do not say that the clause should be struck out. I think it is a very valuable clause, and in the right direction, but under the circumstances the question is whether it should come into force immediately. Time should be given to the gentlemen to wind up the business in which they have been engaged in the past in connection with these corporations ; or perhaps we should increase their salaries a little more. The object of the government is a worthy one. They increase the salaries for the purpose not only of preventing but rendering it unnecessary for judges to accept positions outside of their judicial duties. Does that clause apply to county court judges ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And if they are included, I repeat that it meets my fullest approval ; but the points to which I have called attention are certainly worthy of consideration.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The county court judge in the city where I reside stated that he could not live on the salary of $2,500 which he was receiving, and that therefore the judges had to engage in other businesses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I assume it will form the subject of discussion between the Minister of Justice and the judges, as to when it will come in force.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That simply means, 'Live horse and the grass will grow.' The attention of the Minister of Justice has been called to it already and it is a question whether he will change it next year ; but if you do change it, I hope it will be in the direction of increasing the salary and not permitting the judges to act on commissions.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was passed through its final stages.

PRIVY COUNCILLORS ANNUITIES ACT.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (203) An Act respecting annuities for certain Privy Councillors.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With the indulgence of the Senate, I desire to take this opportunity of making a personal statement. Considering the length of time I have been in parliament, and the time and attention I have given in the way of assisting in administering the affairs of this country, and in the way of opposing measures which I did not believe to be beneficial, and considering also the fact that I am likely to become a pensioner, I have decided to retire from the arduous duties which I have sought in the past to perform. I notice by the public press that my hon. friend opposite is to join the annuitants. Whether he will be sent to Chelsea hospital or not I do not know, but I have made up my mind, if I live to attend another session, to take a seat in the rear as soon as one is vacant, and let some younger man occupy my present position as leader of the opposition. I am quite sure those who know me will give me credit for taking this course, through what I believe to be a sense of duty to myself and the party to which I belong. I do not wish to be understood for a moment as taking this step because of any want of confidence in the policy of the party to which I have belonged from boyhood up to the present time. In fact, the older I grow and more experience I acquire, the more strongly am I convinced of the correctness and righteousness of the policy of the Conservative party; and I congratulate the government for having, in connection with the tariff, followed to a very great extent in the footsteps of their predecessors. Had they carried out the pledges which they made to the people, I have not the slightest doubt that the country would not have been in the prosperous condition in which it is to-day. That opinion has been expressed very often. It is not a new idea, but there is no doubt of its correctness. We have had evidences to-night of the conviction of the hon. gentlemen opposite of the necessity of continuing our policy, in order to build up the industries of the country. I hope I may be able in the future to devote as much time and attention to the business of the Senate as I have in the past, but I desire to be relieved of the responsibility and constant attention which must be given to public matters by a member leading the opposition in this House. I do not pretend to assert or suppose that the duties pertaining to the position which I have held for the last eight or ten years on this side of the House, are anything like onerous as those which pertain to the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons; but I do find—and any one who succeeds me will find, and the hon. Secretary of State, from the position that he holds, knows—that it requires constant study and attention to post one's self, if I may use that expression, in the proceedings of the Senate, so as to deal with them intelligently, and in a manner they should be dealt with. Knowing that to be the fact, and feeling that at my age the time has arrived when I may be fairly relieved by those with whom I have acted, I trust I shall part company with those to whom I am opposed in a friendly and kindly spirit such as has been extended to me ever since I have been in this position. It is useless to say that we have not come into conflict very often, and when the blood is up we sometimes use words to each other which upon a moment's reflection, we would wish we had not used. In political strife and battle we are very apt to address to each other language which we would not use in social circles, but as soon as the House rises we forget those little—not animosities—but exhibitions of temper which may have characterized our proceedings at times. I do not know that this statement of mine is necessary. I have been seeking an opportunity to take this course for the last four or five years, and I have always met with a positive refusal and denial on the part of those with whom I have been associated. The same course has been pursued towards myself on the present occasion, but I have become stubborn enough to determine to follow the inclinations and bent of my own mind at the present moment. I apologize to the House for making the statement, but I think it is just as well that the House should know that in future some other hon. gentleman will occupy the seat which I have occupied, and I am quite satisfied there is ability and talent enough on this side of the House to perform the duties pertaining to the leader of the opposition, with much more ability than I have shown in the past, or could possibly show.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have no right to even express an opinion as to the selection of the hon. Senator who will lead His Majesty's Opposition in this chamber. Speaking, however, for myself, and I am quite sure for those who are associated with me—we all regret that the hon. gentleman should decide at the present time to retire finally from the position that he has so ably filled in the past. There are very few—I might say very, very, few—hon. gentlemen in the chamber who are as familiar as the hon. gentleman with the past history of Canada, and the policy which has been pursued by the different governments that have been in power in Canada for the last forty years, and that is invaluable in connection with the discharge of the duties pertaining to the position he has held. We all recognize the ability with which the hon. gentleman has led the Opposition in this House and we are glad to know that his mental vigour is quite equal to what it has been in the past. We all appreciate, however, that what he says in reference to the labour of preparing for intelligent criticism of the measures which come before the chamber is quite true. There is really more labour and study about it than most men who are not familiar with all the circumstances would suppose, because in the variety of Bills which come before this chamber, one has to look up the changes which are proposed, and consider the policy which it is proposed to adopt, and the variety of subjects entails considerable study. I am quite sure that I express the views of hon. gentlemen in this House when I say that I hope that my hon. friend is not really serious in his proposal to withdraw from the leadership of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I doubt if the hon. members around him will consent to it. He has made some reference to articles which appeared in the press with reference to my retirement and to the retirement of one or two other gentlemen. The first I heard of my proposed retirement was in the newspapers. How it originated I do not know. I do not think it was from any official source. I merely desire to make this statement in order that my friends may recognize that I have no immediate intention of resigning, unless the government desire me to withdraw. The premier has at any time the right to ask the resignation of any member of the government. Until that day comes, I do not know that I shall be disposed to resign while my health is good, and while I feel equal to the duties required of the leader of the government in this House. Fortunately, they are not very heavy. The kind consideration of those with whom we are associated in this chamber makes the work comparatively light, and in view of that fact I should hope that, for the present. my mental and physical vigour would be equal to the position for another year or two.

The Senate adjourned until two o'clock, p.m., to-morrow.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words :—

'In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.'

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency the Governor General, as follows :—

'May it please Your Excellency :

'The Commons of Canada have voted the supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the public service.

'In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bill :—

'"An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial years ending the 30th June, 1905, and 30th June, 1906."'

Then, after the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had read the Title of the Bill,

The Clerk of the Senate, by His Excellency's command, did thereupon say :—

'In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks His Loyal Subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill.'

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the First Session of the Tenth Parliament of the Dominion with the following Speech :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In relieving you from this laborious and long protracted session, I desire to express my hearty congratulations on the passage of the two important measures providing for the entry into the confederacy of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The unparalleled increase in the population during the last three years, of the areas the new provinces embrace, affords the strongest evidence that at no distant date they will be the homes of many millions of prosperous and contented people.

The fair prospect of an unusually abundant harvest, not alone in the three prairie provinces, but also in other parts of this wide Dominion will, I trust, under a kind Providence, be fully realized, justifying the hope that the stream of immigration now flowing into the Dominion will continue for many years to come, adding wealth to this highly favoured land.

The addition to the number of the permanent force which you have authorized will enable my government to relieve the taxpayers of the United Kingdom from the burden of keeping up the garrisons at Esquimalt and at Halifax.

It is very gratifying to note that the revenue of the Dominion continues to maintain the high level it had reached two years ago, thus enablig my government to meet the increased expenditure chargeable against consolidated revenue, leaving a surplus to apply on capital account.

The numerous private Bills for industrial objects to which I have assented point to the existence of many new enterprises.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I thank you, in His Majesty's name, for the supplies you have so liberally voted.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In returning to your several homes, allow me to express the hope that you will find abundant evidences of the growing prosperity, and that before we meet again at another session some progress may have been made in the work of constructing the National Transcontinental Railway so soon to become a necessity for the transportation of the annually increasing products of the West.

The Speaker of the Senate then said :

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued until Tuesday the twenty-ninth day of August next, to be here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until the twenty-ninth day of August next.
